- g 16. In Commission v Denmark (para 12), the court admittedly noted that, as it had held in Firma August Stier v Hauptzollamt Hamburg-Ericus Case 31/67 [1968] ECR 235, it is not permissible for the member states to impose on products which, in the absence of comparable domestic production, escape the application of the prohibitions contained in art 95 of the Treaty charges of such an amount that the free movement of goods within the common market would be impeded as far as those goods were concerned. It added, however, in para 13 of Commission v Denmark, that the only possibility of appraising an adverse effect of that kind on the free movement of goods is by reference to art 30 of the EEC Treaty (which became art 30 of the EC Treaty and is now, after amendment, art 28 EC) et seq. The Commission's action in that case was not however based on those articles.
- h

i THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

17. It should be stated at the outset that, as is apparent from the documents before the court, there is no production of motor vehicles in Denmark. During the period from 1985 to 2000, the total number of registered vehicles in Denmark rose from 1,501,000 to 1,854,000 and the number of new registrations varied between 78,453 and 169,492 per year.

18. In January 1999, DBI purchased a new Audi vehicle for the use of its director for a total price (including delivery costs) of DKK 498,546, including DKK 297,456 in registration duty.

19. Since DBI took the view that that charge had been levied in breach, inter alia, of art 28 EC, it requested its repayment from the tax authorities, relying in particular on paras 12 and 13 of Commission v Denmark. In its submission, the excessive level of the registration duty made it impossible to import motor vehicles to Denmark under normal commercial conditions, to the benefit of domestic purchases of previously registered used vehicles, which were to be regarded as Danish products, in accordance with the case law of the court (see Commission v Denmark (para 17) and Dounias v Ipourgos Ikonomikon Case C-228/98 [2000] ECR I-577 (para 42)).

20. The Skatteministeriet responded that, according to the case law of the court (see, inter alia, Dounias' case (para 39)), fiscal contributions cannot be caught by art 28 EC, since the lawfulness of domestic taxation may be assessed only in the light of art 90 EC. It stated further that, in EC Commission v Greece Case C-132/88 [1990] ECR I-1567 (para 17), the court found that, as Community law stands at present, the member states are at liberty to make products such as cars subject to a system of tax which increases progressively in amount according to an objective criterion and that art 95 of the Treaty does not provide a basis for censuring the excessiveness of the level of taxation which the member states might adopt for particular products in the light of considerations of social policy.

21. According to the Skatteministeriet, the proviso adopted by the court in paras 12 and 13 of Commission v Denmark relates only to cases in which, as a result of internal taxation, trade in the product in question ceases or is insignificant in volume. The registration duty on motor vehicles, however, is not prohibitive and the total number of motor vehicles in Denmark is comparable to that in other member states.

22. In those circumstances the Østre Landsret decided to stay proceedings and to refer the following two questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

'(1) Can an indirect duty (registration duty) charged by a Member State, which in the case of new cars amounts to 105% of DKK 52 800 and 180% of the remainder of the taxable value, be a measure having an effect equivalent to a quantitative restriction on imports and for that reason prohibited under Article 28 EC (reference is made in this connection to the Court's judgment in [Commission v Denmark (para 13)])?

(2) If the answer to Question (1) is yes: can that registration duty be justified on the grounds that are mentioned in Article 30 EC or follow from the Court's case law on Article 28 EC (reference is made to [Rewe-Zentral AG v Bundesmonopolverwaltung für Branntwein Case 120/78 [1979] ECR 649])?'

THE FIRST QUESTION REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

23. By its first question, the national court is essentially asking the court whether art 28 EC must be interpreted as precluding, as a rule, the levy of a charge on the registration of new motor vehicles, such as the registration duty at issue in the main proceedings.

a Observations submitted to the court

24. DBI claims, in substance, that the Danish registration duty impedes the free movement of new vehicles since, because of its excessive level, it prevents the importation of those goods to Denmark under normal commercial conditions, whilst benefiting domestic purchases of used vehicles previously registered in Denmark, which must be regarded as Danish products. That duty thus amounts to a quantitative restriction on imports contrary to art 28 EC.

b 25. The applicant in the main proceedings bases its analysis on paras 12 and 13 of Commission v Denmark, from which it is apparent that charges of an amount such that they impede the free movement of goods may be assessed in the light of art 28 EC.

c 26. The Danish government submits that the registration duty cannot be regarded as a quantitative restriction on imports prohibited under art 28 EC. It argues that the assertion in para 13 of Commission v Denmark has never been reiterated by the court in subsequent judgments. On the contrary, it follows from settled case law that barriers of a fiscal nature to the free movement of goods must be assessed in the light of arts 23 to 25 EC or arts 90 to 93 EC. In d the main proceedings, however, the registration duty on new motor vehicles, which is internal taxation, neither discriminates against imported products nor protects domestic production, with the result that it is not prohibited by art 90 EC.

e 27. As to the remainder, if the Commission were to consider that the registration duty is excessively high, it would be for it to draw up a proposal for a measure on the basis of art 93 EC with a view to harmonising national legislation.

f 28. In the alternative, the Danish government contends that para 13 of Commission v Denmark must be interpreted as meaning that the prohibition on quantitative restrictions on imports, laid down in art 28 EC, relates only to fiscal provisions which have such an impact on intra-Community trade that, as far as the taxed product is concerned, that trade is reduced to nothing or becomes insignificant. However, that is not the case in the main proceedings since the number of motor vehicles per inhabitant in Denmark is comparable to that in other member states.

g 29. The observations of the Italian and Finnish governments are to the same effect.

h 30. The Commission considers that barriers of a fiscal nature which do not have an effect equivalent to a customs duty fall, as a rule, under art 90 EC, which is a lex specialis as opposed to the general prohibition on barriers to trade, laid down in art 28 EC. Barriers of a fiscal nature which are not covered by art 90 EC—or by arts 23 to 25 EC—may therefore be caught by art 28 EC i where they impede the free movement of goods. By contrast, according to the case law of the court, a barrier of a fiscal nature cannot fall at the same time under the two provisions.

i 31. As a consequence, it is for the national court to assess, in the light of the facts in the main proceedings, whether the registration duty on new motor vehicles is of a level such that it impedes the free movement of goods. The Commission notes, in that regard, that it is apparent from the order for reference that a considerable number of motor vehicles are registered each year in Denmark, that the variations in the number of registrations appear to be purely short-term and that the number of motor vehicles per inhabitant is at the same level as in other countries of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD). It is therefore not established that the Danish legislation at issue in the main proceedings impedes the free movement of goods. a

Reply of the court

32. The scope of art 28 EC does not extend to the obstacles to trade covered by other specific provisions of the Treaty and obstacles of a fiscal nature or having an effect equivalent to customs duties, which are covered by arts 23, 25 and 90 EC, do not fall within the prohibition laid down in art 28 EC (see Cie commerciale de l'Ouest v Receveur principal des douanes de la Pallice-Port Joined cases C-78/90 and C-83/90 [1992] ECR I-1847 (para 20) and Downias' case (para 39)). b

33. Furthermore, as regards the scope of arts 25 and 90 EC, it is settled case law that provisions relating to charges having equivalent effect and those relating to discriminatory internal taxation cannot be applied together, with the result that, under the system established by the Treaty, the same charge cannot belong to both categories at the same time (see Nygård v Svineavgiftsfonden Case C-234/99 [2002] ECR I-3657 (para 17)). c

34. In the present case, since a charge on the registration of new motor vehicles, such as the Danish registration duty at issue in the main proceedings, is manifestly of a fiscal nature and is charged not by reason of the vehicle crossing the frontier of the member state which introduced the charge, but upon first registration of the vehicle in the territory of that state, the charge must be regarded as part of a general system of internal dues on goods and thus examined in the light of art 90 EC. d

35. The fact that a charge of that sort is in fact imposed solely on imported new vehicles, because there is no domestic production, is not such as to cause it to be characterised as a charge having equivalent effect, for the purposes of art 25 EC, rather than internal taxation, within the meaning of art 90 EC, since it is part of a general system of internal dues applied systematically to categories of vehicles in accordance with objective criteria irrespective of the origin of the products (see, to that effect, EC Commission v France Case 90/79 [1981] ECR 283 (para 14)). e

36. Since the applicability of art 90 EC in the main proceedings is thus established, it should be noted that that article expressly prohibits the imposition on products from other member states of internal taxation in excess of that imposed on similar domestic products or internal taxation of such a nature as to afford indirect protection to other products (see Commission v Denmark (para 8)). f

37. It should also be noted that, as para 9 of Commission v Denmark shows, the aim of art 90 EC as a whole is to ensure the free movement of goods between the member states in normal conditions of competition by the elimination of all forms of protection which may result from the application of internal taxation that discriminates against products from other member states. Thus art 90 EC must guarantee the complete neutrality of internal taxation as regards competition between domestic products and imported products. g

38. On the other hand, art 90 EC cannot be invoked against internal taxation imposed on imported products where there is no similar or competing domestic production. In particular, it does not provide a basis for censuring the excessiveness of the level of taxation which the member states might adopt for particular products, in the absence of any discriminatory or protective effect (see Commission v Denmark (para 10)). h

i

- a 39. At present there is no domestic production of cars in Denmark, as has already been noted in para 17, above, nor indeed of any products liable to compete with cars. In those circumstances, it must be concluded that the Danish registration duty imposed on new motor vehicles is not covered by the prohibitions laid down in art 90 EC.
- b 40. It is true, as DBI pointed out, that the court held, in para 12 of Commission v Denmark, that it is not permissible for the member states to impose on products which, in the absence of comparable domestic production, escape the application of the prohibitions contained in art 90 EC charges of such an amount that the free movement of goods within the common market would be impeded as far as those goods were concerned.
- c 41. It is however sufficient in that regard to state that, in any event, the figures communicated by the national court as to the number of new vehicles registered in Denmark, and thus imported into that member state, do not in any way show that the free movement of that type of goods between Denmark and the other member states is impeded.
- d 42. In those circumstances, it cannot be considered that a charge such as the Danish registration duty has ceased to be internal taxation, within the meaning of art 90 EC, and should be classified as a measure having equivalent effect to a quantitative restriction, for the purposes of art 28 EC, nor is it appropriate to examine the scope of the proviso adopted by the court in paras 12 and 13 of Commission v Denmark.
- e 43. In conclusion, the answer to the first question referred for a preliminary ruling must be that:
—a charge on the registration of new motor vehicles established by a member state which does not have any domestic production of vehicles, such as that laid down by the lov om registreringsafgift af motorkøretøjer (Law on registration duty on motor vehicles), in the version resulting from Consolidating Law No 222 of 14 April 1999, constitutes internal taxation whose compatibility with Community law must be examined in the light not of art 28 EC, but of art 90 EC;
—art 90 EC must be interpreted as not precluding such a charge.

THE SECOND QUESTION REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

- g 44. Having regard to the considerations set out in connection with the first question, it is not necessary to examine the justifications put forward in the alternative by the Danish government in support of the compatibility of the Danish registration duty with Community law, with the result that the second question becomes devoid of purpose.
- h COSTS
45. The costs incurred by the Danish, Italian and Finnish governments and by the Commission, which have submitted observations to the court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

i On those grounds, the Court of Justice, in answer to the question referred to it by the Østre Landsret by order of 26 September 2001, hereby rules:

(1) A charge on the registration of new motor vehicles established by a member state which does not have any domestic production of vehicles, such as that laid down by the lov om registreringsafgift af motorkøretøjer (Law on registration duty on motor vehicles), in the version resulting from Consolidating Law No 222 of 14 April 1999, constitutes internal taxation whose compatibility with Community law must be examined in the light not of art 28 EC, but of art 90 EC. a

(2) Article 90 EC must be interpreted as not precluding such a charge.

a Delahaye v Ministre de la Fonction publique et de la Réforme administrative

b (Case C-425/02)

COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (SECOND CHAMBER)

JUDGES TIMMERMANS (PRESIDENT), GULMANN AND COLNERIC (RAPPORTEUR)
ADVOCATE GENERAL LÉGER

c 6 MAY, 17 JUNE, 11 NOVEMBER 2004

d European Community – Employment – Continuity of employment – Transfer of trade, business or undertaking – Transfer of undertaking from private company to public body – Allocation of rate of remuneration pursuant to national provisions on employment conditions for employees of state – Whether reduction in remuneration prohibited by Community law – Whether reduction in remuneration constituting substantial change in working conditions to detriment of transferred employee – Council Directive (EEC) 77/187, art 4(2).

e In the main proceedings, the employee had concluded a contract of employment with the state of Luxembourg after the activity of the undertaking for whom she had worked had been transferred to the state. As the result of the relevant provisions of national law—which fixed the employment conditions and amounts of remuneration of employees of the state—she had been allocated a lower remuneration than she had originally received since no allowance had been made for her length of service with her former employer. The national court decided to stay the proceedings and refer a question to the Court of Justice of the European Communities under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) concerning: (i) whether Council Directive (EEC) 77/187 (on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers or undertakings, businesses or parts of businesses) precluded the reduction of the transferred employee's remuneration; and (ii) whether such a reduction in the transferred employee's remuneration might constitute a substantial change in working conditions to the detriment of the transferred employee within the meaning of art 4(2)<sup>a</sup> of the directive.

h Held – Where an undertaking had been transferred from a legal person governed by private law to the state, in principle, that state was not precluded by the directive from reducing a transferred employee's remuneration in order to comply with national rules for public employees. However, having regard to the spirit of the directive, the transferred employee's length of service had to be taken into account when calculating his or her remuneration in the same way that length of service would be taken into account for state employees. Furthermore, where that calculation had been applied a substantial reduction in the transferred employee's remuneration resulting none the less would constitute a substantial change in working conditions to the detriment of the transferred employee within the meaning of art 4(2) of the directive, such that termination of the contract of employment for that reason had to be regarded as resulting from the action of the employer (see judgment paras 30, 32–35, below).

<sup>a</sup> Article 4(2) of the directive is set out at judgment para 6, below

Mayeur v Association Promotion de l'Information Messine (APIM) Case C-175/99 [2000] IRLR 783 applied.

Notes

For the effect of a relevant transfer on contracts of employment, see 16 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 390.

Cases cited

- Abler v Sodexho MM Catering GmbH* Case C-340/01 [2004] IRLR 168, ECJ.
- Allen v Amalgamated Construction Co Ltd* Case C-234/98 [2000] All ER (EC) 97, [1999] ECR I-8643, ECJ.
- Barber v Guardian Royal Exchange Assurance Group* Case C-262/88 [1990] 2 All ER 660, [1991] 1 QB 344, [1991] 2 WLR 72, [1990] ECR I-1889, ECJ.
- Brown v Secretary of State for Scotland* Case 197/86 1989 SLT 402, [1988] ECR 3205, ECJ.
- Collino v Telecom Italia SpA* Case C-343/98 [2001] All ER (EC) 405, [2000] ECR I-6659, ECJ.
- Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark v A/S Danmols Inventar (in liq)* Case 105/84 [1985] ECR 2639, ECJ.
- Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark v Daddy's Dance Hall A/S* Case 324/86 [1988] IRLR 315, [1988] ECR 739, ECJ.
- Henke v Gemeinde Schierke* Case C-298/94 [1997] All ER (EC) 173, [1996] ECR I-4989, ECJ.
- Jämställdhetsombudsmannen v Örebro Läns Landsting* Case C-236/98 [2000] ECR I-2189, ECJ.
- Lawrie-Blum v Land Baden-Württemberg* Case 66/85 [1986] ECR 2121, ECJ.
- Martin v South Bank University* Case C-4/01 [2004] IRLR 74, ECJ.
- Mayeur v Association Promotion de l'Information Messine (APIM)* Case C-175/99 [2000] IRLR 783, [2002] ICR 1316, [2000] ECR I-7755, ECJ.
- Merckx v Ford Motors Co Belgium SA* Joined cases C-171/94 and C-172/94 [1996] All ER (EC) 667, [1997] ICR 352, [1996] ECR I-1253, ECJ.
- Redmond (Dr Sophie) Stichting v Bartol* Case C-29/91 [1992] ECR I-3189, ECJ.
- Sánchez Hidalgo v Asociación de Servicios Aser, Ziemann v Ziemann Sicherheit GmbH* Joined cases C-173/96 and C-247/96 [1999] IRLR 136, [2002] ICR 73, [1998] ECR I-8237, ECJ.
- Spijkers v Gebr Benedik Abattoir CV* Case 24/85 [1986] ECR 1119, ECJ.
- Süzen v Zehnacker Gebäudereinigung GmbH Krankenhausservice* Case C-13/95 [1997] All ER (EC) 289, [1997] ECR I-1259, ECJ.
- Union de Recouvrement des Cotisations de Sécurité Sociale et d'Allocations Familiales de la Savoie (URSSAF) v Hostellerie Le Manoir Sàrl* Case C-27/91 [1991] ECR I-5531, ECJ.

Reference

By decision of 21 November 2002, the Cour Administrative (Administrative Court) Luxembourg, referred under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) a question (set out at judgment para 27, below) on the interpretation of Council Directive (EEC) 77/187 (on the approximation of the laws of the a member states relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of businesses). The reference was made in the course of proceedings between Johanna Maria Boor, née Delahaye, and the Minister for Public Service and Administrative Reform concerning the minister's refusal to maintain the remuneration under the contract of employment originally concluded between Mrs Boor and Foprogest ASBL (association sans but lucratif, non-profit-making association), a legal person governed by private law, after the latter's undertaking had been transferred to the Luxembourg state. Observations were submitted on behalf of: Mrs Boor, née Delahaye, by R Assa and N Prüm-Carré, Avocats; the Luxembourg government, by S Schreiner, acting as agent, and A Rukavina, Avocat; the Italian government, by IM Braguglia and D Del Gaizo, acting as agents, and A Gingolo, Avvocato dello Stato; the Portuguese government, by L Inez Fernandes and A Seica Neves, acting as agents; the Commission of the European Communities, by A Aresu and D Martin, acting as agents. The language of the case was French. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General.

d 17 June 2004. The Advocate General (P Léger) delivered the following opinion<sup>1</sup>.

1. Where the state takes over activities previously carried on by a non-profit-making association (a legal person governed by private law), is the state, as transferee of the undertaking, obliged under Community law, to preserve unchanged the private law contracts of employment existing at the date of transfer of this undertaking, without reducing the amount of the employees' remuneration, or is it entitled, under the national rules in force relating to the status of public employees, to make such a reduction?

e 2. This, essentially, is the question referred for a preliminary ruling by the Cour Administrative (Administrative Court), Luxembourg. In this question, f the referring court is requesting the Court of Justice of the European Communities, following on from the decision in Mayeur v Association Promotion de l'Information Messine (APIM)<sup>2</sup>, to interpret Council Directive (EEC) 77/187 (on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of businesses)<sup>3</sup>.

g I—LEGAL BACKGROUND

A—The Community legislation

3. Directive 77/187 aims, as set out in its second recital, to 'provide for the protection of employees in the event of a change of employer, in particular, to ensure that their rights are safeguarded'.

h 4. To that end, art 3(1) of the directive lays down the principle that—i '[t]he transferor's rights and obligations arising from a contract of employment or from an employment relationship existing on the date of a transfer within the meaning of Article 1(1)<sup>4</sup> shall, by reason of such transfer, be transferred to the transferee.'

1 Original language: French.

2 Case C-175/99 [2000] IRLR 783, [2000] ECR I-7755.

3 OJ 1977 L61 p 26.

4 Article 1(1) of the directive states that '[t]his Directive shall apply to the transfer of an undertaking, business or part of a business to another employer as a result of a legal transfer or merger'.

5. Furthermore, the directive provides that the transferee shall continue to observe the conditions of work agreed in any collective agreement (see art 3(2)) and that the employees concerned shall be protected against dismissal by the transferor or the transferee solely on the grounds of the transfer (see art 4(1)). a

6. Further, art 6(1) of the directive imposes on the transferor and the transferee the requirement to inform the representatives of the employees concerned of the legal, economic and social implications of the transfer for these employees and of measures envisaged in relation to them. It is specified that the transferee must give such information in good time, and in any event before these employees are directly affected by the transfer as regards their conditions of work and employment. Article 6(2) of the directive supplements this requirement for information from the transferor or the transferee by a requirement to consult with a view to seeking agreement with the representatives of the employees concerned when measures are envisaged in relation to these employees. b
c

7. Where the measures envisaged and consulted on are finally decided upon, art 4(2) of the directive provides that— d

‘[i]f the contract of employment or the employment relationship is terminated [on the employee’s initiative] because the transfer ... involves a substantial change in working conditions to the detriment of the employee, the employer shall be regarded as having been responsible for termination of the contract of employment or of the employment relationship.’ e

8. All these provisions were reproduced, in their entirety, by Council Directive (EC) 98/50 (amending Council Directive (EEC) 77/187)<sup>5</sup>, and then by Council Directive (EC) 2001/23 (on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to the safeguarding of employees’ rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of undertakings or businesses)<sup>6</sup>, which codified Directive 77/187 in the light of the substantial amendments made by Directive 98/50. f

B—The national legislation

9. In Luxembourg law, the relevant national legislation on safeguarding employees’ rights in the event of the transfer of an undertaking is set out in art 36 of the Law of 24 May 1989 on contracts of employment<sup>7</sup>. g

10. Article 36(1) provides that—

‘[i]f any change arises in the legal situation of the employer, in particular by reason of succession, sale, merger, transformation of business assets or incorporation, all contracts of employment in force on the date of that change shall continue to exist between the new employer and the employees of the undertaking.’ h

11. The first subparagraph of art 36(2) explains, in addition, that a—

‘transfer of the undertaking as a result inter alia of a legal transfer or merger shall not in itself constitute grounds for dismissal by the transferor or the transferee.’ i

<sup>5</sup> OJ 1998 L201 p 88.

<sup>6</sup> OJ 2001 L82 p 16.

<sup>7</sup> Mémorial [Official Journal of Luxembourg] A No 35, 1989, p 611.

- a 12. The second subparagraph of art 36(2) of the Law states that—

‘[i]f the contract of employment is terminated because the transfer involves a substantial change in working conditions to the detriment of the employee, the employer shall be regarded as having been responsible for termination of the contract of employment.’

- b II—FACTS AND MAIN PROCEEDINGS

- c 13. Mrs Boor, née Delahaye, was employed as a secretary by the association ‘Pour l’insertion professionnelle’ (from 2 January 1995), then by the association ‘Foprogest ASBL’<sup>8</sup> (from 1 April 1998), after the latter association took over the activities initially carried on by the former. On this takeover of activities, her contract of employment with the first association was preserved by the second, and her working conditions and remuneration remained unaltered.

- d 14. According to art 3 of its articles of association, Foprogest, established in Luxembourg, had the object of promoting and implementing various training activities intended, inter alia, to improve the situation of persons seeking work and unemployed persons, so as to enable them to join or rejoin the workforce. It was also responsible for providing technical and administrative assistance within the framework of vocational training programmes and for managing the budgets of some of these programmes. Under art 19 of its articles of association, this non-profit-making association’s resources were to be largely derived from contributions, donations and bequests, grants and subsidies.

- e 15. At the end of 1999, the activities carried on by Foprogest were, in turn, taken over by the administration of the Luxembourg state, namely the Ministry of National Education, Vocational Training and Sport.

- f 16. In the context of this transfer of activities, the employment of Mrs Boor and Foprogest’s other employees was taken over by the Luxembourg state. This process gave rise to the conclusion of several contracts between the new employer and the employees concerned. In these circumstances, on 22 December 1999, Mrs Boor concluded a contract for an indefinite period with the Ministry of National Education, Vocational Training and Sport. The contract came into effect on 1 January 2000.

- g 17. Under the terms of art 2 of this contract, the claimant’s status as a state employee was recognised, in accordance with the provisions of the amended Law of 27 January 1972 laying down rules for state employees. According to art 4 of her contract, Mrs Boor’s employment was subject to the Regulation of the Government in Council of 1 March 1974 laying down rules for the indemnities of employees of state administrations and services.

- h 18. By letter of 25 January 2001, Mrs Boor brought before the Minister for Public Service and Administrative Reform an internal appeal against an order adopted by the minister on 27 October 2000, which had categorised her at a certain career and grade<sup>9</sup>. She contested this order on the grounds that it placed her, inter alia in terms of remuneration, in a less favourable situation than she had earlier enjoyed with her previous employer<sup>10</sup>.

- i 19. Mrs Boor maintained that, according to art 36 of the Law of 24 May 1989 on contracts of employment, a change in the employer’s legal situation cannot be accompanied by a change in working conditions or remuneration. The same applies, inter alia, where a legal person governed by public law takes over activities carried on until then by a legal person governed by private law. Consequently, Mrs Boor requested that the working conditions she had enjoyed before 1 January 2000, that is to say within the framework of her contract with Foprogest, be re-established retroactively. a

8 Or Foprogest.

9 The category in question was: career A, grade 1.

10 Mrs Boor claims, without contradiction by the Luxembourg government, that she was subject, by reason of the transfer of activities in question, to a reduction in remuneration of 37%; her salary had, according to her statements, initially been €2,000 a month.

20. The competent administration did not allow her application. According to the administration, there had been no changes in the employer's situation, but only the formation of a new working relationship with a new employer, which had given rise to the conclusion of a new contract, so that the provisions of national law on which Mrs Boor relied did not apply. b

21. Mrs Boor then applied to the Tribunal Administratif (Administrative Court) Luxembourg, with a view to having the contested grading order and the later amending order varied or set aside, inasmuch as neither of them permitted her to preserve her level of remuneration<sup>11</sup>. In support of her action, Mrs Boor relied inter alia on the provisions of art 36 of the Law of 24 May 1989 on contracts of employment and the way they should be interpreted in accordance with the provisions of Directive 77/187, which was relevant to this case by reason of the Mayeur judgment. c

22. By a judgment of 13 March 2002, the Tribunal Administratif dismissed Mrs Boor's action. According to the court, the applicant's situation fell within the context of the transfer of an economic entity, meeting the conditions governing the application of art 36 of the Law of 24 May 1989. However, the national court pointed out that the activity taken over is now carried on as an administrative public service and therefore comes under the rules of public law, which means that the takeover of the economic entity in question can proceed only subject to its compatibility with mandatory rules of public law on, inter alia, the remuneration of state employees. d

23. The Tribunal Administratif concluded from this that, while the reduction in remuneration of which Mrs Boor complains is capable of constituting a substantial change in her working conditions such that the employer is responsible for termination of her contract, she cannot preserve her contractual relationship while still enjoying the same remuneration. e

24. Mrs Boor appealed to the Cour Administrative (Higher Administrative Court) against that judgment. According to her, the effect of art 36 of the Law of 24 May 1989 and of art 3(1) of Directive 77/187 is that any transfer of an economic entity entails the safeguarding of the employees' rights without restriction or exception. The interpretation of these provisions given by the Tribunal Administratif would mean, firstly, that they were rendered completely redundant and, secondly, that the principle of primacy of Community law over national law was infringed. f

25. The Luxembourg government questioned whether the activities previously carried on by the non-profit-making association Foprogest and taken over by the state may be regarded as economic in nature within the meaning of Directive 77/187, as amended by Directive 98/50, since they involve combating unemployment, an activity which may come under the exercise of public power. g

h

i

<sup>11</sup> By an order of 6 July 2001, which set aside and replaced that of 27 October 2000, Mrs Boor was categorised as follows: career B, grade 2.

a III—THE QUESTION REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

26. Having regard to the arguments put forward by the parties, the Cour Administrative decided to stay proceedings and to refer a question to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling, asking whether—

b 'Having regard to the provisions of Directives 77/187/EEC, 98/50/EC and 2001/23/EC identified herein, in the event of the transfer of an undertaking from a non-profit-making association, which is a legal person under private law, to the State as transferee, is it permissible for the transferor's rights and obligations to be taken over only in so far as they are compatible with the State's own rules of public law, in particular in the field of remuneration, where the detailed provisions and amounts of compensation are laid down by Grand-Ducal regulation, bearing in mind that the status of public sector employee confers legal benefits in the fields of, inter alia, career development and job stability on the employees concerned, and that, in the event of disagreement as regards "substantial changes" to the employment relationship within the meaning of Article 4(2) of those directives, the employees concerned retain the right to request termination of that relationship according to the detailed rules in the relevant provisions?'
c
d

27. At the outset, it should be pointed out that the question referred for a preliminary ruling refers to Directive 77/187, Directive 98/50 and Directive 2001/23. However, the main proceedings took place at a date before the passing of the deadline for implementation of Directive 98/50, set at 17 July 2001, and before its transposition into Luxembourg law, which took effect later as a result of the Law of 19 December 2003<sup>12</sup>. It follows that Directive 98/50 does not apply to the main proceedings<sup>13</sup>. The same is true of Directive 2001/23, intended to codify Directive 77/187 in the light of the substantial amendments made by Directive 98/50. It is therefore not necessary, in the context of the main proceedings, to consider the interpretation of Directive 98/50 or of Directive 2001/23, particularly because the relevant provisions of Directive 77/187 were reproduced in their entirety by Directives 98/50 and 2001/23. It is necessary to interpret only Directive 77/187 and, in particular, art 3(1)<sup>14</sup>.
e
f

28. It follows that, by this question, the referring court is essentially asking whether art 3(1) of Directive 77/187 must be interpreted as precluding, where the transfer of an undertaking involves the state taking over activities previously carried on by a legal person governed by private law, the state, as new employer, from reducing, on the grounds of the transfer, the amount of the employees' remuneration in accordance with national rules in force relating to the status of public employees.
g
h

29. As in Mayeur's case, this question referred for a preliminary ruling falls within the context of a takeover by a legal person governed by public law, i 12 Mémorial GD No 182, 2003, p 3678.

13 For a comparable situation, see, inter alia, Abler v Sodexho MM Catering GmbH Case C-340/01 [2004] IRLR 168 (para 5).

14 I refer to art 3(1) of the directive (on the rights arising from a contract of employment), rather than art 3(2) (on the working conditions agreed in a collective agreement). It was stated at the hearing that the remuneration which Mrs Boor is seeking to preserve derives solely from her contract of employment with Foprogest, and not from any collective agreement binding on that association, so that art 3(2) of the directive cannot apply.

acting according to the specific rules of administrative law, of activities previously carried on by a legal person governed by private law. a

30. However, unlike the situation in the earlier case, the court has not been asked whether such an operation is capable of constituting a transfer of an economic entity within the meaning of Directive 77/187. b

31. The referring court has already ruled on this point, inter alia in the light of Mayeur's case<sup>15</sup>. In this regard, it was careful to state that activities comparable to those referred to in the main proceedings have already been recognised by the court as economic<sup>16</sup>. The referring court has concluded from this that the state's takeover of the activities previously carried on by Foprogest indeed constitutes a transfer of an undertaking within the meaning of Directive 77/187, so that the directive is applicable in the present case. c

32. In continuation of Mayeur's case, the referring court simply invites the Court of Justice to state the appropriate conclusions to be drawn in this case from the existence of a transfer of an economic entity, regarding the employees' situation, in particular as far as their remuneration is concerned. d

IV—ANALYSIS e

33. In para 106 of my opinion in Mayeur's case, I pointed out that the directive is not intended to amend the national laws in force by bringing about full harmonisation of the rights of Community workers in the event of a change of employer following a transfer of an undertaking, but only to ensure, as far as possible, that the contract of employment or employment relationship continues unchanged with the transferee<sup>17</sup>. I added that the purpose of the directive is, therefore, to prevent employees affected by a transfer of an undertaking from being placed in a less favourable position solely by reason of this transfer<sup>18</sup>. f

34. I drew the inference from this that the directive could not be interpreted as requiring the member states to amend their national law in order to enable an entity governed by public law to maintain in force contracts of employment governed by private law, contrary to the applicable national rules<sup>19</sup>. g

15 See order for reference (p 4). To the same effect, the Tribunal Administratif had pointed out that it was common ground that the activities previously carried on by Foprogest remained the same, as did the staff, the organisation and the means and methods of working, so that the entity in question retained its identity, and therefore a transfer of an economic entity had taken place (see judgment of 13 March 2002, p 5). The consideration of these diverse elements by the national court, to which it falls to determine whether the conditions of a transfer have been met, is entirely consistent with the settled case law of the court. See, inter alia, Spijkers v Gebr Benedik Abattoir CV Case 24/85 [1986] ECR 1119 (para 13), Süzen v Zehnacker Gebäudereinigung GmbH Krankenhausservice Case C-13/95 [1997] All ER (EC) 289, [1997] ECR I-1259 (para 14), Allen v Amalgamated Construction Co Ltd Case C-234/98 [2000] All ER (EC) 97, [1999] ECR I-8643 (para 26), Mayeur's case (para 52), and, finally, Abler's case (para 33). h

16 See order for reference (p 4). It refers to Dr Sophie Redmond Stichting v Bartol Case C-29/91 [1992] ECR I-3189, concerning activities providing assistance to drug addicts, Sánchez Hidalgo v Asociación de Servicios Ascr, Ziemann v Ziemann Sicherheit GmbH Joined cases C-173/96 and C-247/96 [1999] IRLR 136, [1998] ECR I-8237, concerning activities providing home-help services for persons in need and Mayeur's case (paras 38–41), concerning activities relating to publicity and information on behalf of a municipality in connection with the services which it offers to the public. i

17 I referred, inter alia, to Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark v A/S Danmøls Inventar (in liq) Case 105/84 [1985] ECR 2639 (para 26) and Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark v Daddy's Dance Hall A/S Case 324/86 [1988] IRLR 315, [1988] ECR 739 (para 16). See also the Daddy's Dance Hall case (para 9).

18 See, inter alia, the Danmøls Inventar case (para 26) and Collino v Telecom Italia SpA Case C-343/98 [2001] All ER (EC) 405, [2000] ECR I-6659 (para 37).

19 Paragraph 106 of my opinion in Mayeur's case.

a 35. I pointed out, however, that, in this situation, art 4(2) of the directive applies<sup>20</sup>.

b 36. I took the view that the obligation imposed on an employer, a legal person governed by public law, by a provision of national law, to terminate contracts governed by private law entered into by the transferor, in circumstances in which all the conditions for the transfer of an undertaking are satisfied, would have to be regarded as a substantial change in working conditions to the detriment of the employee<sup>21</sup>.

c 37. I concluded from this that, in accordance with the provisions of art 4(2) of the directive, it would be incumbent on the new employer, the transferee of the activities previously carried on by the former entity, to assume responsibility for the dismissal brought about by reason of his act<sup>22</sup>.

38. In its judgment in Mayeur's case, the court agreed with my analysis.

d 39. It did not simply point out that the possible existence of national rules imposing an obligation on a legal person governed by public law to terminate private law contracts of employment, in the event of taking over an activity previously carried on by a person governed by private law, does not mean in principle that this takeover falls outside the scope of the directive<sup>23</sup>.

e 40. The court took care to state that any obligation, prescribed by national law, to terminate contracts of employment governed by private law in the case of transfer of an activity to a legal person governed by public law constitutes a substantial change in working conditions to the detriment of the employee, resulting directly from the transfer, with the result that termination of such contracts of employment must, in such circumstances, be regarded as resulting from the action of the employer, in accordance with art 4(2) of the directive<sup>24</sup>.

f 41. As the Luxembourg government and the Commission of the European Communities have rightly pointed out, these developments in case law shed light on the answer to be given to the question referred for a preliminary ruling.

g 42. It may be seen from Mayeur's case that, in the event of the transfer to a legal person governed by public law of an economic entity within the scope of a legal person governed by private law, the application of the directive does not necessarily mean that contracts of employment existing at the time of the transfer should be preserved, in accordance with art 3(1) of the directive.

h 43. Thus, in the event that national law lays down, in the context of this type of transfer, an obligation to terminate private law contracts of employment, the directive does not preclude termination.

i 44. However, in this situation, termination required by national law should be regarded as resulting from the action of the employer, under art 4(2) of the directive, since this requirement of national law would constitute a substantial change in working conditions to the detriment of the employees.

45. In my opinion, this rule in Mayeur's case is capable of being applied to the situation in the main proceedings. There are two sets of arguments in favour of this.

20 See footnote above (para 107).

i 21 See footnote 19, above (para 108).

22 See footnote 19, above (para 108). Classifying the termination of a contract of employment or of an employment relationship as being at the initiative of or resulting from the action of the employer may, under the applicable national law, present some financial advantages for the employee concerned. It can thus confer entitlement to redundancy payments or to damages.

23 See, to that effect, Mayeur's case (paras 50–55).

24 See footnote above (para 56).

46. Firstly, it is apparent from the order for reference and from the judgment at first instance that the reduction in the amount of the remuneration in question results from the application, to employees affected by a transfer of activities from a legal person governed by private law to a legal person governed by public law, of mandatory national rules governing the situation of state employees. In other words, according to the interpretation that the national court has placed on its domestic law, the state, as new employer, is required to set the remuneration of the employees affected by the transfer at a lower amount than that provided for in the contracts of employment governed by private law which these employees had with their former employer<sup>25</sup>.

47. Secondly, in my opinion, such an obligation to reduce the amount of remuneration constitutes a substantial change in working conditions to the detriment of the employees, within the meaning of art 4(2) of the directive.

48. It must be recognised that remuneration is an essential condition of the contract of employment<sup>26</sup>. In my opinion, it follows that the obligation, laid down by national law, to reduce the amount of remuneration of the employees affected by the transfer in question constitutes, by its nature, a substantial change in working conditions to the detriment of these employees. It must be categorised as such, whatever the size of the reduction at issue<sup>27</sup>. Admitting the opposite entails a risk of giving rise to numerous proceedings and of national courts diverging in their determinations on treatment of the reduction in the amount of the remuneration in question. That prospect would not meet the need to guarantee uniform protection of the rights of employees facing such a reduction.

49. In accordance with this logic, the court, in its judgment of 7 March 1996 in Merckx v Ford Motors Co Belgium SA<sup>28</sup>, held that—

‘a change in the level of remuneration awarded to an employee is a substantial change in working conditions within the meaning of [the

25 This interpretation of national law is disputed by Mrs Boor. According to her, a state employee's contract of employment continues to be covered by private law and therefore falls outside the application of mandatory rules relating to civil servants, in particular in the area of remuneration. I shall not take a view on this question of interpretation of domestic law, which is solely within the competence of the national court.

26 Indeed, the existence of remuneration is necessarily taken into account in defining an employment relationship and the corresponding application of the rules of Community law on freedom of movement for persons. According to settled case law, ‘the essential feature of an employment relationship ... is that for a certain period of time a person performs services for and under the direction of another person in return for which he receives remuneration’ (my emphasis). See, inter alia, Lawrie-Blum v Land Baden-Württemberg Case 66/85 [1986] ECR 2121 (paras 16, 17), Brown v Secretary of State for Scotland Case 197/86 1989 SLT 402, [1988] ECR 3205 (para 21) and Union de Recouvrement des Cotisations de Sécurité Sociale et d'Allocations Familiales de la Savoie (URSSAF) v Hostellerie Le Manoir Sàrl Case C-27/91 [1991] ECR I-5531 (para 7). It follows that there cannot be any employment relationship without remuneration.

27 In my opinion, reduction in the level of remuneration should be distinguished from other changes in working conditions, such as changes in hours or place of work. It is true that, in some cases, such changes may significantly affect the situation of employees and thus may constitute substantial changes in working conditions. This would be the case, in particular, where daytime working was converted to night working or where the place of work was moved to somewhere far from the initial site. However, in other cases, changes in hours or place of work may have little impact on the employees' situation, so that it would be excessive to see them as substantial changes in working conditions. This is why, in my opinion, unlike a reduction in the amount of remuneration, which constitutes by its nature a substantial change in working conditions, changes in hours or place of work should be examined case by case in order to determine whether they actually amount to a substantial change in working conditions.

28 Joined cases C-171/94 and C-172/94 [1996] All ER (EC) 667, [1996] ECR I-1253.

a provisions of art 4(2) of the directive], even where the remuneration depends in particular on the turnover achieved'<sup>29</sup>.

50. In that case, a motor vehicle sales dealer refused, as transferee of the entity being transferred, to guarantee to maintain the level of remuneration which two salesmen had received from the transferor. This remuneration
b depended in particular on the turnover achieved, so that the amount of the remuneration in question was likely to vary significantly. Despite this distinctive feature, the court took the view, generally, that any change in the level of remuneration constitutes a substantial change in working conditions.

51. This rule in Merckx's case cannot be disregarded on the ground that, unlike the situation in that case, Mrs Boor, upon the transfer, acquired the c status of public sector employee, which confers (as the referring court pointed out in the question it referred for a preliminary ruling) legal benefits in the areas of, inter alia, career development and job stability.

52. In my opinion, since the reduction in the amount of remuneration constitutes by its nature a substantial change in working conditions, it matters
d little whether this reduction is likely to be offset, wholly or partly, by the conferring of benefits<sup>30</sup>.

53. It follows from all these considerations that what holds good, according to Mayeur's case, for any obligation, laid down by national law, to terminate e private law contracts of employment when an economic entity is transferred to a legal person governed by public law applies equally to any obligation, laid down by national law, to reduce in these circumstances the amount of remuneration provided for by private law contracts of employment, as is the case in the main proceedings.

54. Based on the analysis of Mayeur's case and Merckx's case, I take the view that art 3(1) of the directive does not preclude the reduction in the amount f of the remuneration at issue, but that any termination of the contract of employment on this ground should be regarded as resulting from the action of the employer, in accordance with art 4(2) of the directive. Thus, contrary to Mrs Boor's claim, continued observance of the working conditions existing at the date of the transfer does not amount to an absolute or sacrosanct principle.

55. This interpretation of the directive reflects the Community legislature's concern to reconcile the different opposing interests: those of the new g employer, who should be in a position to make the adjustments and adaptations necessary to the running of the economic entity transferred, and those of the employees affected by the transfer, whose interests should be maintained as far as possible.

56. Consequently, the answer to this question referred for a preliminary h ruling should be that art 3(1) of the directive must be interpreted as not precluding, where the transfer of an undertaking involves the state taking over activities previously carried on by a non-profit-making association (legal person governed by private law), the state, as new employer, from making a reduction,

29 See para 38.

i 30 This view can be likened to the method adopted by the court to ascertain whether the principle of equal pay for male and female workers is being observed. In Barber v Guardian Royal Exchange Assurance Group Case C-262/88 [1990] 2 All ER 660, [1990] ECR I-1889 (para 35), the court held that 'the principle of equal pay must be ensured in respect of each element of remuneration and not only on the basis of a comprehensive assessment of the consideration paid to workers'. This analysis is based on the idea that it would be particularly difficult for national courts to assess and compare all the varied forms of consideration paid, in different cases, to male or female workers. See also Jämställthetsombudsmannen v Örebro Läns Landsting Case C-236/98 [2000] ECR I-2189 (para 43).

by reason of the transfer, in the amount of the employees' remuneration, under the national rules in force relating to the status of public employees. However, this reduction in the amount of remuneration constitutes, by its nature, a substantial change in working conditions to the detriment of the employees affected by the transfer, so that the termination of their contract of employment must be regarded as resulting from the action of the employer, in accordance with the provisions of art 4(2) of the directive.

V—CONCLUSION

57. Having regard to all these considerations, I propose that the Court of Justice give the following answer to the question referred by the Cour Administrative for a preliminary ruling:

'Article 3(1) of Council Directive 77/187/EEC of 14 February 1977 on the approximation of the laws of the Member States relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of businesses must be interpreted as not precluding, where the transfer of an undertaking involves the State taking over activities previously carried on by a non-profit-making association (legal person governed by private law), the State, as new employer, from making a reduction, by reason of the transfer, in the amount of the employees' remuneration, under the national rules in force relating to the status of public employees. However, this reduction in the amount of remuneration constitutes, by its nature, a substantial change in working conditions to the detriment of the employees affected by the transfer, so that the termination of their contract of employment must be regarded as resulting from the action of the employer, in accordance with Article 4(2) of Directive 77/187.'

11 November 2004. The COURT OF JUSTICE (Second Chamber) delivered the following judgment.

1. This reference for a preliminary ruling concerns essentially the interpretation of Council Directive (EEC) 77/187 (on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of businesses) (OJ 1977 L61 p 26).

2. The reference was made in the course of proceedings between Mrs Boor, née Delahaye, and the Minister for Public Service and Administrative Reform concerning the minister's refusal to maintain the remuneration under the contract of employment originally concluded between Mrs Boor and Foprogest ASBL (association sans but lucratif, non-profit-making association) (Foprogest), a legal person governed by private law, after the latter's undertaking had been transferred to the Luxembourg state.

LEGAL BACKGROUND

Community legislation

3. Article 1(1) of Directive 77/187 provides:

'This Directive shall apply to the transfer of an undertaking, business or part of a business to another employer as a result of a legal transfer or merger.'

4. Article 2 of that directive provides:

- a* 'For the purposes of this Directive ...
(b) "transferee" means any natural or legal person who, by reason of a transfer within the meaning of Article 1(1), becomes the employer in respect of the undertaking, business or part of the business ...'
- b* 5. Article 3(1) and (2) of the directive states:
- c* '1. The transferor's rights and obligations arising from a contract of employment or from an employment relationship existing on the date of a transfer within the meaning of Article 1(1) shall, by reason of such transfer, be transferred to the transferee ...
2. Following the transfer within the meaning of Article 1(1), the transferee shall continue to observe the terms and conditions agreed in any collective agreement on the same terms applicable to the transferor under that agreement, until the date of termination or expiry of the collective agreement or the entry into force or application of another collective agreement.
- d* Member States may limit the period for observing such terms and conditions, with the proviso that it shall not be less than one year.'
6. Article 4 of the directive reads as follows:
- e* '1. The transfer of an undertaking, business or part of a business shall not in itself constitute grounds for dismissal by the transferor or the transferee. This provision shall not stand in the way of dismissals that may take place for economic, technical or organizational reasons entailing changes in the workforce ...
2. If the contract of employment or the employment relationship is terminated because the transfer within the meaning of Article 1(1) involves a substantial change in working conditions to the detriment of the employee, the employer shall be regarded as having been responsible for termination of the contract of employment or of the employment relationship.'
- f*
7. Directive 77/187 was amended by Council Directive (EC) 98/50 (OJ 1998 L201 p 88), which, under art 2 of that directive, was to be transposed by 17 July 2001.
- g*
8. Council Directive (EC) 2001/23 (on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of undertakings or businesses) (OJ 2001 L82 p 16) codified Directive 77/187, taking into account the amendments made to it by Directive 98/50.
- h*

National legislation

- i* 9. Article 36 of the Loi du 24 mai 1989 sur le contrat de travail (Law of 24 May 1989 on contracts of employment, Mémorial A 1989, p 611; the Law of 24 May 1989) prescribes:

'1. If any change arises in the legal situation of the employer, in particular by reason of succession, sale, merger, transformation of business assets or incorporation, all contracts of employment in force on the date of that change shall continue to exist between the new employer and the employees of the undertaking.

2. A transfer of the undertaking as a result inter alia of a legal transfer or merger shall not in itself constitute grounds for dismissal by the transferor or the transferee. a

If the contract of employment is terminated because the transfer involves a substantial change in working conditions to the detriment of the employee, the employer shall be regarded as having been responsible for termination of the contract of employment ...' b

10. Article 37 of that law provides:

'Any change to the detriment of the employee relating to an essential term of the contract of employment must, in order not to be void, be notified to the employees in the forms and within the time-limits referred to in Article 19 and 20 and must state the date from which it takes effect. In such a case the employee may ask the employer for the reasons for the change and the employer is obliged to state those reasons in the forms and within the time-limits laid down in Article 22 ...' c

A termination of the contract of employment following from the employee's refusal to accept the change notified to him shall constitute a dismissal against which the legal proceedings referred to in Article 28 may be brought.' d

11. The conditions and amounts of the remuneration of employees of the Luxembourg state are fixed by Grand-Ducal regulation. e

THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS

12. Mrs Boor, née Delahaye, was an employee of Foprogest. There was no collective agreement governing her remuneration.

13. Foprogest's objects consisted in particular of promoting and implementing training activities intended to improve the social and occupational position of persons seeking work and unemployed persons in order to enable them to be integrated or reintegrated into the workforce. Its resources consisted essentially of grants, donations and legacies. f

14. Foprogest's activity was transferred to the Luxembourg state, namely the Minister for National Education, Vocational Training and Sport. The activity thus taken over is now carried on in the form of an administrative public service. g

15. With effect from 1 January 2000, Mrs Boor was taken on as an employee of the Luxembourg state. Other workers who had previously been employed by Foprogest were also taken on by the state. That operation gave rise to the conclusion of new contracts of employment between the state and the employees concerned. It was in those circumstances that Mrs Boor on 22 December 1999 concluded a contract for an indefinite period with the minister concerned. h

16. By virtue of the Grand-Ducal regulation on the remuneration of state employees, Mrs Boor was then allocated a lower remuneration than that she had received under the contract originally concluded with Foprogest.

17. She submitted at the hearing, without being contradicted by the Luxembourg government, that she had been classified by the Luxembourg state, with no allowance for length of service, in the first grade, last step, of the salary scale, which meant that she lost 37% of her monthly salary. i

18. The parties to the main proceedings disagree essentially on whether the state is obliged, after the transfer in question, to maintain all the rights of

- a the employees, including in particular the right to remuneration, deriving from the contract of employment concluded between them and the transferor association.

THE QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

- b 19. The national court states that the parties agree that there was a transfer of an undertaking within the meaning of art 36 of the Law of 24 May 1989, a view which that court also shares.

- c 20. The national court expressly rejects the argument put forward by the defendant in the main proceedings that the classification of the activity in question as economic could legitimately be contested, since it is an activity for countering unemployment which may fall within the exercise of public power. In this respect the national court refers to the judgments of the Court of Justice of the European Communities in Dr Sophie Redmond Stichting v Bartol Case C-29/91 [1992] ECR I-3189 (concerning assistance to drug addicts), Sánchez Hidalgo v Asociación de Servicios Aser, Ziemann v Ziemann Sicherheit GmbH Joined cases C-173/96 and C-247/96 [1999] IRLR 136, [1998] ECR I-8237 (concerning home help) and Mayeur v Association Promotion de l'Information Messine (APIM) Case C-175/99 [2000] IRLR 783, [2000] ECR I-7755.

- d 21. On the basis of that case law, the national court accepts that in the case at issue in the main proceedings there was a transfer of an undertaking within the meaning of the Community legislation.

- e 22. According to that court, having regard to the subject matter of the case as it now stands on appeal, the question should first be examined whether art 36 of the Law of 24 May 1989, which must be applied in the light of the Community provisions and in particular Directives 77/187 and 98/50 taken over in Directive 2001/23, allows the transfer of the rights and obligations of the employees to take place, in the case of a transfer to the public sector, only 'subject to compatibility with existing rules of public law', as the judgment under appeal put it. In other words, it must be determined whether the state as transferee may substitute the rules on compensation applicable to its own employees for the terms laid down by the previous contract of employment.

- f 23. The national court observes, first, that the Community legislation provides, in principle, that in the event of a transfer of an undertaking the rights and obligations of the transferor—in this case Foprogest—are transferred to the transferee—in this case the Luxembourg state—by reason of the transfer. Moreover, art 36 of the Law of 24 May 1989 provides that in such cases all contracts of employment in force continue to exist between the new employer and the employees of the undertaking.

- g 24. It notes, second, that art 4(2) of Directive 77/187, reproduced word for word in the second subparagraph of art 36(2) of the Law of 24 May 1989, provides that, if the contract of employment or the employment relationship is terminated because the transfer involves a substantial change in working conditions to the detriment of the employee, the employer is to be regarded as having been responsible for termination of the contract of employment.

- h 25. It considers that, although their context is the termination of the employment relationship, the provisions of art 4(2) of that directive none the less necessarily imply that there is a possibility of changing the employees' situation by reason of the transfer.

- i 26. It says that the question therefore remains whether the transferee, the Luxembourg state, may, to comply with its own domestic rules of public law, impose on employees taken over on a transfer a restructuring of their remuneration situation which could, in certain cases, lead to a procedure for termination of the employment relationship at the employee's initiative on the conditions laid down in art 4(2) of Directive 77/187, or whether, on the contrary, the principle that the contract continues to exist requires the state to maintain, disregarding its own legislation, the remuneration under the original contract.

27. Those were the circumstances in which the Cour Administrative (Administrative Court) decided to stay the proceedings and refer the following question to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling:

'Having regard to the provisions of Directives 77/187/EEC, 98/50/EC and 2001/23/EC identified herein, in the event of the transfer of an undertaking from a non-profit-making association, which is a legal person under private law, to the State as transferee, is it permissible for the transferor's rights and obligations to be taken over only in so far as they are compatible with the State's own rules of public law, in particular in the field of remuneration, where the detailed provisions and amounts of compensation are laid down by Grand-Ducal regulation, bearing in mind that the status of public sector employee confers legal benefits in the fields of, inter alia, career development and job stability on the employees concerned, and that, in the event of disagreement as regards "substantial changes" to the employment relationship within the meaning of Article 4(2) of those directives, the employees concerned retain the right to request termination of that relationship according to the detailed rules in the relevant provisions?'

THE QUESTION REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

28. For the reasons set out by Advocate General Léger in para 27 of his opinion, Directives 98/50 and 2001/23 do not apply to the dispute in the main proceedings. Consequently, only Directive 77/187 needs to be interpreted.

29. By its question the national court essentially seeks to know whether that directive precludes, in the event of a transfer of an undertaking from a legal person governed by private law to the state, the latter, as new employer, from reducing the amount of the remuneration of the employees concerned for the purpose of complying with the national rules in force for public employees.

30. It should be recalled that, according to the court's case law, the transfer of an economic activity from a legal person governed by private law to a legal person governed by public law is in principle within the scope of Directive 77/187. Only the reorganisation of structures of the public administration or the transfer of administrative functions between public administrative authorities is excluded from that scope (see Henke v Gemeinde Schierke Case C-298/94 [1997] All ER (EC) 173, [1996] ECR I-4989 (para 14) and Mayeur's case (paras 29–34)).

31. Under art 3(1) of Directive 77/187, the transferor's rights and obligations under the contract of employment or employment relationship are transferred to the transferee by reason of that transfer.

32. Since the directive is intended to achieve only partial harmonisation of the field in question (see, inter alia, Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark v Daddy's Dance Hall A/S Case 324/86 [1988] IRLR 315, [1988] ECR 739 (para 16) and Martin v South Bank University Case C-4/01 [2004] IRLR 74 (para 41)), it does not preclude, in the event of a transfer of an activity to a legal person

- a governed by public law, the application of national law which prescribes the termination of contracts of employment governed by private law (see, to that effect, Mayeur's case (para 56)). However, such a termination constitutes, in accordance with art 4(2) of the directive, a substantial change in working conditions to the detriment of the employee resulting directly from the transfer, so that the termination of those contracts of employment must, in such circumstances, be regarded as resulting from the action of the employer (see Mayeur's case (para 56)).

b 33. The same must apply where, as in the case at issue in the main proceedings, application of the national rules governing the position of state employees entails a reduction in the remuneration of the employees concerned by the transfer. Such a reduction must, if it is substantial, be regarded as a substantial change in working conditions to the detriment of the employees in question, within the meaning of art 4(2) of the directive.

c 34. Moreover, the competent authorities responsible for applying and interpreting the national law relating to public employees are obliged to do so as far as possible in the light of the purpose of the directive. It would be contrary to the spirit of that directive to treat an employee taken over from the transferor without taking length of service into account, in so far as the national rules governing the position of state employees take a state employee's length of service into consideration for calculating his remuneration.

d 35. Consequently, the answer to the national court's question must be that the directive must be interpreted as not precluding in principle, in the event of a transfer of an undertaking from a legal person governed by private law to the state, the latter, as new employer, from reducing the amount of the remuneration of the employees concerned for the purpose of complying with the national rules in force for public employees. However, the competent authorities responsible for applying and interpreting those rules are obliged to do so as far as possible in the light of the purpose of that directive, taking into account in particular the employee's length of service, in so far as the national rules governing the position of state employees take a state employee's length of service into consideration for calculating his remuneration. If such a calculation leads to a substantial reduction in the employee's remuneration, such a reduction constitutes a substantial change in working conditions to the detriment of the employees concerned by the transfer, so that the termination of their contracts of employment for that reason must be regarded as resulting from the action of the employer, in accordance with art 4(2) of the directive.

COSTS

- e f g h 36. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable.

i On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Second Chamber) rules as follows:
Council Directive (EEC) 77/187 (on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of businesses) must be interpreted as not precluding in principle, in the event of a transfer of an undertaking from a legal person governed by private law to the state, the latter, as new employer, from reducing the amount of the remuneration of the employees concerned for the purpose of complying with the national rules in force for public employees. However, the competent authorities responsible for applying and interpreting those rules are obliged to do so as far as possible in the light of the purpose of that directive, taking into account in particular the employee's length of service, in so far as the national rules governing the position of state employees take a state employee's length of service into consideration for calculating his remuneration. If such a calculation leads to a substantial reduction in the employee's remuneration, such a reduction constitutes a substantial change in working conditions to the detriment of the employees concerned by the transfer, so that the termination of their contracts of employment for that reason must be regarded as resulting from the action of the employer, in accordance with art 4(2) of Directive 77/187.

Grossmann Air Service,
Bedarfsluftfahrtunternehmen GmbH
& Co KG v Austria

(Case C-230/02)

COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (SIXTH CHAMBER)

JUDGES SKOURIS (ACTING AS THE PRESIDENT OF THE SIXTH CHAMBER), GULMANN, CUNHA RODRIGUES, PUISOCHET AND SCHINTGEN (RAPPORTEUR)

ADVOCATE GENERAL GEELHOED

10 SEPTEMBER, 16 OCTOBER 2003, 12 FEBRUARY 2004

European Community – Public procurement – Review procedures applicable to public contracts – Access to review procedures – Undertaking not submitting a tender for contract – Undertaking claiming invitation to tender discriminatory – Whether non-participation in award procedure precluding right of access to review procedures – Whether failure to refer case to conciliation committee precluding undertaking from having an interest in contract – Council Directive (EEC) 89/665, arts 1(3), 2(1)(b).

The Austrian Federal Ministry of Finance had invited tenders for the provision of non-scheduled passenger transport air services for the federal government and its delegations. The company submitted a tender. The Ministry subsequently annulled its invitation pursuant to para 55(2) of the 1997 Federal Law on Public Procurement and issued another invitation to tender. Although the company obtained the relevant documents, it did not submit an offer. The Federal Law provided, inter alia, that until a contract had been awarded the Federal Public Procurement Review Commission was competent to reconcile any difference of opinion between the awarding body and candidates. The company was later notified of the award of the contract to another company. It applied to have the decision to award the contract set aside on the ground that the invitation had been tailored to one tenderer, namely the successful company. The Federal Public Procurement Office dismissed that application on the basis that the company had failed to assert its legal interest in obtaining the entire contract; and, moreover, that as the contract had been awarded the office did not have the competence to set it aside. In respect of the absence of a legal interest, the office found that the company had not been able to provide all of the services required, as it did not have large aircraft. On appeal, the Constitutional Court ruled that the office had wrongly failed to refer a question to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling as to whether its interpretation of para 115(1) of the Federal Law was in accordance with Community law. A question therefore arose as to whether the company could establish an interest in bringing proceedings in accordance with art 1(3)<sup>a</sup> of Council Directive (EEC) 89/665 (on the co-ordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts); since, as the company was not in a position to provide the services in question, owing, it claimed, to provisions in the documents relating to the invitation which were discriminatory within the meaning of art 2(1)<sup>b</sup>, it had not submitted a tender. In those circumstances the proceedings were stayed and three questions relating to the interpretation of arts 1(3) and 2(1) were referred to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling. a

<sup>a</sup> Article 1(3), so far as material, is set out at judgment para 3, below

Held – (1) Articles 1(3) and 2(1)(b) had to be interpreted as not precluding a person from being regarded, once a public contract had been awarded, as having lost his right of access to the review procedures provided for by the directive if he had not participated in the award procedure for that contract on the ground that he was not in a position to supply all the services for which bids were invited, because there were allegedly discriminatory specifications in the documents relating to the invitation to tender, but he did not seek review of those specifications before the contract was awarded. Participation in the award procedure could, in principle, validly constitute a condition which had to be fulfilled before the person concerned could show an interest in obtaining the contract at issue or that he risked suffering harm as a result of the allegedly unlawful nature of the decision to award that contract. However, where an undertaking had not submitted a tender because there were allegedly discriminatory specifications in the documents relating to the invitation or the contract which prevented it from being in a position to provide all the services requested, it would be entitled to seek review of those specifications directly, even before the procedure for awarding the contract concerned had been terminated. It was clear from the wording of art 2(1)(b) that review procedures had to set aside decisions taken unlawfully, including the removal of discriminatory technical, economic or financial specifications. It therefore had to be possible for an undertaking to seek review of such discriminatory specifications directly, without waiting for the contract award procedure to be terminated. The fact that a person did not seek review of a decision determining the specifications of an invitation to tender which in his view discriminated against him, but awaited notification of the decision awarding the contract and then challenged it before the responsible body, on the ground that the specifications were discriminatory, was not in keeping with the objectives of speed and effectiveness of the directive. In those circumstances a refusal to acknowledge the interest in obtaining the contract in question and therefore the right of access to the review procedures did not impair the effectiveness of that directive (see judgment paras 27, 28, 30, 37, 39, 40, below). b
c
d
e
f
g

(2) Article 1(3) had to be interpreted as precluding a person who had participated in a contract award procedure from being regarded as having lost his interest in obtaining the contract on the ground that, before seeking the review provided for by the directive, he failed to refer the case to a conciliation committee such as the commission. Article 1(3) did not authorise the member states to give the term ‘interest in obtaining a ... public ... contract’ an interpretation which might limit the effectiveness of the directive. The fact that access to the review procedures provided for by the directive was made subject to prior referral to a conciliation committee such as the commission was contrary to the objectives of speed and effectiveness of that directive (see judgment paras 42, 43, below). h
i

Notes

For procedures for awarding public works contracts and public supply contracts, see 51 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) paras 11.78, 11.87.

<sup>b</sup> Article 2(1), so far as material, is set out at judgment para 4, below

a Cases cited

Alcatel Austria AG v Bundesministerium für Wissenschaft und Verkehr Case C-81/98 [1999] ECR I-7671, ECJ.

Fritsch, Chiari & Partner, Ziviltechniker GmbH v Autobahnen- und Schnellstraßen-Finanzierungs-AG (Asfinag) Case C-410/01 [2003] ECR I-6413, ECJ.

b Hackermüller v WED Bundesimmobiliengesellschaft mbH (BIG) and Wiener Entwicklungsgesellschaft mbH für den Donaauraum AG (WED) Case C-249/01 [2003] ECR I-6319, ECJ.

Hospital Ingenieure Krankenhaustechnik Planungs-Gesellschaft mbH (HI) v Stadt Wien Case C-92/00 [2002] ECR I-5553, ECJ.

Universale-Bau AG v Entsorgungsbetriebe Simmering GesmbH Case C-470/99 [2002]

c ECR I-11617, ECJ.Reference

By order of 14 May 2002, the Bundesvergabeamt (Federal Public Procurement Office) referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) three questions (set out at judgment para 22, below) on the interpretation of arts 1(3) and 2(1)(b) of Council Directive (EEC) 89/665 (on the co-ordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts), as amended by Council Directive (EEC) 92/50 (relating to the co-ordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts). Those questions were raised in a dispute between Grossmann Air Service, Bedarfsluftfahrtunternehmen GmbH & Co KG (Grossmann) and the Republic of Austria, represented by the Federal Ministry of Finance, concerning an award procedure for a public contract. Written observations were submitted on behalf of: Grossmann by P Schmutzer, Rechtsanwalt; the Austrian government by M Fruhmann, acting as agent; the Commission of the European Communities by K Wiedner, acting as agent. Oral observations were made on behalf of: Grossmann, represented by P Schmutzer; the Austrian government, represented by M Winkler, acting as agent; and the Commission, represented by J C Schieferer, acting as agent. The language of the case was German. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General.

16 October 2003. The Advocate General (LA Geelhoed) delivered the following opinion<sup>1</sup>.

I—INTRODUCTION*h 1. In this case the Austrian Bundesvergabeamt (Federal Public Procurement Office) has submitted for a preliminary ruling certain questions concerning the interpretation of Council Directive (EEC) 89/665 (on the co-ordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts)<sup>2</sup>, as amended by Council Directive (EEC) 92/50 (relating to the co-ordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts)<sup>3</sup> (Directive 89/665).i

1 Original language: Dutch.

2 OJ 1989 L395 p 33.

3 OJ 1992 L209 p 1.

2. These questions have arisen in a dispute between Grossmann Air Service, a Bedarfsluftfahrtunternehmen GmbH & Co KG (Grossmann) and the Republic of Austria.

II—LEGAL BACKGROUND

A—Community law b

3. Article 1(1) and (3) of Directive 89/665 provides:

‘1. The Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that, as regards contract award procedures falling within the scope of Directives 71/305/EEC, 77/62/EEC, and 92/50/EEC, decisions taken by the contracting authorities may be reviewed effectively and, in particular, as c rapidly as possible in accordance with the conditions set out in the following Articles and, in particular, Article 2(7) on the grounds that such decisions have infringed Community law in the field of public procurement or national rules implementing that law ...

3. The Member States shall ensure that the review procedures are d available, under detailed rules which the Member States may establish, at least to any person having or having had an interest in obtaining a particular public supply or public works contract and who has been or risks being harmed by an alleged infringement. In particular, the Member States may require that the person seeking the review must have previously notified the contracting authority of the alleged infringement and of his e intention to seek review.’

4. Article 2(1)(b) of Directive 89/665 provides:

‘1. The Member States shall ensure that the measures taken concerning the review procedures specified in Article 1 include provision for the powers to ...

(b) either set aside or ensure the setting aside of decisions taken f unlawfully, including the removal of discriminatory technical, economic or financial specifications in the invitation to tender, the contract documents or in any other document relating to the contract award procedure ...’

B—National law g

5. Directive 89/665 was transposed into Austrian law by the Bundesgesetz über die Vergabe von Aufträgen (Bundesvergabegesetz) 1997 (1997 Federal Public Procurement Law, BGBl I, 1997/56; the BVergG). The BVergG provides for the creation of a Bundes-Vergabekontrollkommission (Federal Public Procurement Review Commission; the B-VKK) and of a Bundesvergabeamt h (Federal Public Procurement Office).

6. Under para 109 of the BVergG, the B-VKK is to be competent, until such time as the contract is awarded, to reconcile any differences of opinion between the awarding body and one or more candidates or tenderers concerning the application of this law or its implementing regulations (sub-para (1)). A request for the B-VKK to take action must be submitted to the i directors of the B-VKK as soon as possible after the difference of opinion comes to light (sub-para (6)). Furthermore, the awarding body may not award the contract until four weeks after it has been informed of the request to take action, failing which the tendering procedure is to be declared void (sub-para (8)).

a 7. Under para 113 of the BVergG, the Bundesvergabeamt is responsible on application for carrying out a review procedure (sub-para (1)). To preclude infringements of this Federal Law and of the regulations implementing it, the Bundesvergabeamt is authorised until the time of the award to adopt interim measures and to set aside unlawful decisions of the contracting authority (sub-para (2)). After the award of the contract or the close of the contract b award procedure, the Bundesvergabeamt is competent to determine whether, on grounds of infringement of this law or of any regulations issued under it, the contract has not been awarded to the best tenderer (sub-para (3)).

c 8. Paragraph 115(1) of the BVergG provides that where a trader claims to have an interest in the conclusion of a contract within the scope of this law, it may apply for the contracting authority's decision in the contract award procedure to be reviewed on the ground of unlawfulness, provided that it has been or risks being harmed by the alleged infringement.

III—FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

d 9. On 27 January 1998 the Federal Ministry for Finances (the Ministry) invited bids in respect of the provision for the Austrian federal government and its delegations of non-scheduled passenger transport services by air in jet and propeller aircraft. Grossmann subsequently submitted a bid.

e 10. However, on 3 April 1998 the contract award procedure was discontinued. On 28 July 1998 bids were once again invited for these transport services. Although Grossmann requested the relevant tender documents, it did not submit a further bid.

f 11. By letter of 8 October 1998 the Austrian government informed Grossmann of its intention to award the contract to Lauda Air Luftfahrt AG (Lauda Air). This letter was received by Grossmann on 9 October 1998. The contract with Lauda was entered into on 29 October 1998.

g 12. By an application dated 19 October 1998, which was posted on 23 October 1998 and received by the Bundesvergabeamt on 27 October 1998, Grossmann applied for review of the decision of the contracting authority to award the air services to Lauda Air and claimed that the decision should be set aside. It submitted that the invitation to tender had from the beginning been 'tailored' to one bidder, namely Lauda Air, and that the other candidates had had no chance of winning the contract from the outset.

h 13. By decision dated 4 January 1999 the Bundesvergabeamt dismissed that application under para 115(1) and para 113(2) and (3) of the BVergG.

i 14. The Bundesvergabeamt took the view that Grossmann had failed to demonstrate adequately its interest in respect of the totality of the contract. It did not have available to it the requisite larger types of aircraft and was therefore unable to provide all the services requested. Moreover, it had not submitted a bid in the second invitation to tender. Furthermore, once the contract had been awarded the Bundesvergabeamt was no longer competent to annul it.

15. Grossmann subsequently brought a complaint against that decision before the Verfassungsgerichtshof (Constitutional Court). By decision of 10 December 2001 (B 405/99–9) the Verfassungsgerichtshof set aside the decision of the Bundesvergabeamt on grounds of a breach of the constitutionally guaranteed right to proceedings before the ordinary courts. The Verfassungsgerichtshof also ruled that the mere fact that the alleged unlawfulness of the invitation to tender was not raised by Grossmann at an earlier stage of the contract award procedure was not necessarily sufficient to find that there was no legal interest in the review procedure. a

16. The Bundesvergabeamt subsequently submitted the following questions for a preliminary ruling.

Questions submitted for a preliminary ruling

(1) Is Article 1(3) of ... Directive 89/665 ... to be interpreted as meaning that the review procedure must be available to any undertaking which has submitted a bid, or applied to participate, in a public procurement procedure? b

In the event that the answer to Question (1) is no:

(2) Is the abovementioned provision to be understood as meaning that an undertaking only has or had an interest in a particular public contract if—in addition to its participating in the public procurement procedure—it takes all steps available to it under national law to prevent the contract from being awarded to another bidder? c

(3) Is Article 1(3) of Directive 89/665, in conjunction with Article 2(1) thereof, to be interpreted as meaning that an undertaking must be afforded the opportunity in law to seek review of an award procedure regarded by it as unlawful or discriminatory even where it is not capable of performing the totality of the services for which bids were invited and, for that reason, did not submit a bid in that award procedure.' d

Explanation of the questions submitted for a preliminary ruling

17. In respect of the first two questions submitted the national court has observed that Grossmann allowed a period of 14 days to elapse between notification of the decision concerning the award (9 October 1998) and lodgment of its application for review with the Bundesvergabeamt (23 October 1998) without requesting the B-VKK to take action and thus to make the four-week period laid down in para 109(8) of the BVergG start to run or, in the event that such action were unsuccessful, to request that the Bundesvergabeamt adopt interim measures and set aside the decision concerning the award. Therefore, the national court considers that it is important to establish whether the application requirements under para 115(1) of the BVergG, in conjunction with para 109(1), (6) and (8) thereof, are, when interpreted in the light of art 1(3) of Directive 89/665, to be understood as meaning that any bidder who wishes to be awarded a particular pending public contract has an interest in the conclusion of a contract falling within the scope of the BVergG simply by virtue of that fact or that the fact that not all remedies available in national law have been exhausted means that this interest has been lost. e

18. In respect of the third question the Bundesvergabeamt observes that it is clear from the Verfassungsgerichtshof's decision of 10 December 2001 that it considers that discriminatory specifications may be removed in review procedures pursuant to art 2(1)(b) of Directive 89/665. An interpretation whereby the availability of review procedures to challenge discriminatory tender specifications is subject to the applicant's ability to satisfy those specifications could run counter to the objective (of Community law) to ensure complete and effective protection in respect of invitations to tender. Therefore, an undertaking providing air services which credibly demonstrates an interest in the conclusion of a contract for air services and regards itself as f

- a discriminated against by the form in which those air services are put out to tender—as an all-in contract—has a legal interest within the meaning of para 115(1) of the BVerGG and is thus entitled to seek review of the allegedly unlawful specifications because it would otherwise be unable to prove the unlawfulness—in its view—of the invitation to tender and any harm that it may have suffered as a result.
- b 19. Against that background, the question arises as to whether review procedures within the meaning of art 1(3) of Directive 89/665 are also available to a trader where it applies to the review body because of specifications which it considers to be discriminatory within the meaning of art 2(1)(b) of Directive 89/665 and claims that it has been or risks being harmed as a result, even though it is unable to provide the service in the form set out in the invitation to tender and therefore did not submit a bid in that contract award procedure.
- c

Procedure before the Court of Justice of the European Communities

- d 20. The order for reference was lodged at the Registry of the Court of Justice on 20 June 2002. Written observations were submitted by Grossmann, the Austrian government and the Commission of the European Communities. They provided further clarification of their view at the hearing on 10 September 2003.

IV—APPRAISAL

- e 21. In view of the recent case law of the court the first two questions need not be dealt with in any great detail. These questions essentially seek to ascertain whether a trader having or having had an interest in obtaining a contract for the purposes of art 1(3) of Directive 89/665 may therefore avail himself of the review procedures provided for in that directive to have a decision concerning an award declared unlawful, even though not all the remedies available under national law have been exhausted, in order to prevent the contract being awarded to a third party.
- f

- g 22. These questions were raised recently inter alia in Hackermüller v WED Bundesimmobiliengesellschaft mbH (BIG) and Wiener Entwicklungsgesellschaft mbH für den Donaauraum AG (WED)<sup>4</sup> and more particularly in Fritsch, Chiari & Partner, Ziviltechniker GmbH v Autobahnen- und Schnellstraßen-Finanzierungs-AG (Asfinag)<sup>5</sup>.

- h 23. Both cases raised the question whether any trader who wishes to be considered for the award of a public contract may institute review procedures pursuant to art 1(3) of Directive 89/665. It is evident from Hackermüller's case that this is not so and that a member state may lay down the additional requirement that the person concerned has been or risks being harmed by the infringement he alleges.

- i 24. The second question is answered explicitly in the Fritsch case. This case also raised the question whether the national legislature can make a tenderer's interest in obtaining a specific contract, and therefore its right to institute the review procedures established by that directive, subject to the condition that it has beforehand applied to a conciliation commission such as the B-VKK. The court's answer to this question was in the negative. It held that such a condition is contrary to the directive's objective of speed and effectiveness. However, it acknowledged that art 1(3) of Directive 89/665 expressly allows member states to determine the detailed rules according to which they must make the review procedures available to any person having or having had an interest in obtaining a particular public contract and who has been or risks being harmed by an alleged infringement, but that did not mean that they may give the term 'interest in obtaining a public contract' an interpretation which may limit the effectiveness of that directive. That is the case where a trader is considered as having lost its interest on the ground that it failed first to apply to a conciliation commission, such as the B-VKK.

4 Case C-249/01 [2003] ECR I-6319.

5 Case C-410/01 [2003] ECR I-6413.

25. In the above-mentioned cases the candidates participated in the contract award procedure. It is evident from the order for reference that this is not so in the present case. However, I concur with the Commission's view that participation in the award procedure is in principle a precondition for demonstrating an interest in obtaining a contract and possible harm caused by the allegedly unlawful award. It is difficult for a person who has not participated in the award procedure to maintain that he has an interest in challenging an allegedly unlawful decision concerning an award.

26. The third question, however, relates to a somewhat different situation. In that case it does not make sense for potential candidates to tender for a contract because the specifications for the services to be provided are laid down in such a way that they are unable to satisfy them from the outset. The question is then whether, in such a situation, the opportunity must be left open to apply for review of discriminatory specifications.

27. In my view, the answer to the question should be in the affirmative. In its recent case law the court has placed a broad interpretation on the words 'decisions taken by the contracting authorities' used in art 1(1) of Directive 89/665<sup>6</sup>. Moreover, it is clear from the wording of art 2(1)(b) of the directive that the courts' powers in review procedures must include inter alia the power to 'set aside ... decisions taken unlawfully, including the removal of discriminatory technical, economic or financial specifications'. Therefore, it appears to me to be beyond dispute that the remedies intended by Directive 89/665 also extend to the review of decisions specifying the services requested in a contract award procedure.

28. However, such a remedy would have little practical value if it were not open to undertakings which had been excluded from participating in the contract award procedure from the outset by the relevant discriminatory specifications. Furthermore, in such a situation it may be excessive to ask that the effort to bid be made and the associated costs be incurred merely in order to retain the right to apply for review of discriminatory tender conditions. Therefore, these undertakings too must in principle be regarded as having an interest in the award of a public contract and consequently as entitled to apply for review.

29. The specifications for the requested services are relevant to the main proceedings underlying this case. Since the various elements of the requested air transport services had been brought together to create a single package, the number of candidates that could provide the overall package was greatly reduced and potential candidates for one or more parts of that package were excluded from the outset. It follows from what was stated in the preceding paragraph that they too must be regarded as persons having an interest in the a award of the contract and therefore as entitled to apply for review. However, this is subject to the condition that they would have been able to participate in this procedure had it not been for these allegedly discriminatory conditions.

<sup>6</sup> See Hospital Ingenieure Krankenhaustechnik Planungs-Gesellschaft mbH (HI) v Stadt Wien Case C-92/00 [2002] ECR I-5553.

30. Finally, I further note that the interest of legal certainty requires that this opportunity to apply for review be used at the earliest possible stage. The lodgment of an application for review after the contract has been awarded b should be regarded as belated. However, this is a matter for the national court.

V—CONCLUSION

31. In the light of the foregoing, I would recommend that the Court of c Justice answer the questions submitted as follows:

—Article 1(3) of Council Directive (EEC) 89/665 (on the co-ordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts), as amended by Council Directive (EEC) 92/50 (relating to the co-ordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts), is to be interpreted as meaning that the review procedure referred to in the directive is open to any person who has submitted a bid or participated in the contract award procedure.

—Article 1(3) of Directive 89/665 precludes a trader which has participated in a procedure for the award of a contract from being regarded as having lost his interest in the award of that contract on the ground that he did not apply to a conciliation commission, such as the B-VKK established under the Bundesgesetz über die Vergabe von Aufträgen (Bundesvergabegesetz) 1997, before instituting a review procedure as referred to in that directive.

—Article 1(3) of Directive 89/665, in conjunction with art 2(1)(b) thereof, is to be interpreted as meaning that a trader having an interest in the award of a contract must be afforded the opportunity in law directly to seek review of specifications in the tender conditions regarded by it as unlawful or discriminatory. This opportunity must also be open to those who can show that they would have bid for the contract had it not been for the discriminatory specification referred to.

12 February 2004. The COURT OF JUSTICE (Sixth Chamber) delivered the following judgment.

1. By order of 14 May 2002, received at the Registry of the Court of Justice of the European Communities on 20 June 2002, the Bundesvergabeamt
h (Federal Public Procurement Office) referred to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) three questions on the interpretation of arts 1(3) and 2(1)(b) of Council Directive (EEC) 89/665 (on the co-ordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts) (OJ 1989 L395 p 33), as amended by i Council Directive (EEC) 92/50 (relating to the co-ordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts) (OJ 1992 L209 p 1) (Directive 89/665).

2. Those questions were raised in a dispute between Grossmann Air Service, Bedarfsluftfahrtunternehmen GmbH & Co KG (Grossmann) and Republik Österreich (Republic of Austria), represented by the Federal Ministry of Finance (the Ministry), concerning an award procedure for a public contract.

LEGAL BACKGROUND

Community legislation

3. Articles 1(1) and (3) of Directive 89/665 provide:

'1. The Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that, as regards contract award procedures falling within the scope of Directives 71/305/EEC, 77/62/EEC and 92/50/EEC, decisions taken by the contracting authorities may be reviewed effectively and, in particular, as rapidly as possible in accordance with the conditions set out in the following Articles, and, in particular, Article 2(7) on the grounds that such decisions have infringed Community law in the field of public procurement or national rules implementing that law ...

3. The Member States shall ensure that the review procedures are available, under detailed rules which the Member States may establish, at least to any person having or having had an interest in obtaining a particular public supply or public works contract and who has been or risks being harmed by an alleged infringement. In particular, the Member States may require that the person seeking the review must have previously notified the contracting authority of the alleged infringement and of his intention to seek review.'

4. Under art 2(1) of Directive 89/665:

'1. The Member States shall ensure that the measures taken concerning the review procedures specified in Article 1 include provision for the powers to:

(a) take, at the earliest opportunity and by way of interlocutory procedures, interim measures with the aim of correcting the alleged infringement or preventing further damage to the interests concerned, including measures to suspend or to ensure the suspension of the procedure for the award of a public contract or the implementation of any decision taken by the contracting authority;

(b) either set aside or ensure the setting aside of decisions taken unlawfully, including the removal of discriminatory technical, economic or financial specifications in the invitation to tender, the contract documents or in any other document relating to the contract award procedure;

(c) award damages to persons harmed by an infringement.'

National legislation

5. Directive 89/665 was transposed into Austrian law by the Bundesgesetz über die Vergabe von Aufträgen (Bundesvergabegesetz) 1997 (1997 Federal Law on Public Procurement, BGBl I, 1997/56, the BVergG). The BVergG provides for the creation of the Bundes-Vergabekontrollkommission (Federal Public Procurement Review Commission, the B-VKK) and of the Bundesvergabeamt (Federal Public Procurement Office).

6. Paragraph 109 of the BVergG sets out the powers of the B-VKK. It contains the following provisions:

'1. The B-VKK shall be competent:

(1) until such time as the contract is awarded, to reconcile any differences of opinion between the awarding body and one or more candidates or tenderers concerning the application of the present federal law or its implementing regulations ...

- a* 6. A request for the B-VKK to take action made under paragraph 1(1) must be submitted to the directors of the Commission as soon as possible after the difference of opinion comes to light.
7. If the B-VKK does not take action following a request from the awarding body, it must inform that body immediately it does take action.
- b* 8. The awarding body may not award the contract until four weeks after ... it has been informed in accordance with paragraph 7, failing which the tendering procedure shall be declared void ...'
7. Paragraph 113 of the BVerG sets out the powers of the Bundesvergabamt. It provides:
- c* '1. The Bundesvergabamt is responsible on application for carrying out a review procedure in accordance with the following provisions.
2. To preclude infringements of this Federal Law and of the regulations implementing it, the Bundesvergabamt is authorised until the time of the award:
- (1) to adopt interim measures and
- d* (2) to set aside unlawful decisions of the contracting authority.
3. After the award of the contract or the close of the contract award procedure, the Bundesvergabamt is competent to determine whether, on grounds of infringement of this Federal Law or of any regulations issued under it, the contract has not been awarded to the best tenderer ...'
- e* 8. Paragraph 115(1) of the BVerG provides:
- 'Where an undertaking claims to have an interest in the conclusion of a contract within the scope of this Federal Law, it may apply for the contracting authority's decision in the contract award procedure to be reviewed on the ground of unlawfulness, provided that it has been or risks being harmed by the alleged infringement.'
- f*
9. According to para 122(1) of the BVerG—
- 'in the event of a culpable breach of the Federal Law or its implementing rules by the organs of an awarding body, an unsuccessful candidate or tenderer may bring a claim against the contracting authority to which the conduct of the organs of the awarding body is attributable for reimbursement of the costs incurred in drawing up its bid and other costs borne as a result of its participation in the tendering procedure.'
- g*
10. Under para 125(2) of the BVerG, a claim for damages, which must be brought before the civil courts, is admissible only if the Bundesvergabamt has made a declaration under para 113(3) prior to that claim being made. The civil court called upon to hear the claim for damages, and the parties to the proceedings before the Bundesvergabamt, are bound by that declaration.
- h*

THE DISPUTE IN THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTIONS REFERRED TO THE COURT FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

- i* 11. On 27 January 1998, the Ministry invited tenders for the provision 'for the Austrian Federal Government and its delegations of non-scheduled passenger transport services by air in executive jets and aircraft'. Grossmann participated in the award procedure for that contract by submitting a tender.

12. On 3 April 1998, the Ministry decided to annul the first invitation to tender, in accordance with para 55(2) of the BVerG, which provides that the

'invitation to tender may be revoked when, after offers have been rejected pursuant to para 52, only one offer remains'. a

13. On 28 July 1998, the Ministry issued another invitation to tender for non-scheduled passenger transport services by air for the Austrian federal government and its delegations. Grossmann obtained the documents for that invitation to tender, but it did not submit an offer.

14. By letter of 8 October 1998, the Austrian government notified Grossmann of its intention to award the contract to Lauda Air Luftfahrt AG (Lauda Air). Grossmann received that letter on the following day. The contract with Lauda Air was concluded on 29 October 1998. b

15. By application dated 19 October 1998, posted on 23 October and received at the Bundesvergabamt on 27 October 1998, Grossmann applied to have the contracting authority's decision to award the contract to Lauda Air set aside. In support of its application Grossmann claimed essentially that the invitation to tender had been tailored from the beginning to one tenderer, namely Lauda Air. c

16. By decision of 4 January 1999, the Bundesvergabamt dismissed Grossmann's application pursuant to paras 115(1) and 113(2) and (3) of the BVergG, on the ground that Grossmann had failed to assert its legal interest in obtaining the entire contract and that, in any event, after the award of the contract, the Bundesvergabamt no longer has competence to set it aside. d

17. As regards the absence of interest, the Bundesvergabamt found that since it did not have large aircraft available to it, Grossmann was not in a position to provide all the services requested, and that it had not submitted a tender in the second award procedure for the contract at issue. e

18. Grossmann appealed to the Verfassungsgerichtshof (Constitutional Court), Austria seeking to have the Bundesvergabamt's decision set aside. By judgment of 10 December 2001, the Verfassungsgerichtshof set aside that decision for breach of the constitutionally guaranteed right to proceedings before the ordinary courts, on the ground that the Bundesvergabamt had wrongly failed to refer a question to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling relating to whether its interpretation of para 115(1) of the BVergG was in accordance with Community law. f

19. In its order for reference, the Bundesvergabamt explains that the provisions of para 109(1), (6) and (8) of the BVergG are intended to guarantee that no contract will be concluded during the conciliation procedure. It adds that if an amicable agreement is not reached during that procedure an undertaking may still request, before the conclusion of the contract, the annulment of any decision of the contracting authority, including the decision awarding the contract, but subsequently the Bundesvergabamt is competent only to rule that the contract has not been awarded to the tenderer who made the best offer by reason of an infringement of the BVergG or its implementing rules. g

20. The national court points out that, in this case, Grossmann's application to have the decision awarding the contract to Lauda Air set aside, was indeed received before the contract between Lauda Air and the contracting authority was concluded, but that it could be dealt with by the Bundesvergabamt, within the time limit prescribed, only after the conclusion of the contract. The Bundesvergabamt also states that the application was only posted on 23 October 1998, although the contracting authority had notified Grossmann by letter of 8 October 1998, received the following day, of its intention to award the contract to Lauda Air. h

i

a 21. The Bundesvergabeamt thus finds that Grossmann allowed 14 days to elapse between notification to it of the decision awarding the contract (9 October 1998) and the institution by Grossmann of proceedings before the Bundesvergabeamt (23 October 1998), without any request for conciliation being lodged with the B-VKK (a request which would have caused the four-week time limit laid down in para 109(8) of the BVergG, during which
b the contracting authority may not award the contract, to begin to run) or, in the case of a failure of the conciliation process, without the B-VKK being requested to grant interim measures and to set aside the decision awarding the contract. Therefore, according to the national court, the question arises
c whether Grossmann can establish an interest in bringing proceedings, in accordance with art 1(3) of Directive 89/665, since as it was not in a position to provide the services in question, owing, it claims, to provisions in the documents relating to the invitation to tender that are discriminatory within the meaning of art 2(1)(b) of the directive, it did not submit an offer in the contract award procedure at issue.

d 22. It was in those circumstances that the Bundesvergabeamt decided to stay proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

‘(1) Is Article 1(3) of ... Directive 89/665 ... to be interpreted as meaning that the review procedure must be available to any undertaking which has submitted a bid, or applied to participate, in a public procurement procedure?’

e In the event that the answer to Question (1) is no:

(2) Is the abovementioned provision to be understood as meaning that an undertaking only has or had an interest in a particular public contract if—in addition to its participating in the public procurement procedure—it takes all steps available to it under national law to prevent the contract
f from being awarded to another bidder?

(3) Is Article 1(3) of Directive 89/665, in conjunction with Article 2(1) thereof, to be interpreted as meaning that an undertaking must be afforded the opportunity in law to seek review of an award procedure regarded by it as unlawful or discriminatory even where it is not capable of performing the totality of the services for which bids were invited and, for that reason,
g did not submit a bid in that award procedure.’

THE FIRST AND THIRD QUESTIONS

23. In the light of the facts in the main proceedings, as described by the national court, the first and third questions, which it is appropriate to examine h together, must be regarded as asking, essentially, whether arts 1(3) and 2(1)(b) of Directive 89/665 must be interpreted as precluding a person from being regarded, once a public contract has been awarded, as having lost his right of access to the review procedures provided for by the directive if he did not participate in the award procedure for that contract on the ground that he was not in a position to supply all the services for which bids were invited, because i there were allegedly discriminatory specifications in the documents relating to the invitation to tender, but he did not seek review of those specifications before the contract was awarded.

24. In order to assess whether a person in a situation such as that referred to in the questions thus reformulated can establish an interest in bringing proceedings within the meaning of art 1(3) of Directive 89/665, it is appropriate to consider the fact that he neither participated in the contract award procedure at issue nor did he appeal against the invitation to tender before the contract was awarded. a

Failure to participate in the contract award procedure

25. In that regard, it must be recalled that, in accordance with art 1(3) of Directive 89/665, the member states are required to ensure that the review procedures provided for are available 'at least' to any person having or having had an interest in obtaining a particular public contract and who has been or risks being harmed by an alleged infringement of the Community law on public procurement or national rules transposing that law. b

26. It follows that the member states are not obliged to make those review procedures available to any person wishing to obtain a public contract, but may also require that the person concerned has been or risks being harmed by the infringement he alleges (see Hackermüller v WED Bundesimmobiliengesellschaft mbH (BIG) and Wiener Entwicklungsgesellschaft mbH für den Donauraum AG (WED) Case C-249/01 [2003] ECR I-6319 (para 18)). c

27. In that sense, as the Commission of the European Communities pointed out in its written observations, participation in a contract award procedure may, in principle, with regard to art 1(3) of Directive 89/665, validly constitute a condition which must be fulfilled before the person concerned can show an interest in obtaining the contract at issue or that he risks suffering harm as a result of the allegedly unlawful nature of the decision to award that contract. If he has not submitted a tender it will be difficult for such a person to show that he has an interest in challenging that decision or that he has been harmed or risks being harmed as a result of that award decision. d

28. However, where an undertaking has not submitted a tender because there were allegedly discriminatory specifications in the documents relating to the invitation to tender, or in the contract documents, which have specifically prevented it from being in a position to provide all the services requested, it would be entitled to seek review of those specifications directly, even before the procedure for awarding the contract concerned is terminated. e

29. On the one hand, it would be too much to require an undertaking allegedly harmed by discriminatory clauses in the documents relating to the invitation to tender to submit a tender, before being able to avail itself of the review procedures provided for by Directive 89/665 against such specifications, in the award procedure for the contract at issue, even though its chances of being awarded the contract are non-existent by reason of the existence of those specifications. f

30. On the other hand, it is clear from the wording of art 2(1)(b) of Directive 89/665 that the review procedures to be organised by the member states in accordance with the directive must, in particular, 'set aside decisions taken unlawfully, including the removal of discriminatory technical, economic or financial specifications'. It must, therefore, be possible for an undertaking to seek review of such discriminatory specifications directly, without waiting for the contract award procedure to be terminated. g

Absence of proceedings against the invitation to tender

31. In this case, Grossmann complains that the contracting authority imposed requirements in respect of a contract for non-scheduled air transport services that only an air company offering scheduled flights would be in a h a position to fulfil, which had the effect of reducing the number of candidates capable of providing all the services required.

32. It is apparent, however, from the file that Grossmann did not seek review of the contracting authority's decision determining the specifications of the invitation to tender directly, but waited until the decision to award the contract to Lauda Air was notified before asking the Bundesvergabeamt to set that decision aside.

33. In that regard, in its order for reference the Bundesvergabeamt points out that, under para 115(1) of the BVergG, an undertaking may institute review proceedings against a decision of the contracting authority where it claims to have an interest in the conclusion of a contract in an award procedure and the unlawfulness on which it relies has caused or risks causing it harm.

34. The national court therefore asks, essentially, whether art 1(3) of Directive 89/665 must be interpreted as meaning that it precludes a person who not only has not participated in the award procedure for a public contract but has not sought any review of the decision of the contracting authority determining the specifications of the invitation to tender either, from being regarded as having lost his interest in obtaining the contract and, therefore, the right of access to the review procedures provided for by the directive.

35. This question must be examined in the light of the purpose of Directive 89/665.

36. In that regard, it is appropriate to recall that, as is apparent from the first and second recitals in the preamble, Directive 89/665 is intended to strengthen the existing mechanisms, both at national and Community level, to ensure the effective application of Community directives relating to public procurement, in particular at a stage when infringements can still be remedied. To that effect, art 1(1) of that directive requires member states to guarantee that unlawful decisions of contracting authorities can be subjected to effective review which is as swift as possible (see, in particular, Alcatel Austria AG v Bundesministerium für Wissenschaft und Verkehr Case C-81/98 [1999] ECR I-7671 (paras 33, 34), Universale-Bau AG v Entsorgungsbetriebe Simmering GesmbH Case C-470/99 [2002] ECR I-11617 (para 74) and Fritsch, Chiari & Partner, Ziviltechniker GmbH v Autobahnen- und Schnellstraßen-Finanzierungs-AG (Asfinag) Case C-410/01 [2003] ECR I-6413 (para 30)).

37. It must be pointed out that the fact that a person does not seek review of a decision of the contracting authority determining the specifications of an invitation to tender which in his view discriminate against him, in so far as they effectively disqualify him from participating in the award procedure for the contract at issue, but awaits notification of the decision awarding the contract and then challenges it before the body responsible, on the ground specifically that those specifications are discriminatory, is not in keeping with the objectives of speed and effectiveness of Directive 89/665.

38. Such conduct, in so far as it may delay, without any objective reason, the commencement of the review procedures which member states were required to institute by Directive 89/665 impairs the effective implementation of the Community directives on the award of public contracts.

39. In those circumstances, a refusal to acknowledge the interest in obtaining the contract in question and, therefore, the right of access to the review procedures provided for by Directive 89/665 of a person who has not participated in the contract award procedure, or sought review of the decision of the contracting authority laying down the specifications of the invitation to tender, does not impair the effectiveness of that directive.

40. Having regard to the foregoing, the answer to the first and third questions must be that arts 1(3) and 2(1)(b) of Directive 89/665 must be interpreted as not precluding a person from being regarded, once a public contract has been awarded, as having lost his right of access to the review procedures provided for by the directive if he did not participate in the award procedure for that contract on the ground that he was not in a position to supply all the services for which bids were invited, because there were allegedly discriminatory specifications in the documents relating to the invitation to tender, but he did not seek review of those specifications before the contract was awarded. a
b

SECOND QUESTION

41. In the light of the facts in the main proceedings, as set out by the national court, the second question must be understood as asking, essentially, whether art 1(3) of Directive 89/665 must be interpreted as precluding a person who has participated in a contract award procedure from being regarded as having lost his interest in obtaining the contract on the ground that, before seeking the review provided for by the directive, he failed to refer the case to a conciliation committee such as the B-VKK. c
d

42. In that regard, it is sufficient to recall that, in paras 31 and 34 of the Fritsch case, the court held that, even though art 1(3) of Directive 89/665 expressly allows member states to determine the detailed rules according to which they must make the review procedures provided for in that directive available to any person having or having had an interest in obtaining a particular public contract and who has been or risks being harmed by an alleged infringement it none the less does not authorise them to give the term 'interest in obtaining a public contract' an interpretation which may limit the effectiveness of that directive. The fact that access to the review procedures provided for by the directive is made subject to prior referral to a conciliation committee such as the B-VKK would be contrary to the objectives of speed and effectiveness of that directive. e
f

43. Accordingly, the answer to the second question must be that art 1(3) of Directive 89/665 must be interpreted as precluding a person who has participated in a contract award procedure from being regarded as having lost his interest in obtaining the contract on the ground that, before seeking the review provided for by the directive, he failed to refer the case to a conciliation committee such as the B-VKK. g

COSTS

44. The costs incurred by the Austrian government and by the Commission, which have submitted observations to the court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the proceedings pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. h

On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Sixth Chamber), in answer to the questions referred to it by the Bundesvergabeamt by order of 14 May 2002, hereby rules: i

(1) Articles 1(3) and 2(1)(b) of Council Directive (EEC) 89/665 (on the co-ordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts), as amended by Council Directive (EEC) 92/50 (relating to the co-ordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts),

- a* must be interpreted as not precluding a person from being regarded, once a public contract has been awarded, as having lost his right of access to the review procedures provided for by the directive if he did not participate in the award procedure for that contract on the ground that he was not in a position to supply all the services for which bids were invited, because there were allegedly discriminatory specifications in the documents relating to the invitation to tender, but he did not seek review of those specifications before the contract was awarded.
- b*

- (2) Article 1(3) of Directive 89/665, as amended by Directive 92/50, must be interpreted as precluding a person who has participated in a contract award procedure from being regarded as having lost his interest in obtaining the contract on the ground that, before seeking the review provided for by the directive, he failed to refer the case to a conciliation committee such as Bundes-Vergabekontrollkommission (Federal Public Procurement Review Commission, established by the Bundesgesetz über die Vergabe von Aufträgen (Bundesvergabegesetz) 1997 (1997 Federal Law on Public Procurement)).
- c*

Altmark Trans GmbH and another v Nahverkehrsgesellschaft Altmark GmbH (Oberbundesanwalt beim Bundesverwaltungsgericht, third party) <sup>a</sup>

(Case C-280/00) <sup>b</sup>

COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES <sup>c</sup>

JUDGES RODRIGUEZ IGLESIAS (PRESIDENT), PUISOCHET, WATHELET, SCHINTGEN AND TIMMERMANS (RAPPORTEUR) (PRESIDENTS OF CHAMBERS), GULMANN, EDWARD, LA PERGOLA, JANN, SKOURIS, MACKEN, COLNERIC, VON BAHR, CUNHA RODRIGUES AND ROSAS

ADVOCATE GENERAL LÉGER <sup>d</sup>

6 NOVEMBER 2001, 19 MARCH, 18 JUNE 2002, 14 JANUARY, 24 JULY 2003

European Community – State aids – Public subsidies – Public services – Local public transport – Grant of licences to provide public transport to company requiring subsidies to operate services – Whether subsidies subject to prohibition on state aid – Whether subsidies compensating for deficits in public transport permitted – EC Treaty, arts 77, 92(1) (now arts 73, 87(1) EC), Council Regulation (EEC) 1191/69, art 1(1). <sup>e</sup>

The regional government granted Altmark Trans GmbH licences to operate scheduled bus services (the decision). To operate those services Altmark Trans required additional financing from the public authorities. Nahverkehrsgesellschaft Altmark GmbH, an unsuccessful applicant for those licences, brought a complaint against the decision contending that Altmark Trans did not satisfy the requirements of para 13 of the Law on passenger transport. It alleged that Altmark Trans was not an economically viable undertaking, as it was unable to survive without public subsidies, and that therefore the licences granted to Altmark Trans were unlawful. The regional government rejected that complaint. Nahverkehrsgesellschaft subsequently issued unsuccessful proceedings against the decision. On appeal, the Higher Administrative Court of Saxony-Anhalt, inter alia, set aside the licences. It held that those subsidies were not compatible with Community law respecting state aid, in particular Council Regulation (EEC) 1191/69 (on action by member states concerning the obligations inherent in the concept of a public service in transport by rail, road and inland waterway) (the regulation)<sup>a</sup>. Altmark Trans appealed on point of law to the Federal Administrative Court, which stayed the proceedings and referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling a question as to whether arts 77<sup>b</sup> and 92<sup>c</sup> of the EC Treaty (now arts 73 and 87 EC), read in conjunction with the regulation, <sup>f</sup> <sup>g</sup> <sup>h</sup> <sup>i</sup>

<sup>a</sup> Council Regulation (EEC) 1191/69, so far as material, is set out at judgment paras 7–10, below

<sup>b</sup> Article 77 of the EC Treaty provides: 'Aids shall be compatible with this Treaty if they meet the needs of coordination of transport or if they represent reimbursement for the discharge of certain obligations inherent in the concept of a public service.'

<sup>c</sup> Article 92(1) of the EC Treaty is set out at judgment para 3, below

- a precluded the application of a national provision which permitted licences for scheduled services in local public transport to be granted in respect of services which are necessarily dependent on public subsidies without regard being had to Sections II, III and IV of that regulation.
- b Held – (1) The regulation, and more particularly the second subparagraph of art 1(1) thereof, had to be interpreted as allowing a member state not to apply the regulation to the operation of urban, suburban or regional scheduled transport services which necessarily depended on public subsidies, and to limit its application to cases where the provision of an adequate transport service was not otherwise possible, provided, however, that the principle of legal certainty was duly observed. The second subparagraph in principle allowed the
- c legislature to provide that, for transport services provided on a commercial basis, public service obligations could be imposed and subsidies granted without complying with the conditions and details of operation laid down in the regulation. However, the legislature had to delimit clearly the use made of the option of derogation, so as to make it possible to determine the situations
- d in which the derogation applied and those in which the regulation applied. It was for the national court to ascertain whether the application by the legislature of the derogation provided for in the second subparagraph of art 1 satisfied the requirements of clarity and precision needed to comply with the principle of legal certainty (see judgment paras 57, 58, 63, 64, below).
- e (2) The condition for the application of art 92(1) that the aid had to be such as to affect trade between member states did not depend on the local or regional character of the transport services supplied or on the scale of the field of activity concerned. However, public subsidies intended to enable the operation of urban, suburban or regional scheduled transport services were not caught by that provision where such subsidies were to be regarded as compensation for the services provided by the recipient undertakings in order
- f to discharge public service obligations. For the purpose of applying that criterion, it was for the national court to ascertain that the following conditions were satisfied: (i) the recipient undertaking was actually required to discharge public service obligations and those obligations had been clearly defined; (ii) the parameters on the basis of which the compensation was calculated had been established beforehand in an objective and transparent manner; (iii) the
- g compensation did not exceed what was necessary to cover all or part of the costs incurred in discharging the public service obligations, taking into account the relevant receipts and reasonable profits for discharging those obligations; (iv) where the undertaking which was to discharge public service obligations was not chosen in a public procurement procedure, the level of
- h compensation needed had been determined on the basis of an analysis of the costs which a typical undertaking, well-run and adequately provided with means of transport so as to be able to meet the necessary public service requirements, would have incurred in discharging those obligations, taking into account the relevant receipts and a reasonable profit for discharging the obligations (see judgment paras 82, 87–95, below).
- i (3) Article 77 could not be applied to public subsidies which compensated for the additional costs incurred in discharging public service obligations without taking the regulation into account. To the extent that that regulation did not apply in the present case and the subsidies at issue in the main proceedings fell within art 92(1), Council Regulation (EEC) 1107/70 (on the granting of aids for transport by rail, road and inland waterway) exhaustively listed the circumstances in which the authorities of the member states could grant aids under art 77 (see judgment paras 107–109, below). a

Notes

For competition and state intervention in regard to state aids, see 47 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2001 reissue) para 439.

For the EC Treaty, arts 73, 87(1) EC (formerly arts 77, 92(1)), see 50 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) Current Statutes Service (issue 88) 377, 381. b

Cases cited

Adria-Wien Pipeline GmbH v Finanzlandesdirektion für Kärnten Case C-143/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 306, [2001] ECR I-8365, ECJ. c

Ahmed Saeed Flugreisen v Zentrale zur Bekämpfung unlauteren Wettbewerbs eV Case 66/86 [1989] ECR 803, ECJ.

Almelo (Municipality of) v Energiebedrijf IJsselmij NV Case C-393/92 [1994] ECR I-1477, ECJ.

Ambulanz Glöckner (Firma) v Landkreis Südwestpfalz Case C-475/99 [2001] ECR I-8089, ECJ. d

Austria v European Commission Case C-99/98 [2001] ECR I-1101, ECJ.

Banco de Crédito Industrial SA, now Banco Exterior de España SA v Ayuntamiento de Valencia Case C-387/92 [1994] STC 603, [1994] ECR I-877, ECJ.

Belgium v EC Commission Case 234/84 [1986] ECR 2263, ECJ.

Belgium v EC Commission Case 40/85 [1986] ECR 2321, ECJ. e

Belgium v EC Commission Case C-142/87 [1990] ECR I-959, ECJ.

Belgium v European Commission Case C-197/99 P [2003] ECR I-8461, ECJ.

Belgium v European Commission Case C-5/01 [2002] ECR I-11991, ECJ.

Belgium v European Commission Case C-56/93 [1996] ECR I-723, ECJ.

Belgium v European Commission Case C-75/97 [1999] ECR I-3671, ECJ.

Cie Nationale Air France v European Commission Case T-358/94 [1996] ECR II-2109, CFI. f

Cisal di Battistello Venziano & Co SAS v Istituto Nazionale per l'Assicurazione contro gli Infortuni sul Lavoro (INAIL) Case C-218/00 [2002] ECR I-691, ECJ.

Cityflyer Express Ltd v European Commission Case T-16/96 [1998] ECR II-757, CFI.

Corbeau (Criminal proceedings against) Case C-320/91 [1993] ECR I-2533, ECJ. g

Costa v ENEL Case 6/64 [1964] ECR 585, ECJ.

Danner (Proceedings brought by) Case C-136/00 [2002] STC 1283, [2002] ECR I-8147, ECJ.

Déménagements-Manutention Transport SA (DMT) (Proceedings relating to) Case C-256/97 [1999] All ER (EC) 601, [1999] ECR I-3913, ECJ.

Deufil GmbH & Co KG v EC Commission Case 310/85 [1987] ECR 901, ECJ. h

Diego Cali & Figli Srl v Servizi Ecologici Porto Di Genova SpA (SEPG) Case C-343/95 [1997] ECR I-1547, ECJ.

EC Commission v Germany Case 29/84 [1985] ECR 1661, ECJ.

EC Commission v Germany Case C-59/89 [1991] ECR I-2607, ECJ.

EC Commission v Greece Case C-236/95 [1996] ECR I-4459, ECJ. i

EC Commission v Italy Case 363/85 [1987] ECR 1733, ECJ.

Elliniki Radiophonia Tileorassi AE v Dimotiki Etairia Pliroforissis Case C-260/89 [1991] ECR I-2925, ECJ.

Enirisorse SpA v Ministero delle Finanze Joined Cases C-34/01–38/01 [2004] 1 CMLR 296, ECJ.

- a* EPAC—Empresa para a Agroalimentação e Cereais, SA v European Commission Joined cases T-204/97 and T-270/97 [2000] ECR II-2267, CFI.
Fédération Française des Sociétés d'Assurance (FFSA) v European Commission Case T-106/95 [1997] ECR II-229, CFI.
Ferring SA v Agence Centrale des Organismes de Sécurité Sociale (ACOSS) Case C-53/00 [2001] ECR I-9067, ECJ.
- b* France v EC Commission Case 102/87 [1988] ECR I-4067, ECJ.
France v EC Commission Case C-301/87 [1990] ECR I-307, ECJ.
France v EC Commission Case C-482/99 [2003] All ER (EC) 330, [2002] ECR I-4397, ECJ.
France v European Commission Case C-241/94 [1996] ECR I-4551, ECJ.
- c* France v European Commission Case C-251/97 [1999] ECR I-6639, ECJ.
France v European Commission Case C-332/98 [2000] ECR I-4833, ECJ.
Germany v European Commission Case C-156/98 [2000] ECR I-6857, ECJ.
Intermills (SA) v EC Commission Case 323/82 [1984] ECR 3809, ECJ.
Italy v EC Commission Case C-261/89 [1991] ECR I-4437, ECJ.
Italy v EC Commission Case C-303/88 [1991] ECR I-1433, ECJ.
- d* Italy v EC Commission Case C-305/89 [1991] ECR I-1603, ECJ.
Italy v EC Commission Case C-6/97 [1999] ECR I-2981, ECJ.
Italy v EEC Commission Case 173/73 [1974] ECR 709, ECJ.
Kwekerij Gebroeders van der Kooy BV v EC Commission Joined cases 67/85, 68/85 and 70/85 [1988] ECR 219, ECJ.
Ladbroke Racing Ltd v European Commission Case T-67/94 [1998] ECR II-1, CFI.
- e* Lorenz (Gebr) GmbH v Germany Case 120/73 [1973] ECR 1471, ECJ.
Matra SA v EC Commission Case C-225/91 [1993] ECR I-3203, ECJ.
Ministre de l'Economie, des Finances et de l'Industrie v GEMO SA Case C-126/01 [2004] 1 CMLR 259, ECJ.
Philip Morris Holland BV v EC Commission Case 730/79 [1980] ECR 2671, ECJ.
- f* Poucet v Assurances Générales de France (AGF), Pistre v Caisse Autonome Nationale de Compensation de L'Assurance Régionale des Artisans (CANCARA) Joined cases C-159/91 and C-160/91 [1993] ECR 637, ECJ.
Procureur de la République v Association de Défense des Brûleurs d'Huiles Usagées Case 240/83 [1985] ECR 531, ECJ.
SAT Fluggesellschaft mbH v European Organisation for the Safety of Air Navigation (Eurocontrol) Case C-364/92 [1994] ECR I-43, ECJ.
- g* Sociedade Independente de Comunicação SA (SIC) v Commission of the European Communities Case T-46/97 [2000] ECR II-2125, CFI.
Spain v EC Commission Case C-312/90 [1992] ECR I-4117, ECJ.
Spain v EC Commission Joined cases C-278–280/92 [1994] ECR I-4103, ECJ.
- h* Spain v European Commission Case C-342/96 [1999] ECR I-2459, ECJ.
Steinike und Weinlig (Firma) v Germany Case 78/76 [1977] ECR I-595, ECJ.
Syndicat Français de l'Express International (SFEI) v La Poste Case C-39/94 [1996] All ER (EC) 685, [1996] ECR I-3547, ECJ.
Wouters v Algemene Raad van de Nederlandse Orde van Advocaten (Raad van de Balies van de Europese Gemeenschap intervening) Case C-309/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 193, [2002] ECR I-1577, ECJ.
- i* Zwartveld Case C-2/88 Imm [1990] ECR I-3365, ECJ.

Reference

By order of 6 April 2000, the Bundesverwaltungsgericht (Federal Administrative Court) referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) a question (set out at judgment para 30, below) on the interpretation of art 92 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, art 87 EC), art 77 of the EC Treaty (now art 73 EC), and Council Regulation (EEC) 1191/69 (on action by member states concerning the obligations inherent in the concept of a public service in transport by rail, road and inland waterway), as amended by Council Regulation (EEC) 1893/91. The question arose in proceedings between Altmark Trans GmbH (Altmark Trans) and Nahverkehrsgesellschaft Altmark GmbH (Nahverkehrsgesellschaft) concerning the grant to the former by Regierungspräsidium Magdeburg (Magdeburg regional government, the Regierungspräsidium) of licences for scheduled bus transport services in the Landkreis of Stendal (Germany) and public subsidies for operating those services. Written observations were submitted on behalf of: Altmark Trans by M Ronellenfitsch, Rechtsanwalt; Regierungspräsidium Magdeburg by L-H Rode, acting as agent; Nahverkehrsgesellschaft Altmark GmbH by C Heinze, Rechtsanwalt; and the Commission of the European Communities by M Wolfcarius and D Triantafyllou, acting as agents. Oral observations were submitted on behalf of: Altmark Trans, represented by M Ronellenfitsch; Regierungspräsidium Magdeburg, represented by L-H Rode; Nahverkehrsgesellschaft, represented by C Heinze; and the Commission, represented by M Wolfcarius and D Triantafyllou. The oral procedure was reopened by order of 18 June 2002. Further oral observations were submitted on behalf of: Altmark Trans GmbH, represented by M Ronellenfitsch; Regierungspräsidium Magdeburg, represented by S Karnop, acting as agent; Nahverkehrsgesellschaft, represented by C Heinze; the German government, represented by M Lumma, acting as agent; the Danish government, represented by J Molde, acting as agent; the Spanish government, represented by R Silva de Lapuerta, acting as agent; the French government, represented by F Million, acting as agent; the Netherlands government, represented by N A J Bel, acting as agent; the United Kingdom government, represented by J E Collins, acting as agent, and E Sharpston QC; and the Commission, represented by D Triantafyllou. The language of the case was German. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General.

14 January 2003. The Advocate General (P Léger) delivered the following opinion<sup>1</sup>.

1. By order of 18 June 2002 the Court of Justice of the European Communities ordered the reopening of the oral procedure in the present case.

2. In the order the Court of Justice stated that the Ferring judgment<sup>2</sup> of 22 November 2001 had been delivered after submission of the parties' oral observations and could affect the answer to the questions referred by the Bundesverwaltungsgericht (Federal Administrative Court, Germany) for a preliminary ruling. The court also observed that the judgment in the Ferring case was discussed in my opinion of 19 March 2002 in the present case and in the opinion of Advocate General Jacobs in the GEMO case<sup>3</sup>.

3. The court therefore arranged a further hearing to give the parties in the main proceedings, the member states, the Commission and the Council of a the European Communities an opportunity to state their position on the effect of the Ferring judgment. It asked them for their views on whether—and according to what criteria—a financial advantage granted by the authorities of a member state to offset the cost of the public service obligations they impose on an undertaking must be classified as state aid within the meaning of art 92(1) of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, art 87(1) EC).

<sup>1</sup> Original language: French.

<sup>2</sup> Ferring SA v Agence Centrale des Organismes de Sécurité Sociale (ACOSS) Case C-53/00 [2001] ECR I-9067.

<sup>3</sup> Opinion of 30 April 2002 in Ministre de l'Economie, des Finances et de l'Industrie v GEMO SA Case C-126/01 [2004] 1 CMLR 259.

b 4. The question of the Community rules applicable to the financing of public services has been the subject of a number of statements of position at the political level<sup>4</sup>. It is also the subject of controversy among the Advocates General of the court<sup>5</sup> and in academic writing<sup>6</sup>. These different positions are well known, so that there is no need to repeat them. On the other hand, before c supplementing my opinion of 19 March 2002, I will give a brief account of the arguments put forward by the parties.

I—ARGUMENTS OF THE PARTIES

5. In addition to the parties in the main proceedings, six member states took part in the reopened oral procedure. These were the Federal Republic of d Germany, the Kingdom of Denmark, the French Republic, the Kingdom of the Netherlands, the Kingdom of Spain and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. The Commission also submitted observations. The Council did not appear.

6. The argument before the court has made it possible to divide the parties e into two distinct groups.

7. The first group consists of Altmark Trans GmbH (Altmark Trans), the Regierungspräsidium Magdeburg, the Federal Republic of Germany, the French Republic and the Kingdom of Spain. They propose that the court

---

f 4 See in particular the Presidency conclusions of the Nice European Council (7–9 December 2000) point 47, the Presidency conclusions of the Laeken European Council (14–15 December 2001) point 26, the Presidency conclusions of the Barcelona European Council (15–16 March 2002) point 42, the Presidency conclusions of the Seville European Council (21–22 June 2002) point 54, the communication from the Commission on services of general interest in Europe (OJ 2001 C17 p 4), the Commission's report of 17 October 2001 to the Laeken European Council on services of general interest (COM(2001) 598 final), the communication from the Commission on the application of state aid rules to public service broadcasting (OJ 2001 C320 p 5), the report of the Commission of 16 June 2002 on the status of work on the guidelines for state aid and services of general economic interest (COM(2002) 280 final) and the report of the Commission of 27 November 2002 on the state of play in the work on the guidelines for state aid and services of general economic interest (COM(2002) 636 final).

g 5 See the opinion of Advocate General Tizzano in the Ferring case, my opinion of 19 March 2002 in the present case (paras 54–98), the opinion of Advocate General Jacobs in the GEMO case, cited in footnote 3, above (paras 87–132) and the opinion of Advocate General Stix-Hackl in Enirisorse SpA v Ministero delle Finanze Joined Cases C-34/01–38/01 [2004] 1 CMLR 296 (paras 138–165).

h 6 For opinions expressed before the Ferring judgment, see A Alexis 'Services publics et aides d'État', (2002/1) Revue du droit de l'Union européenne 63, D Grespan 'An example of the application of State aid rules in the utilities sector in Italy', Competition Policy Newsletter (No 3 October 2002) p 17, J Gundel 'Staatliche Ausgleichszahlungen für Dienstleistungen von allgemeinem wirtschaftlichem Interesse: Zum Verhältnis zwischen Artikel 86 Absatz 2 EGV und dem EG-Beihilfenrecht' (2002) Recht der Internationalen Wirtschaft 222, M Nettesheim 'Europäische Beihilfeaufsicht und mitgliedstaatliche Daseinsvorsorge' (2002) Europäisches Wirtschafts- und Steuerrecht 253, P Nicolaïdes 'Distortive effects of compensatory aid measures: a note on the economics of the Ferring judgment' (2002) ECLR 313, P Nicolaïdes 'The new frontier in State aid control. An economic assessment of measures that compensate enterprises' (2002) 37 Intereconomics 190 and C Rizza 'The financial assistance granted by Member States to undertakings entrusted with the operation of a service of general economic interest: the implications of the forthcoming Altmark judgment for future State aid control policy', to appear in the Columbia Journal of European Law (2003).

should follow the compensation approach<sup>7</sup> adopted in the Ferring case. Under that approach, state financing of public services constitutes aid within the meaning of art 92(1) of the EC Treaty only if, and to the extent that, the advantages conferred by the public authorities exceed the cost incurred in discharging public service obligations. a

8. In support of their contention, they put forward essentially three series of arguments, which may be summarised as follows<sup>8</sup>. b

—according to the case law, where the state purchases goods (for example, computers) or services (for example, cleaning services), there is aid only if, and to the extent that, the remuneration paid by the state exceeds the market price. The same principle should apply where the state acquires services which are made available directly to the collectivity (namely, public services); c

—the concept of aid in art 92(1) of the EC Treaty applies only to measures which provide a financial advantage for certain undertakings. A state measure which does no more than offset the cost of discharging public service obligations does not confer any real advantage on the recipient undertaking. It does not therefore constitute aid; d

—under art 93(3) of the EC Treaty (now art 88(3) EC), the member states are obliged to notify their plans to grant aid and to suspend payment of the aid until the Commission has given its authorisation. These obligations are liable to paralyse the functioning of services in the general interest in the member states. e

9. The second group consists of the Kingdom of Denmark, the Kingdom of the Netherlands and the United Kingdom. They propose that the court should adopt the approach of Advocate General Jacobs in his opinion in the GEMO case<sup>9</sup> ('the quid pro quo approach'). f

10. Under that approach, the court would distinguish between two categories of situation. Where there was a direct and manifest link between the state financing and clearly defined public service obligations, the sums paid by the state would not constitute aid within the meaning of art 92(1) of the EC Treaty. On the other hand, where there was no such link or the public service obligations were not clearly defined, the sums paid by the public authorities would constitute aid within the meaning of that provision. g

11. The Commission for its part has not expressed a view on the point. It may be noted, however, that in the Ferring case<sup>10</sup> and the GEMO case<sup>11</sup> it came out in favour of the state aid approach<sup>12</sup>. Under that approach, state financing of public services constitutes aid within the meaning of art 92(1) of the Treaty. That aid may, however, be justified on the basis of art 90(2) of the EC Treaty (now art 86(2) EC)<sup>13</sup>. h

7 To use the expression of Advocate General Jacobs in his opinion in the GEMO case, cited in footnote 3, above (para 95).

8 These arguments have already been summarised by Advocate General Jacobs in his opinion in the GEMO case, cited in footnote 3, above (para 115).

9 Cited in footnote 3, above (paras 117–129).

10 See the opinion of Advocate General Tizzano (paras 18, 74, 75).

11 See the opinion of Advocate General Jacobs (para 107).

12 To use the expression of Advocate General Jacobs in his opinion in the GEMO case, cited in footnote 3, above (para 94).

13 See Fédération Française des Sociétés d'Assurance (FFSA) v European Commission Case T-106/95 [1997] ECR II-229 (paras 164–178) and Sociedade Independente de Comunicação SA (SIC) v Commission of the European Communities Case T-46/97 [2000] ECR II-2125 (paras 76–84). i

a II—ANALYSIS

12. In my opinion of 19 March 2002, I came down in favour of the state aid approach. It may be of use to state at the outset that the arguments put forward by the parties have not caused me to alter my position.

13. I will therefore confine myself to considering the new questions raised by the arguments of the parties. Those questions relate to:

- b
- the criterion of the private investor in a market economy;
  - the concept of ‘advantage’ in art 92(1) of the EC Treaty;
  - the procedural obligations laid down in art 93(3) of the EC Treaty; and
  - the quid pro quo approach.

c 14. I will not, on the other hand, return to the arguments I set out in my earlier opinion. I therefore refer the court to that opinion.

A—The criterion of the private investor in a market economy

15. The first group of parties point out that, according to the case law, not all state intervention constitutes aid within the meaning of art 92(1) of the EC Treaty. Thus where the state purchases goods (for example, computers) or services (for example, cleaning services), there is aid only if, and to the extent that, the remuneration paid by the state exceeds the market price.

d 16. They consider that the same principle must apply in the field of public services. In their view, financing by the state must be classified as aid only if, and to the extent that, the advantages conferred by the public authorities exceed the cost of complying with the public service obligations (that is, the normal price of the services provided)<sup>14</sup>.

e 17. The parties’ argument amounts in substance to applying the criterion of the private investor in the field of state financing of public services.

f 18. As is well known, the criterion of the private operator<sup>15</sup> was originally developed by the Commission for determining whether investment by the state in the capital of an undertaking constitutes aid within the meaning of art 92(1)<sup>16</sup>. Under that criterion, the Commission considers that such an investment is not aid where the public authorities effect it under the same conditions as a private investor operating under normal market economy conditions<sup>17</sup>. The court took up the criterion in its case law<sup>18</sup> and then applied it to other kinds of state measures. To assess whether a measure contains an element of aid, the court thus examines whether a private operator of comparable size to the public bodies would have carried out the operation in question under the same conditions.

g 19. Unlike the parties, I consider that this criterion cannot be applied to state financing of public services.

h 14 See also, to that effect, the Ferring case (paras 26, 27) and the opinion of Advocate General Jacobs in the GEMO case, cited in footnote 3, above (paras 121–123).

15 I consider, along with some writers, that the expression ‘private operator’ is more appropriate than ‘private investor’. It can cover not only investments in the strict sense but also the other kinds of state measures to which this criterion applies (see J-P Keppenne Guide des aides d’État en droit communautaire (1999) point 44, note 93).

i 16 See the communication of the Commission to the member states concerning public authorities’ holdings in company capital (EC Bulletin No 9/1984, point 3.5.1).

17 Commission communication to the member states on the application of arts 92 and 93 of the EEC Treaty and of art 5 of Commission Directive (EEC) 80/723 (to public undertakings in the manufacturing sector) (OJ 1993 C307 p 3) point 11.

18 See in particular Belgium v EC Commission Case 234/84 [1986] ECR 2263 (para 14), Belgium v EC Commission Case C-142/87 [1990] ECR I-959 (para 26) and Italy v EC Commission Case C-305/89 [1991] ECR I-1603 (para 19).

20. It appears from the case law that in the field of state aid the court distinguishes between two categories of situation: those where the intervention of the state is of an economic nature and those where it forms part of the exercise of public powers.

21. The court applies the private operator criterion only in situations in the first category. These cover cases where the public authorities contribute capital to an undertaking<sup>19</sup>, grant a loan to certain undertakings<sup>20</sup>, provide a state guarantee<sup>21</sup>, sell goods or services on the market<sup>22</sup>, or grant facilities for the payment of social security contributions<sup>23</sup> or the repayment of wages<sup>24</sup>. In such situations the private operator criterion is material because the conduct of the state is capable of being adopted, at least in principle, by a private operator acting with a view to profit (an investor, a bank, a surety, an undertaking or a creditor). Application of that criterion is justified by the principle of equal treatment between the public and private sectors<sup>25</sup>, which requires that intervention by the state should not be subject to stricter rules than those applicable to private undertakings.

22. On the other hand, the criterion of the private operator is not material where the intervention by the state has no economic character. That is the case where the public authorities pay a subsidy directly to an undertaking<sup>26</sup>, grant an exemption from tax<sup>27</sup> or agree to a reduction in social security contributions<sup>28</sup>. In situations of this kind, the intervention by the state cannot be adopted by a private operator acting with a view to profit but falls within the exercise of public powers of the state (such as tax policy or social policy). The private operator criterion is therefore not material, since, by definition, there cannot be any breach of equal treatment between the public and private sectors<sup>29</sup>.

19 As above.

20 See France v EC Commission Case C-301/87 [1990] ECR I-307 (paras 38–41) and Cityflyer Express Ltd v European Commission Case T-16/96 [1998] ECR II-757 (paras 8, 51).

21 See EPAC—Empresa para a Agroalimentação e Cereais, SA v European Commission Joined cases T-204/97 and T-270/97 [2000] ECR II-2267 (paras 67, 68).

22 See Kwekerij Gebroeders van der Kooy BV v EC Commission Joined cases 67/85, 68/85 and 70/85 [1988] ECR 219 (paras 28–30), Belgium v European Commission Case C-56/93 [1996] ECR I-723 (para 10) and Syndicat Français de l'Express International (SFEL) v La Poste Case C-39/94 [1996] All ER (EC) 685, [1996] ECR I-3547 (paras 59–62).

23 See Proceedings relating to Déménagements-Manutention Transport SA (DMT) Case C-256/97 [1999] All ER (EC) 601, [1999] ECR I-3913 (paras 24, 25).

24 See Spain v European Commission Case C-342/96 [1999] ECR I-2459 (para 46).

25 See Italy v EC Commission Case C-303/88 [1991] ECR I-1433 (para 20), Italy v EC Commission Case C-261/89 [1991] ECR I-4437 (para 15) and Cie Nationale Air France v European Commission Case T-358/94 [1996] ECR II-2109 (para 70).

26 See Deufil GmbH & Co KG v EC Commission Case 310/85 [1987] ECR 901 (para 8).

27 See Banco de Crédito Industrial SA, now Banco Exterior de España SA v Ayuntamiento de Valencia Case C-387/92 [1994] STC 603, [1994] ECR I-877 (para 14), Italy v EC Commission Case C-6/97 [1999] ECR I-2981 (para 16) and Germany v European Commission Case C-156/98 [2000] ECR I-6857 (paras 25–28).

28 See Belgium v European Commission Case C-75/97 [1999] ECR I-3671 (paras 24, 25) and Ladbroke Racing Ltd v European Commission Case T-67/94 [1998] ECR II-1 (para 110).

29 It will be noted that the criterion for identifying cases where the court applies the private operator principle is the same as the criterion for defining an undertaking in the context of competition law (see, on this point, my opinion in Wouters v Algemene Raad van de Nederlandse Orde van Advocaten (Raad van de Balies van de Europese Gemeenschap interveniend) Case C-309/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 193, [2002] ECR I-1577 (para 137) and the references cited, and Firma Ambulanz Glöckner v Landkreis Südwestpfalz Case C-475/99 [2001] ECR I-8089 (para 20)).

a 23. It follows from the above that the private operator criterion does not apply to interventions by the state which fall within the exercise of public powers.

b 24. The court expressly confirmed that principle in the Spain v EC Commission judgment of 14 September 1994<sup>30</sup>. It held that, for the purpose of applying the private operator criterion, 'a distinction must be drawn between the obligations which the State must assume as owner of the share capital of a company and its obligations as a public authority'<sup>31</sup>. The state's obligations as a public authority may not be taken into consideration for the purpose of applying the private investor criterion<sup>32</sup>, as otherwise unequal treatment of the public and private sectors would be introduced.

c 25. It is common ground that the financing of public services is an activity which typically falls within the exercise of public powers. It is for the public authorities to define the services which are to be made available to the collectivity. It is also for them to take the necessary measures to ensure the functioning and financing of those services. It is, moreover, hard to imagine a private operator embarking on his own initiative on such financing activity.

d 26. Consequently, I consider that the private operator criterion cannot validly be applied to the financing of public services.

e 27. The argument of the parties is thus based on a wrong comparison. It is not correct to compare cases where the state purchases goods or services on its own account with those where it 'acquires' services which are made available directly to the collectivity (namely public services). In the former case, the state conducts itself in a way which a private operator may adopt with a view to profit; whereas, in the latter case, the state acts as a public authority<sup>33</sup>.

B—The concept of 'advantage' in art 92(1) of the Treaty

f 28. The parties' second argument relates to the concept of 'advantage' in art 92(1) of the Treaty.

g 29. The concept of aid in art 92(1) of the Treaty applies to state measures which confer a financial advantage on certain undertakings and distort or threaten to distort competition. To assess whether a measure constitutes aid, it must therefore be determined whether the undertaking receives an economic advantage which it would not have obtained under normal market conditions<sup>34</sup>.

30. In the present case, the parties submit that a state measure which merely offsets the cost of public service obligations does not constitute aid. In so far as h 31 See para 22.

30 Joined cases C-278–280/92 [1994] ECR I-4103.

32 As above. For the application of this principle in the Commission's practice, see Commission Decision (EC) 94/1073 (concerning the grant of state aid by France to the Bull group in the form of a non-notified capital increase) (OJ 1994 L386 p 1) point V, Commission Decision (EC) 96/631 (concerning state aid that the City of Mainz, a local authority of the Federal Republic of Germany, has granted to Grundstücksverwaltungsgesellschaft Fort Malakoff Mainz mbH & Co KG, a subsidiary of Siemens AG/Siemens Nixdorf Informationssysteme AG) (OJ 1996 L283 p 43) point IV and Commission Decision (EC) 98/204 (conditionally approving aid granted by France to the GAN group) (OJ 1998 L78 p 1) point 3.3.

i 33 See also, to that effect, A Alexis, cited in footnote 6, above (point B.3.5.a) and D Triantafyllou 'L'encadrement communautaire du financement du service public' [1999] Revue trimestrielle de droit européen 21, p 31.

34 See the SFEI case, cited in footnote 22, above (para 60), Spain v Commission, cited in footnote 24, above (para 41) and the DMT case, cited in footnote 23, above (para 22).

the performance of public service obligations involves additional costs, the effect of such a measure is merely to replace the recipient undertaking in a position comparable to that of its competitors. The measure thus does not provide the recipient undertaking with any 'real' advantage and is therefore not liable to distort competition. It merely constitutes consideration for the public service obligations<sup>35</sup>.

31. On this point, it will be seen that the parties' argument is based on a specific understanding of the concept of aid. They adopt what may be described as a 'net' definition of aid or the 'real' advantage theory.

32. In this approach, the advantages given by the public authorities are examined together with the obligations on the recipient of the aid. Public advantages thus constitute aid only if their amount exceeds the value of the commitments the recipient enters into.

33. That does not, however, correspond to the approach adopted by the authors of the Treaty in the field of state aid. The relevant provisions of the Treaty are based on a 'gross' theory of aid or the 'apparent' advantage theory.

34. Using this approach, the advantages given by the public authorities and what the recipient has to contribute in return must be examined separately. The existence of the contribution is of no relevance for determining whether the state measure constitutes aid within the meaning of art 92(1). It comes into consideration only at a later stage of the analysis, for assessing whether the aid is compatible with the common market.

35. The 'gross' theory of aid thus occurs in several provisions of the Treaty, in particular in art 92(2) and (3), and in art 77 of the EC Treaty (now art 73 EC).

36. Article 92(3) of the Treaty provides that aid may be regarded as compatible with the common market if it pursues certain objectives. Those objectives correspond essentially to those which the Treaties assign to the European Community or the European Union<sup>36</sup>. Examples are the strengthening of economic and social cohesion, the promotion of research and the protection of the environment.

37. The Commission considered from the outset that, for aid to be compatible with the common market, the recipient must contribute something in return<sup>37</sup>. This contribution must intervene to compensate the distortion of competition caused by the grant of aid<sup>38</sup>. It is intended to ensure that the recipient acts in a way liable to contribute to the realisation of the objectives set out in art 93(3) of the Treaty. The Commission considers that to authorise aid without requiring the contribution would amount to accepting distortions of competition without this being justified by the Community interest<sup>39</sup>.

35 See also, to that effect, the Ferring case (paras 25–27).

36 See A Evans European Community Law of State Aid (1997) pp 107, 108.

37 See First Report on Competition Policy 1972, para 132, Commission Decision (EEC) 79/743 (on proposed Netherlands government assistance to increase the production capacity of a cigarette manufacturer) (OJ 1979 L 217 p 17) point III and Tenth Report on Competition Policy 1980, para 213.

38 See J-P Keppenne, cited in footnote 15, above (point 495).

39 See inter alia Commission Decision (EEC) 88/318 (on Law No 64 of 1 March 1986 on aid to the Mezzogiorno) (OJ 1988 L143 p 37) point IV.2, Commission Decision (EEC) 93/133 (concerning aid granted by the Spanish government to the Merco company (agricultural processing industry)) (OJ 1993 L55 p 54) point VIII and Commission Decision (EEC) 93/155 (concerning an aid measure proposed by the German authorities (Rhineland-Palatinate) for the distillation of wine) (OJ 1993 L61 p 55) point IV.

a 38. The Commission's approach was expressly accepted by the court in Philip Morris Holland BV v EC Commission<sup>40</sup>. The court held that, to be able to authorise aid under art 92(3) of the Treaty, the Commission may require proof that the aid is necessary to ensure that the recipient undertakings act in such a way as to contribute to the realisation of the objectives referred to in that provision.

b 39. In its practice the Commission therefore looks to see whether there is a contribution on the part of the recipient of the aid which can justify the grant of aid<sup>41</sup>. The contribution may take several forms<sup>42</sup>.

c 40. In some cases the activity aided may be seen at once to be a sufficient contribution, since it falls within the framework of a Community objective. In that case the contribution takes the form of an investment, such as the construction of a factory or a programme of research or training. In other cases the contribution is a condition for the approval of aid and takes a different form, such as a reduction of production capacity which contributes to solving a problem of over-capacity at Community level. In any event, the Commission requires a link, direct or indirect, between the aid and the operations which form the contribution<sup>43</sup>. It also requires the contribution provided by the recipient to be proportionate to the size of the aid paid out<sup>44</sup>.

d 41. It follows that, to be eligible for authorisation under art 92(3) of the Treaty, aid must involve a contribution from the recipient, so that there is no net advantage for him in practice.

e 42. Contrary to the submissions of the parties, the existence of this contribution does not affect the interpretation of the concept of aid.

f 43. In the context of art 92(1), the aid does not correspond to the difference between the public advantages and the value of the commitments entered into by the recipient<sup>45</sup>. The aid corresponds solely to the amount of the public advantages. What the recipient contributes in return comes in only at a further stage of the analysis, to assess the compatibility of the aid with the common market.

g 44. An identical understanding of the concept of aid may be found in the provisions of the Treaty concerning land transport. Article 77 of the Treaty provides that '[a]ids shall be compatible with this Treaty ... if they represent reimbursement for the discharge of certain obligations inherent in the concept of a public service'.

40 Case 730/79 [1980] ECR 2671 (paras 16, 17).

h 41 See, inter alia, Commission Decision (EEC) 81/626 (on a scheme of aid by the Belgian government in respect of certain investments carried out by a Belgian undertaking to modernise its butyl rubber production plant) (OJ 1981 L229 p 12) point V, Commission Decision (EEC) 83/468 (under art 93(2) of the EEC Treaty, on a proposal to grant aid to an undertaking in the textile and clothing sector (undertaking No 111)) (OJ 1983 L253 p 18) point III, Commission Decision (EEC) 93/154 (concerning an AIMA national programme on aid which Italy plans to grant for the private storage of carrots) (OJ 1993 L61 p 52) point VI and Commission Decision (EEC) 97/611 (on aid to the sheepmeat industry (promotional aid)) (OJ 1997 L248 p 20) point VI.

42 See J-P Keppenne, cited in footnote 15, above (point 495).

i 43 See Commission Decision (EEC) 89/43 (on aids granted by the Italian government to ENI-Lanerossi) (OJ 1989 L16 p 52) point VII.

44 See Commission Decision (EC) 95/54 (giving conditional approval to the aid granted by France to the bank Crédit Lyonnais) (OJ 1995 L308 p 92) point 7.1 and Commission Notice (pursuant to art 93(2) of the EC Treaty to other member states and other parties concerned regarding aid which France has decided to grant to the bank Crédit Lyonnais) (OJ 1996 C390 p 7) point 5.3, penultimate and final paragraphs.

45 See also, to that effect, France v European Commission Case C-251/97 [1999] ECR I-6639 (paras 17–20, 38–48).

45. That provision shows that, in the field of state financing of public services, the authors of the Treaty likewise adopted a 'gross' concept of aid. For them, the existence and amount of aid must be assessed solely by reference to the 'financing entering'<sup>46</sup> the undertaking. What the recipient agrees to in return—that is, the public service obligations—has no effect on the interpretation of the concept of aid. It merely constitutes a criterion for assessing the compatibility of the aid from the point of view of the derogating provisions of the Treaty.

46. In view of the above factors, I consider that the court cannot follow the compensation approach adopted in the Ferring case. Such an interpretation would amount to depriving of their effect all the derogating provisions of the Treaty concerning state aid. It amounts in fact to examining the compatibility of aid within the framework of art 92(1) of the Treaty<sup>47</sup>.

47. Another solution might consist in restricting the compensation approach to the field of public services only. Two distinct concepts of aid would thus exist side by side in the Treaty. The view would be taken that:

—in the field of aid generally, the Treaty provisions are based on a 'gross' concept of aid, but —in the field of public services (other than land transport), the Treaty provisions are based on a 'net' concept of aid.

48. I believe, however, that such a solution risks creating serious problems in terms of legal certainty. Some state measures will be capable of falling under both concepts at the same time. That applies to financial advantages granted by the member states to public broadcasting services<sup>48</sup>.

49. On the one hand, those advantages are intended to promote culture within the meaning of art 92(3)(d) of the Treaty. By virtue of art 92 of the Treaty and the 'gross' definition of aid, they will thus constitute aid which must be notified to the Commission and may be declared compatible with the common market. On the other hand, those same advantages are also intended to offset the cost of the public service obligations imposed on broadcasting institutions. By virtue of the compensation approach and the 'net' definition of aid, they will thus not be able to be categorised as aid within the meaning of art 92(1) of the Treaty.

50. It follows that, for measures of that kind, those concerned will all no longer be in a position to know whether the Treaty rules are applicable.

51. Member states will not be able to identify the measures which must be notified to the Commission. Nor will undertakings know whether they can rely on the lawfulness of the state financing. National courts too will have difficulty in knowing whether to apply the court's case law on the direct effect of art 93(3) of the Treaty. The Commission, finally, will not be able to determine with certainty whether it can start a procedure against an instance of state financing.

52. In view of these various factors, I therefore consider that the state aid approach is much more appropriate for analysing state financing of public services. Like arts 77 and 92 of the Treaty, this approach is based on a 'gross' definition of aid. It thus makes it possible to ensure the coherence of a the Treaty provisions concerning state aid and to preserve the effect of the derogating provisions (namely arts 77, 90(2) and art 92(2) and (3) of the Treaty).

<sup>46</sup> To use the expression of D Triantafyllou, cited in footnote 33, above (p 32).

<sup>47</sup> See also, on this point, my opinion of 19 March 2002 in the present case (paras 76–85).

<sup>48</sup> The importance of this field is illustrated by the Protocol on the system of public broadcasting in the member states annexed to the Treaty of Amsterdam amending the Treaty on European Union, the Treaties establishing the European Communities and certain related acts (OJ 1997 C340 p 109).

C—The procedural obligations in art 93(3) of the Treaty

53. The third argument of the parties relates to the procedural obligations laid down in art 93(3) of the Treaty.

54. Before analysing this argument, a short summary of certain aspects of the Community procedure for reviewing aid will be of use.

55. It is common ground that the Commission has exclusive competence to examine the compatibility of aid with the common market under arts 92 and 93 of the Treaty<sup>49</sup>. That competence is justified by the fact that examining the c compatibility of aid involves assessments of an economic and social nature which must be made in a Community context<sup>50</sup>. It is also justified by the fact that aid constitutes a sensitive area both for those concerned and for the functioning of the common market. The authors of the Treaty did not therefore wish to entrust the member states with the function of assessing whether an aid presents risk for the common market. They entrusted that assessment to the European institution responsible for representing the Community interest<sup>51</sup>.

56. In the Banco Exterior de España case<sup>52</sup> the court expressly held (at para 17) that the Commission's power extends to aid to undertakings entrusted with public service functions for the purposes of art 90(2) of the Treaty. It follows that national courts do not have jurisdiction to apply art 90(2) in the field of aid<sup>53</sup>. Only the Commission may authorise an aid under that provision.

57. Under art 93(3) of the Treaty, the member states are obliged to notify their plans for introducing or altering aids (obligation to notify). They cannot implement those plans without the prior authorisation of the Commission (obligation to suspend). According to settled case law<sup>54</sup>, these procedural obligations constitute the safeguard of the aid review machinery, which in turn is essential for ensuring the functioning of the common market.

58. In France v European Commission<sup>55</sup> the court held that the notification and suspension obligations apply to aid to undertakings entrusted with the operation of services of general interest within the meaning of art 90(2) of the Treaty. It follows that aid granted to public services in breach of those obligations constitutes 'illegal' aid.

49 See Firma Steinike und Weinlig v Germany Case 78/76 [1977] ECR I-595 (paras 9, 10).

50 See, inter alia, the Philip Morris case, cited in footnote 40, above (para 24), the Deufil case, cited in footnote 26, above (para 18), France v EC Commission Case C-301/87, cited in footnote 20, above (para 49), Belgium v EC Commission Case C-142/87, cited in footnote 18, above (para 56) and Matra SA v EC Commission Case C-225/91 [1993] ECR I-3203 (para 24).

51 See M Waelbroeck and A Frignani 'Commentaire J Megret—Le droit de la CE' Vol 4, Concurrence (1997, 2nd edn) pp 324–325 (para 308).

52 Cited in footnote 27, above.

53 By contrast, they retain jurisdiction to apply that provision in the other fields of the Treaty, such as competition law or the freedom to provide services (see, inter alia, Ahmed Saeed Flugreisen v Zentrale zur Bekämpfung unlauteren Wettbewerbs eV Case 66/86 [1989] ECR 803 (paras 55–57), Elliniki Radiophonia Tileorassi AE v Dimotiki Etairia Piroforissis Case C-260/89 [1991] ECR I-2925 (para 34), Criminal proceedings against Corbeau Case C-320/91 [1993] ECR I-2533 (para 20) and Municipality of Almelo v Energiebedrijf IJsselmij NV Case C-393/92 [1994] ECR I-1477 (para 50).

54 See, for example, Adria-Wien Pipeline GmbH v Finanzlandesdirektion für Kärnten Case C-143/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 306, [2001] ECR I-8365 (para 25).

55 Case C-332/98 [2000] ECR I-4833 (paras 27–32).

59. At Community level, this means that the Commission can instruct the state to suspend the payment of aid or provisionally recover the aid until it reaches a decision on compatibility<sup>56</sup>. At national level, this means that a court may (1) order recovery of the aid, (2) declare unlawful the act instituting the aid and the implementing measures, and (3) order the competent authorities to make good any damage which may have been caused by the immediate payment of aid<sup>57</sup>.

60. In the present case, the parties submit that the procedural obligations laid down in art 93(3) of the Treaty are liable to paralyse the functioning of public services in the member states. They state that the procedure for examining aid is relatively long and that, for certain kinds of public services, it is difficult or even impossible to wait for the Commission's authorisation. They also state that, because of the number of measures concerned, the procedural obligations are liable to paralyse action by the Commission in the field of state aid.

61. The court previously had occasion to consider arguments of this type in the France v Commission case cited above. In that case the French government submitted that the obligation to suspend produces serious risks for the continuity of public services<sup>58</sup>. The court expressly rejected that argument, pointing out that the procedural obligations are the safeguard of the machinery for the review of aid in Community law<sup>59</sup>.

62. In any event, I consider that the fears expressed by the parties are unfounded. In my view, the procedural obligations are not liable to disturb the functioning of public services, for several reasons.

63. First, the procedural obligations do not apply to all state measures. They apply only to measures which satisfy the criteria of art 92(1) of the Treaty. In practice, this means that in certain essential fields state financing of public services is not caught by the procedural obligations. This applies inter alia to the following measures<sup>60</sup>:

—measures financing activities which are not of an economic nature<sup>61</sup>: this is the case of activities within the exercise of public powers of the state (such as

<sup>56</sup> See art 11 of Council Regulation (EC) 659/1999 (laying down detailed rules for the application of art 93 of the EC Treaty) (OJ 1999 L83 p 1).

<sup>57</sup> For a more detailed description of these consequences, see my opinion in Belgium v European Commission Case C-197/99 P [2003] ECR I-8461 (para 74 and the references cited).

<sup>58</sup> See paras 27–30.

<sup>59</sup> See footnote above (paras 31, 32). See also the reasons stated by Advocate General La Pergola in this case (paras 22–24 of his opinion).

<sup>60</sup> See also, on this point, A Alexis, cited in footnote 6, above (point A).

<sup>61</sup> To fall within the prohibition laid down in art 92(1) of the Treaty, state measures must of course favour certain undertakings or certain economic activities.

a security, justice, foreign relations, etc)<sup>62</sup>, compulsory social security schemes<sup>63</sup>, the field of compulsory education<sup>64</sup>, and other fields within the essential functions of the state;

—measures not liable to affect trade between member states: this is the case of the financing of certain local or regional public services (such as swimming pools, leisure centres, crèches, cultural centres or hospitals)<sup>65</sup>. This also applies

b where the amount of aid does not exceed the threshold of €100,000 fixed by the Commission in its regulation on de minimis aid<sup>66</sup>.

64. Second, for measures coming under art 92(1) of the Treaty, the Commission is subject to certain time limits.

c 65. Thus the Commission is obliged to carry out a preliminary examination of the aid within two months of its notification<sup>67</sup>. This time limit is strict and cannot be extended by the Commission unilaterally<sup>68</sup>. If no decision has been taken by the expiry of the time limit, the member state concerned may implement the aid, subject to informing the Commission beforehand<sup>69</sup>. In that case the aid is deemed to have been authorised<sup>70</sup>. It comes under the rules for existing aid<sup>71</sup> and may thus continue to be paid as long as the Commission does

d not find that it is incompatible with the common market<sup>72</sup>.

66. The parties appear to consider that even a period of two months might be too long for certain types of public services. Even assuming that this may be so<sup>73</sup>, certain mechanisms make it possible to take account of such exceptional situations.

e 67. Article 5 of the EC Treaty (now art 10 EC) imposes a duty of sincere co-operation between the Community institutions and the member states<sup>74</sup>. By f 63 See Poucet v Assurances Générales de France (AGF), Pistre v Caisse Autonome Nationale de Compensation de L'Assurance Régionale des Artisans (CANCARA) Joined cases C-159/91 and C-160/91 [1993] ECR 637 (para 18) and Cisal di Battistello Venanzio & Co SAS v Istituto Nazionale per l'Assicurazione contro gli Infortuni sul Lavoro (INAIL) Case C-218/00 [2002] ECR I-691 (para 46).

62 See SAT Fluggesellschaft mbH v European Organisation for the Safety of Air Navigation (Eurocontrol) Case C-364/92 [1994] ECR I-43 (para 30) and Diego Cali & Figli Srl v Servizi Ecologici Porto Di Genova SpA (SEPG) Case C-343/95 [1997] ECR I-1547 (paras 22, 23).

64 See Commission Decision 2001/C 333/03 (authorisation for state aid pursuant to arts 87 and 88 of the EC Treaty (public grants to professional sports clubs)) (OJ 2001 C333 p 6). The text of the decision is available on the internet at http://europa.eu.int/comm/secretariat\_general/sgb/state\_aids/industrie/n118-00.pdf.

g 65 See Commission press release IP/00/1509.

66 See Commission Regulation (EC) 69/2001 (on the application of arts 87 and 88 of the EC Treaty to de minimis aid) (OJ 2001 L10 p 30). Under art 1(a) of the regulation, however, it does not apply to the transport sector.

67 See Lorenz (Gebr) GmbH v Germany Case 120/73 [1973] ECR 1471 (para 4) and art 4(5) of Regulation 659/1999.

h 68 See Austria v European Commission Case C-99/98 [2001] ECR I-1101 (paras 73–76).

69 See the Lorenz case, cited in footnote 67, above (para 4) and art 4(6) of Regulation 659/1999.

70 See art 4(6) of Regulation 659/1999.

71 See Spain v EC Commission Case C-312/90 [1992] ECR I-4117 (para 18).

i 72 See the Banco Exterior de España case, cited in footnote 27, above (para 20). Similarly, where the Commission opens the formal examination procedure, its final decision must be taken within 18 months from the opening of the procedure. On the expiry of that time limit the member state may require the Commission to take its decision on the basis of the information available to it (see art 7(6) and (7) of Regulation 659/1999).

73 It appears that, when the authorities of a member state organise a public service in a particular sector (for example, distribution of mail, an air link or a railway service), the periods needed for organising the service are generally compatible with the time limits imposed on the Commission for the examination of aid.

74 See the order in Zwartveld Case C-2/88 Imm [1990] ECR I-3365 (para 17).

virtue of that provision, the authorities of the member state and the Commission might thus be induced to give priority treatment to a case of particular urgency or find some other appropriate solution.

68. Third, it should be remembered that under art 93(3) of the Treaty the member states can notify aid schemes to the Commission. Aid schemes are national provisions under which, without further implementing measures being required, individual aid awards may be made to undertakings defined in a general and abstract manner<sup>75</sup>.

69. The advantage of this machinery is that member states obtain a single approval from the Commission on the basis of the general characteristics of the scheme. Member states thus avoid the obligation of subsequently notifying each individual case in which the scheme is applied. In its report for the Laeken European Council<sup>76</sup>, the Commission expressly accepted that the member states can notify 'compensation schemes' in the field of financing of public services.

70. Fourth, under art 94 of the EC Treaty (now art 89 EC), the Council may adopt regulations for exemptions by category in the field of state aid. The Council may also authorise the Commission to adopt such regulations<sup>77</sup>.

71. Regulations for exemption by category define the conditions under which certain categories of aid are to be regarded as compatible with the common market. Their main advantage lies in the fact that aid granted in accordance with the provisions of those regulations is exempted from the obligation to notify under art 93(3) of the Treaty. Member states can therefore implement their aid plans without waiting for individual authorisation from the Commission.

72. On this point, the Laeken European Council had already asked the Commission to set up a 'policy framework' for aid for public services<sup>78</sup>. In addition, the Barcelona<sup>79</sup> and Seville<sup>80</sup> European Councils expressly raised the possibility of the Commission submitting a regulation for exemption by category in that field. The Commission replied that it would start by setting up a Community framework, but would adopt an exemption regulation in so far as that was justified<sup>81</sup>. The Commission said that it would be able to draw up that framework in the course of 2002<sup>82</sup>. However, it suspended work pending the delivery of the court's judgment in the present case<sup>83</sup>.

73. It follows that, should the court decide to adopt the state aid approach in the present case, the Commission and the Council ought to be in a position to adopt a regulation for exemption by category within an acceptable period of

75 See art 1(d) of Regulation 659/1999.

76 Cited in footnote 4, above (point 26).

77 See, for example, Council Regulation (EC) 994/98 (on the application of arts 92 and 93 of the Treaty establishing the European Community to certain categories of horizontal state aid) (OJ 1998 L142 p 1).

78 See the Presidency conclusions, cited in footnote 4, above (point 26).

79 See the Presidency conclusions, cited in footnote 4, above (point 42).

80 See the Presidency conclusions, cited in footnote 4, above (point 54).

81 See the Commission's report on services of general interest for the Laeken European Council, cited in footnote 4, above (points 28, 29).

82 See footnote above (point 28).

83 See Commission report of 16 June 2002 on the status of work on the guidelines for state aid and services of general economic interest, cited in footnote 4, above (points 10, 16) and Commission report of 27 November 2002 on the state of play in the work on the guidelines for state aid and services of general economic interest, cited in footnote 4, above (point 3).

a time. In that case, state measures intended to offset the cost of public service obligations would quite simply be exempted from the obligation to notify. The member states would then be able to put their financing plans into practice without waiting for an individual exemption from the Commission. The situation would thus be the same as that which has been applied since 1969 in the field of public land transport services<sup>84</sup>.

b 74. Having regard to all the above factors, I consider that the fears expressed by the parties are unfounded. In my opinion, the state aid approach is not liable to upset the functioning of public services in the member states, nor to paralyse action by the Commission in the field of state aid.

c D—The quid pro quo approach

75. The second group of parties propose that the court adopt the quid pro quo approach developed by Advocate General Jacobs in his opinion in the GEMO case<sup>85</sup>.

d 76. Under that approach, the court would distinguish between two categories of situation. The first category would comprise cases in which there is a direct and manifest link between the state financing and clearly defined public service obligations. In those cases the sums paid by the state to the recipient undertaking constitute not aid within the meaning of art 92(1) of the Treaty but the consideration for the public service obligations assumed by the undertaking.

e 77. Conversely, the second category of situation would cover cases where there is no direct and manifest link between the state financing and the public service obligations, as well as cases where those obligations are not clearly defined. In those cases the sums paid by the public authorities constitute aid which as such is subject to the procedural obligations laid down in art 93(3) of the Treaty.

f 78. For my part, I consider that this approach raises essentially two series of difficulties.

79. First, the quid pro quo approach appears difficult to reconcile with the court's case law on state aid.

g 80. According to settled case law, the court considers that, to determine whether a state measure constitutes aid, only the effects of the measure are to be taken into consideration<sup>86</sup>.

81. The other elements characterising the measure are not relevant at the stage of determining the existence of aid. This applies to the form in which the aid is granted<sup>87</sup>, the legal status of the measure in national law<sup>88</sup>, the fact

h <sup>84</sup> See Council Regulation (EEC) 1191/69 (on action by member states concerning the obligations inherent in the concept of a public service in transport by rail, road and inland waterway) (OJ English Sp Edn 1969(I) p 276), as amended by Council Regulation (EEC) 1893/91 (OJ 1991 L169 p 1).

<sup>85</sup> Cited in footnote 3, above (paras 117–129).

i <sup>86</sup> See, inter alia, Italy v EEC Commission Case 173/73 [1974] ECR 709 (para 27), the Deufil case, cited in footnote 26, above (para 8), Belgium v European Commission Case C-56/93, cited in footnote 22, above (para 79), France v European Commission Case C-241/94 [1996] ECR I-4551 (para 20) and Belgium v European Commission Case C-5/01 [2002] ECR I-11991 (paras 45, 46).

<sup>87</sup> See SA Intermills v EC Commission Case 323/82 [1984] ECR 3809 (para 31), Belgium v EC Commission Case C-142/87, cited in footnote 18, above (para 13) and Belgium v EC Commission Case 40/85 [1986] ECR 2321 (para 12).

<sup>88</sup> See Commission Decision (EEC) 93/349 (concerning aid provided by the United Kingdom government to British Aerospace for its purchase of Rover Group Holdings over and above those that the measure is part of an aid scheme<sup>89</sup>, the reasons for the measure<sup>90</sup>, the objectives of the measure<sup>91</sup> and the intentions of the public authorities and the recipient undertaking<sup>92</sup>. These elements are of no relevance because they are not liable to affect competition. They may, on the other hand, become relevant at a later stage of the analysis, in order to assess the compatibility of the aid from the point of view of the derogating provisions of the Treaty<sup>93</sup>.

82. The quid pro quo approach amounts to introducing such elements into the actual definition of aid.

83. The first criterion suggested consists in examining whether there is a 'direct and manifest link' between the state funding and the public service obligations. In practice, this amounts to requiring the existence of a public service contract awarded after a public procurement procedure<sup>94</sup>. Similarly, the second criterion suggested consists in examining whether the public service obligations are 'clearly defined'. In practice, this amounts to verifying that there are laws, regulations or contractual provisions which specify the nature and content of the undertaking's obligations<sup>95</sup>.

84. In those circumstances, the quid pro quo approach departs from the court's case law on state aid. It amounts to defining aid no longer by reference solely to the effects of the measure, but by reference to criteria of a purely formal or procedural nature. At theoretical level, it means that the same measure may be classified as aid or 'non-aid' depending on whether a contract (of public service) or a legal instrument (defining the public service obligations) exists, although it produces identical effects on competition.

85. Second, the quid pro quo approach does not appear to be capable of guaranteeing a sufficient degree of legal certainty.

86. The principal criterion underlying this approach is defined in a vague and imprecise fashion. It is clear that this is deliberate and is intended to provide the flexibility needed to comprehend a wide range of situations<sup>96</sup>. Nevertheless, it is extremely difficult to know what is covered by the expression 'direct and manifest link'. Moreover, apart from the case of a public service contract concluded after an award procedure, none of the parties was able to provide a single specific example of this kind of link between state financing and public service obligations<sup>97</sup>.

---

authorised in Commission Decision (EEC) 89/58 authorising a maximum aid to this operation subject to certain conditions) (OJ 1993 L143 p 7) point IX.

89 See the Cityflyer Express case, cited in footnote 20, above (para 94).

90 See the judgments cited in footnote 86, above.

91 As above.

92 See Commission Decision (EEC) 92/11 (concerning aid provided by the Derbyshire County Council to Toyota Motor Corporation, an undertaking producing motor vehicles) (OJ 1992 L6 p 36) point V.

93 Thus certain categories of aid are compatible with the common market only if they take a particular form (see, for example, Commission Notice 97/C 238/02 on Community guidelines on state aid for rescuing and restructuring firms in difficulty (OJ 1997 C283 p 2) point 3.1, first indent).

94 See the opinion of Advocate General Jacobs in the GEMO case, cited in footnote 3, above (para 119).

95 See footnote above (para 120).

96 See the opinion of Advocate General Jacobs in the GEMO case, cited in footnote 3, above (para 129), and the opinion of Advocate General Stix-Hackl in the Enirisorse case, cited in footnote 5, above (para 157).

97 In fact, the sole concrete and 'operational' criterion which can be set in the context of the quid pro quo approach is the requirement of a public service contract concluded after an award procedure. The various parties concur, however, in admitting that such a requirement is disproportionate (see also the opinion of Advocate General Jacobs in the GEMO case, cited in footnote 3 (para 129), and the opinion of Advocate General Stix-Hackl in the Enirisorse case, cited in footnote 5, above a 87. In those circumstances, the expression 'direct and manifest link'—and hence the very concept of state aid—will be likely to receive widely differing interpretations. These interpretations may also vary according to the cultural (or even personal) attitudes of the various bodies responsible for applying the Treaty rules on state aid.

b 88. At practical level, such a divergence of interpretation may have considerable repercussions.

c 89. Member states will no longer be able to identify with precision the measures which must be notified to the Commission<sup>98</sup>. Nor will undertakings know whether they can rely on the lawfulness of the state financing. National courts too will have difficulty in knowing whether to apply the court's case law on the direct effect of art 93(3) of the Treaty. The Commission, finally, will no longer be able to determine with certainty whether it can start a procedure against an instance of state financing.

d 90. In short, the only way to define the term 'direct and manifest link' will be on a case-by-case basis. It will necessarily have to be refined by the court in the course of the cases brought before it. That is not a satisfactory outcome either for the political institutions of the Union or for the court itself.

e 91. First, one of the main concerns expressed by the European Councils of Nice<sup>99</sup>, Laeken<sup>100</sup> and Barcelona<sup>101</sup> is to ensure increased legal certainty in the field of the application of the law on aid to services in the general interest. Again, it is known that the Commission has suspended its work in this field until the court gives judgment in the present case<sup>102</sup>. So it will not be adequate to adopt a solution which necessarily has to be defined casuistically by judicial decisions. In my opinion, it is essential to adopt a clear and precise position, so as to allow the institutions to define Community policy in the field of state financing of public services, and thus to ensure the legal certainty which is needed in such a sensitive field.

f 92. Second, a case-by-case solution will inevitably have the effect of placing national courts in a position of 'dependence' as against the court. As the concept of a 'direct and manifest link' (or any other similar expression) will have to be defined more precisely in the case law, national courts will necessarily have to use the preliminary ruling procedure to interpret the concept of aid. Such an outcome appears hard to reconcile with the purpose of the procedure set up by art 177 of the EC Treaty (now art 234 EC)<sup>103</sup>. In any event, there is a risk that it will lead to an unnecessary growth in the number of references to the court for preliminary rulings.

h (para 157)). Furthermore, it must be noted that, in its present state, Council Directive (EEC) 92/50 (relating to the co-ordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts) (OJ 1992 L209 p 1) does not apply to public service concessions. It is therefore difficult to lay down such a judge-made requirement in the context of the Treaty provisions concerning state aid.

98 Member states might even be tempted to rely on the quid pro quo approach to justify a failure to notify financing measures to the Commission (see, to that effect, C Rizza, cited in footnote 6, above (p 11)).

99 See the Presidency conclusions, cited in footnote 4, above (point 47 and Annex II).

100 See the Presidency conclusions, cited in footnote 4, above (point 26).

i 101 See the Presidency conclusions, cited in footnote 4, above (point 42).

102 See the Commission report of 16 June 2002 on the status of work on the guidelines for state aid and services of general economic interest, cited in footnote 4, above (points 10, 16), and Commission report of 27 November 2002 on the state of play in the work on the guidelines for state aid and services of general economic interest, cited in footnote 4, above (point 3).

103 See, on this point, the opinion of Advocate General Jacobs in Proceedings brought by Danner Case C-136/00 [2002] STC 1283, [2002] ECR I-8147.

93. The state aid approach, for its part, makes it possible to avoid these drawbacks. a

94. As I have said, this approach consists in considering that the financial advantages granted by the authorities of a member state to offset the cost of the public service obligations they impose on an undertaking constitute aid within the meaning of art 92(1) of the Treaty. In that it sets out a clear and precise principle, this approach enables all those concerned (public authorities, private operators, national courts, Community institutions) to identify with precision the measures which fall within the scope of the Treaty rules on state aid. b

95. Moreover, the principles which underlie the state aid approach can be stated by the court in a single judgment. This approach is not therefore likely to entail an increased number of references to the court for preliminary rulings. c

96. In view of the above factors, the state aid approach makes it possible to ensure increased legal certainty and transparency in the field of state financing of public services. d

III—CONCLUSION

97. Having regard to all the above considerations, and to those which I set out in my earlier opinion, I therefore propose that the court rule as follows:

(1) Financial advantages granted by the authorities of a member state to offset the cost of the public service obligations they impose on an undertaking constitute state aid within the meaning of art 92(1) of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, art 87(1) EC). e

(2) Measures instituting the advantages referred to in point 1 above are subject to the notification and suspension obligations laid down in art 93(3) of the EC Treaty (now art 88(3) EC). f

(3) Article 90(2) of the EC Treaty (now art 86(2) EC) must be interpreted as not having direct effect in the field of state aid.

24 July 2003. The COURT OF JUSTICE delivered the following judgment.

1. By order of 6 April 2000, received at the court on 14 July 2000, the Bundesverwaltungsgericht (Federal Administrative Court) referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) a question on the interpretation of art 92 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, art 87 EC), art 77 of the EC Treaty (now art 73 EC), and Council Regulation (EEC) 1191/69 (on action by member states concerning the obligations inherent in the concept of a public service in transport by rail, road and inland waterway) (OJ English Sp Edn 1969 (I) p 276), as amended by Council Regulation (EEC) 1893/91 (OJ 1991 L169 p 1). g

2. The question arose in proceedings between Altmark Trans GmbH (Altmark Trans) and Nahverkehrsgesellschaft Altmark GmbH (Nahverkehrsgesellschaft) concerning the grant to the former by Regierungspräsidium Magdeburg (Magdeburg regional government, the Regierungspräsidium) of licences for scheduled bus transport services in the Landkreis of Stendal (Germany) and public subsidies for operating those services. h
i

a LEGAL CONTEXT*Community law*

3. Article 92(1) of the EC Treaty provides:

‘Save as otherwise provided in this Treaty, any aid granted by a Member State or through State resources in any form whatsoever which distorts or threatens to distort competition by favouring certain undertakings or the production of certain goods shall, insofar as it affects trade between Member States, be incompatible with the common market.’

b*c*d*e

4. Article 74 of the EC Treaty (now art 70 EC), which appears in Title IV of Part Three, on transport, provides that the objectives of the Treaty are, in matters governed by that Title, to be pursued by the member states within the framework of a common transport policy.

5. Article 77 of the EC Treaty, which appears in the said Title IV, provides that aids which meet the needs of co-ordination of transport or represent reimbursement for the discharge of certain obligations inherent in the concept of a public service are compatible with the Treaty.

6. Regulation 1191/69 is divided into six sections, the first of which contains general provisions (arts 1 and 2), the second concerns common principles for the termination or maintenance of public service obligations (arts 3 to 8), the third deals with the application to passenger transport of transport rates and conditions imposed in the interests of one or more particular categories of persons (art 9), the fourth concerns common compensation procedures (arts 10 to 13), the fifth concerns public service contracts (art 14), and the sixth contains final provisions (arts 15 to 20).

7. Article 1 of the regulation provides:

‘1. This Regulation shall apply to transport undertakings which operate services in transport by rail, road and inland waterway.

Member States may exclude from the scope of this Regulation any undertakings whose activities are confined exclusively to the operation of urban, suburban or regional services.

2. For the purposes of this Regulation:

—urban and suburban services means transport services meeting the needs of an urban centre or conurbation, and transport needs between it and surrounding areas,

—regional services means transport services operated to meet the transport needs of a region.

3. The competent authorities of the Member States shall terminate all obligations inherent in the concept of a public service as defined in this Regulation imposed on transport by rail, road and inland waterway.

4. In order to ensure adequate transport services which in particular take into account social and environmental factors and town and country planning, or with a view to offering particular fares to certain categories of passenger, the competent authorities of the Member States may conclude public service contracts with a transport undertaking. The conditions and details of operation of such contracts are laid down in Section V.

5. However, the competent authorities of the Member States may maintain or impose the public service obligations referred to in Article 2 for urban, suburban and regional passenger transport services. The conditions and details of operation, including methods of compensation, are laid down in Sections II, III and IV ...

f*g*h*i

6. Furthermore, the competent authorities of a Member State may decide not to apply paragraphs 3 and 4 in the field of passenger transport to the transport rates and conditions imposed in the interests of one or more particular categories of person.' a

8. Article 6(2) of Regulation 1191/69 reads as follows:

'Decisions to maintain a public service obligation or part thereof, or to terminate it at the end of a specified period, shall provide for compensation to be granted in respect of the financial burdens resulting therefrom; the amount of such compensation shall be determined in accordance with the common procedures laid down in Articles 10 to 13.' b

9. Article 9(1) of that regulation provides: c

'The amount of compensation in respect of financial burdens devolving upon undertakings by reason of the application to passenger transport of transport rates and conditions imposed in the interests of one or more particular categories of person shall be determined in accordance with the common procedures laid down in Articles 11 to 13.' d

10. Article 17(2) of the regulation provides:

'Compensation paid pursuant to this Regulation shall be exempt from the preliminary information procedure laid down in Article 93(3) of the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community.

Member States shall promptly forward to the Commission details, classified by category of obligation, of compensation payments made in respect of financial burdens devolving upon transport undertakings by reason of the maintenance of the public service obligations set out in Article 2 or by reason of the application to passenger transport of transport rates and conditions imposed in the interests of one or more particular categories of person.' e
f

National legislation

11. The Verordnung zur Festlegung des Anwendungsbereiches der Verordnung (EWG) Nr 1191/69 in der Fassung der Verordnung (EWG) Nr 1893/91 im Straßenpersonenverkehr (Regulation determining the scope of Regulation (EEC) 1191/69 as amended by Regulation (EEC) 1893/91 in passenger transport by road) of the Federal Minister for Transport of 31 July 1992 (BGBl 1992 I, p 1442), in the version as amended on 29 November 1994 (BGBl 1994 I, p 3630), excludes in general until 31 December 1995 the application of Regulation 1191/69 to undertakings whose activity is confined exclusively to the operation of urban, suburban or regional services. g
h

12. The provisions of para 2(1) in conjunction with para 1(1) of the Personenbeförderungsgesetz (Law on passenger transport, the PBefG) provide that the transport of passengers by road vehicles on scheduled services is subject in Germany to the grant of a licence. That licence requires the operator to charge only the fares authorised by the authority which issues the licence, to comply with the timetable which has been approved, and to observe his statutory obligations in respect of operation and transport. i

13. Until 31 December 1995 the conditions for the grant of a licence for a scheduled bus transport service were determined solely by para 13 of the PBefG. That provision imposes conditions inter alia as to the financial solvency and the reliability of the transport undertaking and states that an application

- a for a licence is to be refused if the service in question would affect the public interest in transport. If several undertakings wish to provide the same transport services, the authorities must, under para 13(3), take reasonable account of the circumstance that those services have been operated properly for many years by one of those undertakings.
- b 14. By para 6(116) of the Eisenbahnneuordnungsgesetz (Law on reorganisation of the railways) of 27 December 1993 (BGBl 1993 I, p 2378), the German legislature introduced with effect from 1 January 1996 a distinction between transport operated on a commercial basis and transport operated in the public interest for the purpose of granting licences for urban, suburban and regional scheduled public transport services.
- c 15. The first sentence of para 8(4) of the PBefG lays down the principle that urban, suburban and regional public transport services must be provided commercially.
16. The second sentence of that subparagraph defines commercially operated transport services as those whose costs are covered by operating receipts, income under statutory rules on compensation and reimbursement in connection with fares and timetables, and other income of the undertaking as defined in commercial law. The conditions for granting licences for commercially operated services are defined in para 13 of the PBefG, as stated in para 13, above.
- d 17. The third sentence of para 8(4) of the PBefG provides that Regulation 1191/69 in the version in force from time to time must be referred to where an adequate transport service cannot be provided commercially. The conditions for granting licences for transport services provided in the public interest under that regulation are defined in para 13a of the PBefG.
- e 18. According to that provision, a licence must be granted where this is necessary for the implementation of a transport service on the basis of an act of the authorities or a contract within the meaning of Regulation 1191/69 and is the solution which entails the least cost to the community.
- f

THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS

19. The main proceedings concern the grant by the Regierungspräsidium to Altmark Trans of licences for scheduled bus transport services in the Landkreis of Stendal.
- g 20. Licences had originally been granted to Altmark Trans for the period from 25 September 1990 to 19 September 1994. By decision of 27 October 1994, it was granted new licences to run to 31 October 1996.
21. According to the order for reference, the Regierungspräsidium at the same time rejected the applications by Nahverkehrsgesellschaft for licences to operate those services. As grounds for its decision, the Regierungspräsidium stated that Altmark Trans satisfied the conditions for grant of a licence in points 1 and 2 of para 13(1) of the PBefG. As a long-standing operator, Altmark Trans enjoyed the protection of acquired status under para 13(3). That protection implies that the operation of a scheduled transport service by the existing operator may constitute a better offer of transport than an offer from a new applicant. In fact, there was no such new offer. With a shortfall of DEM 0.58 per timetabled kilometre, Altmark Trans required the lowest additional financing from the public authorities.
- h 22. Following a complaint by Altmark Trans, the Regierungspräsidium extended the licences to 31 October 2002, by decision of 30 July 1996.
- i

23. Nahverkehrsgesellschaft brought a complaint against the decision of 27 October 1994, submitting that Altmark Trans did not satisfy the requirements of para 13 of the PBefG. It was not an economically viable undertaking, since it was unable to survive without public subsidies. The licences granted to it were therefore unlawful. It was also not correct that Altmark Trans needed the least subsidy. By decision of 29 June 1995, the Regierungspräsidium rejected the complaint. a

24. Nahverkehrsgesellschaft brought proceedings against the decisions of 27 October 1994 and 30 July 1996 before the Verwaltungsgericht Magdeburg (Administrative Court, Magdeburg) (Germany), which dismissed the action. b

25. On appeal, the Oberverwaltungsgericht Sachsen-Anhalt (Higher Administrative Court of Saxony-Anhalt) (Germany) allowed Nahverkehrsgesellschaft's application and therefore set aside the issue of licences to Altmark Trans. It considered in particular that at the time when the decision of 30 July 1996 was taken the financial solvency of Altmark Trans was no longer guaranteed, as it needed subsidies from the Landkreis of Stendal for operating the services licensed. It further held that those subsidies were not compatible with Community law on state aid, in particular Regulation 1191/69. c

26. On this point, the Oberverwaltungsgericht observed that the Federal Republic of Germany had made use of the possibility allowed by Regulation 1191/69 of excluding undertakings whose activities are confined exclusively to the operation of urban, suburban or regional transport services from the scope of the regulation only up to 31 December 1995. It therefore held that after that date the public subsidies in question were authorised only if the conditions laid down by that regulation were satisfied. Among those conditions was the need to impose public service obligations either by contract or by an act of the competent authorities. Since the Landkreis of Stendal had neither concluded a contract with Altmark Trans nor adopted an administrative act in accordance with the provisions of the regulation, the Oberverwaltungsgericht considered that, from 1 January 1996, the Landkreis had no longer been authorised to subsidise Altmark Trans to operate the services covered by the licences granted. d

27. Altmark Trans appealed on a point of law (Revision) to the Bundesverwaltungsgericht against the decision of the Oberverwaltungsgericht. The Bundesverwaltungsgericht considers that the provisions of para 8(4) of the PBefG raise the question whether the operation of urban, suburban or regional scheduled transport services which cannot be operated profitably on the basis of operating income and therefore necessarily depend on public subsidies may, in national law, be regarded as commercial, or whether it must be regarded as operation in the public interest. e

28. In this respect, the Bundesverwaltungsgericht considers that the public subsidies in question may be covered by the expression 'other income of the undertaking as defined in commercial law' in the second sentence of para 8(4) of the PBefG. Having recourse to the normal methods of interpreting national law, it reaches the conclusion that the fact that public subsidies are necessary does not exclude the possibility that the transport services are provided commercially. f

29. However, that court expresses doubt as to whether arts 77 and 92 of the Treaty and Regulation 1191/69 necessarily lead to the interpretation of the second sentence of para 8(4) of the PBefG consistent with Community law followed by the Oberverwaltungsgericht. In view of the complexity of the g

h

i

- a system of prohibitions, exceptions and exceptions to the exceptions, it considers that the point needs to be clarified by the court.

THE QUESTION REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

- b 30. Since it considered that, in the case before it, the extent of the Community rules was uncertain and that a preliminary ruling was needed for it to give judgment in the main proceedings, the Bundesverwaltungsgericht decided to stay the proceedings and refer the following question to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

- c 'Do Articles [77 and 92 of the EC Treaty], read in conjunction with Regulation (EEC) No 1191/69, as amended by Regulation (EEC) No 1893/91, preclude the application of a national provision which permits licences for scheduled services in local public transport to be granted in respect of services which are necessarily dependent on public subsidies without regard being had to Sections II, III and IV of that regulation?'

- d 31. The Bundesverwaltungsgericht specified that the question was to be understood as comprising the following three parts:

- e '(1) Are subsidies to compensate for deficits in local public transport subject at all to the prohibition on aid contained in Article [92(1) of the EC Treaty] or are they incapable from the outset of affecting trade between Member States on account of their regional significance? Does this possibly depend on the specific location and significance of the relevant local transport area?

- f (2) Does Article [77 of the EC Treaty] generally enable the national legislature to permit public subsidies to compensate for deficits in local public transport without regard being had to Regulation (EEC) No 1191/69?

- g (3) Does Regulation (EEC) No 1191/69 enable the national legislature to permit the operation of a scheduled service in local public transport which is necessarily dependent on public subsidies without regard being had to Sections II, III and IV of that regulation, and to require application of those provisions only where adequate transport provision is otherwise impossible? Does the ability of the national legislature to do so derive in particular from the fact that under the second subparagraph of Article 1(1) of Regulation (EEC) No 1191/69, as amended in 1991, it has the right to exclude local public transport undertakings completely from the scope of the regulation?'

h PRELIMINARY OBSERVATIONS

- i 32. In the main proceedings, the grant of licences to Altmark Trans is challenged only to the extent that that company needed public subsidies to discharge the public service obligations deriving from those licences. The dispute thus relates essentially to the question whether the public subsidies thus received by Altmark Trans were lawfully granted.

33. Having found that the payment of subsidies to Altmark Trans for the commercial operation of the licences at issue in the main proceedings was not contrary to national law, the Bundesverwaltungsgericht considers the compatibility of those subsidies with Community law.

34. The main provisions of the Treaty governing public subsidies are those on state aid, namely art 92 et seq of the EC Treaty. Article 77 of the EC Treaty creates an exception in the field of transport to the general rules applicable to state aid, by providing that aids which meet the needs of co-ordination of transport or represent reimbursement for the discharge of certain obligations inherent in the concept of a public service are compatible with the Treaty.

35. Regulation 1191/69 was adopted by the Council of the European Communities on the basis of arts 75 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, art 71 EC) and 94 of the EC Treaty (now art 89 EC), that is, on the basis both of the Treaty provisions relating to the common transport policy and of those relating to state aid.

36. Regulation 1191/69 establishes a system of Community rules applicable to public service obligations in the field of transport. However, under the second subparagraph of art 1(1) of the regulation, member states may exclude from its scope any undertakings whose activities are confined exclusively to the operation of urban, suburban or regional services.

37. In those circumstances, the first point to examine is whether Regulation 1191/69 is applicable to the transport services at issue in the main proceedings. Only if that is not the case will the application of the general provisions of the Treaty on state aid to the subsidies at issue in the main proceedings have to be considered. The third part of the national court's question should therefore be answered first.

THE THIRD PART OF THE QUESTION REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

38. By the third part of the question referred for a preliminary ruling, the national court essentially asks whether Regulation 1191/69, and more particularly the second subparagraph of art 1(1) thereof, may be interpreted as allowing a member state not to apply the regulation to the operation of urban, suburban or regional scheduled transport services which necessarily depend on public subsidies, and to limit its application to cases where the provision of an adequate transport service is not otherwise possible.

Observations submitted to the court

39. Altmark Trans, the Regierungspräsidium and Nahverkehrsgesellschaft submit that it cannot be deduced from Regulation 1191/69 that public subsidies for transport undertakings are consistent with Community law only if public service obligations within the meaning of that regulation have been imposed or a public service contract has been concluded in accordance with that regulation.

40. They observe in particular that the German legislature has drawn a distinction between transport services operated commercially and those operated in the public interest. By virtue of para 8(4) of the PBefG, Regulation 1191/69 applies only to transport services operated in the public interest. Transport services operated on a commercial basis do not therefore fall within the scope of the regulation.

41. Although since 1 January 1996 the German legislature no longer makes general use of the power to derogate provided for in the second subparagraph of art 1(1) of Regulation 1191/69, it has indirectly made an exception to the application of that regulation for the benefit of urban, suburban and regional transport services which are provided commercially. Since that regulation authorises a general derogation, it was also open to the legislature to provide for a partial derogation. The principle that he who can do more, can do less applies in this case.

- a 42. The Commission of the European Communities submits that, where urban, suburban and regional transport services have not been excluded from the scope of Regulation 1191/69 under the second subparagraph of art 1(1), the national legislature must regulate the operation of a scheduled service either by imposing public service obligations, in accordance with Sections II to IV of the regulation, or by means of contracts providing for those obligations and complying with the provisions of Section V of the regulation.
- b

Findings of the court

43. To answer this part of the question, it must first be determined whether Regulation 1191/69 imposes binding rules which the member states must comply with when they consider imposing public service obligations in the land transport sector.
- c
44. It is clear both from the preamble and from the body of that regulation that it does indeed impose binding rules on the member states.
45. According to the first recital in the preamble to Regulation 1191/69, one of the objectives of the common transport policy is to eliminate disparities resulting from obligations inherent in the concept of a public service imposed on transport undertakings by member states which are liable to cause substantial distortion to conditions of competition. The second recital states that it is therefore necessary to terminate the public service obligations defined in the regulation, although in certain cases it may be essential to maintain them in order to ensure the provision of adequate transport services.
- d
46. Article 1(3) of Regulation 1191/69 states that the competent authorities of the member states are to terminate all obligations inherent in the concept of a public service, as defined in the regulation, imposed on transport by rail, road and inland waterway. Under art 1(4), in order to ensure adequate transport services, taking into account in particular social and environmental factors and town and country planning, or with a view to offering particular fares to certain categories of passenger, those authorities may conclude public service contracts with a transport undertaking, in accordance with the conditions and details of operation laid down in Section V of the regulation. Article 1(5) then states, however, that the authorities may maintain or impose public service obligations for urban, suburban and regional passenger transport services, in accordance with the conditions and details of operation, including methods of compensation, laid down in Sections II to IV of the regulation.
- e
- f
- g
47. Consequently, in so far as the licences at issue in the main proceedings impose public service obligations and are accompanied by subsidies to help finance the performance of those obligations, the grant of those licences and subsidies was subject in principle to the provisions of Regulation 1191/69.
- h
48. However, the second subparagraph of art 1(1) of the regulation authorises member states to exclude from the scope of the regulation any undertakings whose activities are confined exclusively to the operation of urban, suburban or regional transport services.
49. Originally, until 31 December 1995, the Federal Republic of Germany made use of the derogation in the second subparagraph of art 1(1) of Regulation 1191/69 by expressly excluding in national legislation the application of that regulation to urban, suburban and regional transport undertakings.
- i
50. Since 1 January 1996, the German legislation no longer expressly provides for such a derogation. On the contrary, the regulation was declared applicable to the grant of licences for bus transport in Germany operated in the public interest by the third sentence of para 8(4) and para 13a of the PBefG. However, the German legislation does not expressly determine whether the regulation also applies to the grant of licences for bus transport operated commercially.

51. It must be examined whether the fact that Regulation 1191/69 does not apply to commercially operated services—assuming that to be the case—is contrary to that regulation.

52. Altmark Trans, the Regierungspräsidium und Nahverkehrsgesellschaft submit that, since the second subparagraph of art 1(1) of Regulation 1191/69 allows the application of that regulation to be excluded for an entire category of transport services, that provision must a fortiori allow a limited part of those services to be excluded from the application of the regulation.

53. It is to be remembered that, as explained in paras 44–47, above, Regulation 1191/69 establishes a system which the member states must comply with when they consider imposing public service obligations on undertakings in the land transport sector.

54. However, member states may, with respect to undertakings which operate urban, suburban or regional services, introduce a derogation from the provisions of Regulation 1191/69, under the second subparagraph of art 1(1) of the regulation. The German legislature made general use of this derogation until 31 December 1995.

55. In those circumstances, it must be concluded that the amendment to the PBefG which took effect on 1 January 1996 contributes to the implementation of the objectives pursued by Regulation 1191/69.

56. By that amendment, the German legislature introduced a distinction, as regards the grant of licences for passenger transport by bus, between commercial operation and operation in the public interest. By virtue of para 13a of the PBefG, Regulation 1191/69 became applicable to the grant of licences for operation in the public interest. That amendment to the PBefG thus cut down the scope of the derogation provided for in the second subparagraph of art 1(1) of the regulation. The German legislation thus came closer to the objectives pursued by that regulation.

57. It follows from those considerations that a member state may legitimately, on the basis of the power to derogate provided for in the second subparagraph of art 1(1) of Regulation 1191/69, not only exclude urban, suburban or regional scheduled services completely from the scope of that regulation, but may also apply that derogation in a more limited way. In other words, that provision in principle allows the German legislature to provide that, for transport services provided on a commercial basis, public service obligations may be imposed and subsidies granted without complying with the conditions and details of operation laid down in that regulation.

58. The national legislation must, however, clearly delimit the use made of that option of derogation, so as to make it possible to determine the situations in which the derogation applies and those in which Regulation 1191/69 applies.

59. As the court has consistently held, it is particularly important, in order to satisfy the requirement of legal certainty, that individuals should have the benefit of a clear and precise legal situation enabling them to ascertain the full extent of their rights and, where appropriate, to rely on them before the national courts (see EC Commission v Germany Case 29/84 [1985] ECR 1661 (para 23), EC Commission v Italy Case 363/85 [1987] ECR 1733 (para 7), EC Commission v Germany Case C-59/89 [1991] ECR I-2607 (para 18) and EC Commission v Greece Case C-236/95 [1996] ECR I-4459 (para 13)).

- a 60. The order for reference contains a number of points which suggest that those requirements of clarity may not have been complied with in the present case.
- b 61. Thus according to the order for reference, first, the commercial system of operation may apply also to undertakings which need public subsidies to operate licensed transport services. The national court stated, second, that—‘this right to choose, which was conferred on the operator by the legislature, [is] removed in practice in the case of scheduled services in local public transport which are largely in deficit, the need for public subsidies automatically resulting in such services being classified as in the public interest.’
- c 62. It appears to follow from the above that licences for transport services which need public subsidies for their operation may be subject to either the commercial or the public interest rules. If that were indeed the case, the provisions of the national legislation concerned would not determine
- d clearly and precisely the situations in which such licences fall within one or other category. In so far as Regulation 1191/69 does not apply to commercial operations, any uncertainty as to the dividing line between that and operations in the public interest would extend also to the scope of that regulation in Germany.
- e 63. It is for the national court to ascertain whether the application by the German legislature of the derogation provided for in the second subparagraph of art 1(1) of Regulation 1191/69 satisfies the requirements of clarity and precision needed to comply with the principle of legal certainty.
- f 64. The answer to the third part of the question referred for a preliminary ruling must therefore be that Regulation 1191/69, and more particularly the second subparagraph of art 1(1) thereof, must be interpreted as allowing a member state not to apply the regulation to the operation of urban, suburban or regional scheduled transport services which necessarily depend on public subsidies, and to limit its application to cases where the provision of an adequate transport service is not otherwise possible, provided however that the principle of legal certainty is duly observed.
- g 65. It must further be stated that, should the national court decide that the principle of legal certainty was not complied with in the main proceedings, it will have to consider that Regulation 1191/69 is fully applicable in Germany, and thus applies also to commercial operations. In that event, it will have to be ascertained whether the licences at issue in the main proceedings were granted in conformity with that regulation and, if so, whether the subsidies at issue in
- h the main proceedings were granted in conformity with it. Where those licences and subsidies do not satisfy the conditions laid down by the regulation, the national court will have to conclude that they are not compatible with Community law, without it being necessary to consider them from the point of view of the provisions of the Treaty.
- i 66. Consequently, it is only to the extent that the national court concludes that Regulation 1191/69 does not apply to commercial operations and that the use made by the German legislature of the option to derogate provided for by that regulation complies with the principle of legal certainty that it will have to consider whether the subsidies at issue in the main proceedings were granted in conformity with the provisions of the Treaty relating to state aid.

THE FIRST PART OF THE QUESTION REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

67. By the first part of the question referred for a preliminary ruling, the national court essentially asks whether subsidies intended to compensate for the deficit in operating an urban, suburban or regional public transport service come under art 92(1) of the Treaty in all circumstances, or whether, having regard to the local or regional character of the transport services provided and, if appropriate, to the significance of the field of activity concerned, such subsidies are not liable to affect trade between member states.

Observations submitted to the court

68. Altmark Trans, the Regierungspräsidium and Nahverkehrsgesellschaft submit that the subsidies at issue in the main proceedings have no effect on trade between member states within the meaning of art 92(1) of the Treaty, since they concern local services only and, in any event, the amount is so small that they have no perceptible effect on such trade.

69. The Commission, by contrast, submits that since 1995 eight member states have voluntarily opened certain urban, suburban or regional transport markets to competition from undertakings from other member states and that there are a number of examples of transport undertakings from one member state pursuing activities in another member state. That opening up of the market in certain member states shows that intra-Community trade is not only a possibility but already a reality.

70. It should be recalled that the court decided, by order of 18 June 2002, to reopen the oral procedure in the present case to give the parties to the main proceedings, the member states, the Commission and the Council an opportunity to submit observations on the possible consequences of the judgment of 22 November 2001 in Ferring SA v Agence Centrale des Organismes de Sécurité Sociale (ACOSS) Case C-53/00 [2001] ECR I-9067 as regards the answer to be given to the national court's question in the present case.

71. At the second hearing, on 15 October 2002, Altmark Trans, the Regierungspräsidium and Nahverkehrsgesellschaft and the German and Spanish governments proposed essentially that the court should confirm the principles it stated in the Ferring judgment. They therefore consider that state financing of public services constitutes aid within the meaning of art 92(1) of the Treaty only if the advantages conferred by the public authorities exceed the cost incurred in discharging the public service obligations.

72. On this point, they submit principally that the concept of aid in art 92(1) of the Treaty applies only to measures which provide a financial advantage for one or more undertakings. A state subsidy which does no more than offset the cost of discharging public service obligations which have been imposed does not confer any real advantage on the recipient undertaking. Moreover, in such a case competition is not distorted, since any undertaking can benefit from the public subsidy if it provides the public transport services imposed by the state.

73. At the second hearing, the Danish, French, Netherlands and United Kingdom governments submitted essentially that the court should adopt the approach of Advocate General Jacobs in his opinion of 30 April 2002 in Ministre de l'Economie, des Finances et de l'Industrie v GEMO SA Case C-126/01 [2004] 1 CMLR 259. Under that approach, a distinction should be drawn between two categories of situation. Where there is a direct and manifest link between state financing and clearly defined public service obligations, the sums paid by the public authorities do not constitute aid within the meaning of art 92(1) of the a Treaty. On the other hand, where there is no such link or the public service obligations are not clearly defined, the sums paid by the authorities constitute aid.

b Findings of the court

b 74. To answer the first part of the question, the various elements of the concept of state aid in art 92(1) of the Treaty must be considered. It is settled case law that classification as aid requires that all the conditions set out in that provision are fulfilled (see Belgium v EC Commission Case C-142/87 [1990] ECR I-959 (para 25), Spain v EC Commission Joined cases C-278–280/92 [1994] ECR I-4103 (para 20) and France v EC Commission Case C-482/99 [2003] All ER (EC) 330, [2002] ECR I-4397 (para 68)).

c 75. Article 92(1) of the Treaty lays down the following conditions. First, there must be an intervention by the state or through state resources. Second, the intervention must be liable to affect trade between member states. Third, it must confer an advantage on the recipient. Fourth, it must distort or threaten to distort competition.

d 76. The national court's question concerns more particularly the second of those conditions.

e 77. In this respect, it must be observed, first, that it is not impossible that a public subsidy granted to an undertaking which provides only local or regional transport services and does not provide any transport services outside its state of origin may none the less have an effect on trade between member states.

f 78. Where a member state grants a public subsidy to an undertaking, the supply of transport services by that undertaking may for that reason be maintained or increased with the result that undertakings established in other member states have less chance of providing their transport services in the market in that member state (see, to that effect, France v EC Commission Case 102/87 [1988] ECR I-4067 (para 19), Italy v EC Commission Case C-305/89 [1991] ECR I-1603 (para 26) and Spain v Commission (para 40)).

g 79. In the present case, that finding is not merely hypothetical, since, as appears in particular from the observations of the Commission, several member states have since 1995 started to open certain transport markets to competition from undertakings established in other member states, so that a number of undertakings are already offering their urban, suburban or regional transport services in member states other than their state of origin.

h 80. Next, the Commission notice of 6 March 1996 on the de minimis rule for state aid (OJ 1996 C68 p 9), as its fourth paragraph states, does not concern transport. Similarly, Commission Regulation (EC) 69/2001 (on the application of arts 87 and 88 of the EC Treaty to de minimis aid) (OJ 2001 L10 p 30), in accordance with the third recital in the preamble and art 1(a), does not apply to that sector.

i 81. Finally, according to the court's case law, there is no threshold or percentage below which it may be considered that trade between member states is not affected. The relatively small amount of aid or the relatively small size of the undertaking which receives it does not as such exclude the possibility that trade between member states might be affected (see Belgium v Commission Case C-142/87 (para 43) and Spain v Commission Joined cases C-278–280/92 (para 42)).

82. The second condition for the application of art 92(1) of the Treaty, namely that the aid must be capable of affecting trade between member states, does not therefore depend on the local or regional character of the transport services supplied or on the scale of the field of activity concerned. a

83. However, for a state measure to be able to come under art 92(1) of the Treaty, it must also, as stated in para 75, above, be capable of being regarded as an advantage conferred on the recipient undertaking.

84. Measures which, whatever their form, are likely directly or indirectly to favour certain undertakings (see Costa v ENEL Case 6/64 [1964] ECR 585 at 595) or are to be regarded as an economic advantage which the recipient undertaking would not have obtained under normal market conditions (see Syndicat Français de l'Express International (SFEI) v La Poste Case C-39/94 [1996] All ER (EC) 685, [1996] ECR I-3547 (para 60) and Spain v European Commission Case C-342/96 [1999] ECR I-2459 (para 41) are regarded as aid. b

85. Mention should, however, be made of the court's decision in a case concerning an indemnity provided for by Council Directive (EEC) 75/439 (on the disposal of waste oils) (OJ 1975 L194 p 23). That indemnity was able to be granted to waste oil collection and/or disposal undertakings as compensation for the collection and/or disposal obligations imposed on them by the member state, provided that it did not exceed the annual uncovered costs actually recorded by the undertakings taking into account a reasonable profit. The court held that an indemnity of that type did not constitute aid within the meaning of arts 92 et seq of the Treaty, but rather consideration for the services performed by the collection or disposal undertakings (see Procureur de la République v Association de Défense des Brûleurs d'Huiles Usagées Case 240/83 [1985] ECR 531 (para 3, last sentence, and para 18)). c

86. Similarly, the court has held that, provided that a tax on direct sales imposed on pharmaceutical laboratories corresponds to the additional costs actually incurred by wholesale distributors in discharging their public service obligations, not assessing wholesale distributors to the tax may be regarded as compensation for the services they provide and hence not state aid within the meaning of art 92 of the Treaty. The court said that, provided there was the necessary equivalence between the exemption and the additional costs incurred, wholesale distributors would not be enjoying any real advantage for the purposes of art 92(1) of the Treaty, because the only effect of the tax would be to put distributors and laboratories on an equal competitive footing (see the Ferring case (para 27)). d

87. It follows from those judgments that, where a state measure must be regarded as compensation for the services provided by the recipient undertakings in order to discharge public service obligations, so that those undertakings do not enjoy a real financial advantage and the measure thus does not have the effect of putting them in a more favourable competitive position than the undertakings competing with them, such a measure is not caught by art 92(1) of the Treaty. e

88. However, for such compensation to escape classification as state aid in a particular case, a number of conditions must be satisfied.

89. First, the recipient undertaking must actually have public service obligations to discharge, and the obligations must be clearly defined. In the main proceedings, the national court will therefore have to examine whether the public service obligations which were imposed on Altmark Trans are clear from the national legislation and/or the licences at issue in the main proceedings. f

90. Second, the parameters on the basis of which the compensation is calculated must be established in advance in an objective and transparent g a manner, to avoid it conferring an economic advantage which may favour the recipient undertaking over competing undertakings.

h

i

b 91. Payment by a member state of compensation for the loss incurred by an undertaking without the parameters of such compensation having been established beforehand, where it turns out after the event that the operation of certain services in connection with the discharge of public service obligations was not economically viable, therefore constitutes a financial measure which falls within the concept of state aid within the meaning of art 92(1) of the Treaty.

c 92. Third, the compensation cannot exceed what is necessary to cover all or part of the costs incurred in the discharge of public service obligations, taking into account the relevant receipts and a reasonable profit for discharging those obligations. Compliance with such a condition is essential to ensure that the recipient undertaking is not given any advantage which distorts or threatens to distort competition by strengthening that undertaking's competitive position.

d 93. Fourth, where the undertaking which is to discharge public service obligations, in a specific case, is not chosen pursuant to a public procurement procedure which would allow for the selection of the tenderer capable of providing those services at the least cost to the community, the level of compensation needed must be determined on the basis of an analysis of the costs which a typical undertaking, well run and adequately provided with means of transport so as to be able to meet the necessary public service requirements, would have incurred in discharging those obligations, taking into account the relevant receipts and a reasonable profit for discharging the obligations.

e 94. It follows from the above considerations that, where public subsidies granted to undertakings expressly required to discharge public service obligations in order to compensate for the costs incurred in discharging those obligations comply with the conditions set out in paras 89–93, above, such subsidies do not fall within art 92(1) of the Treaty. Conversely, a state measure which does not comply with one or more of those conditions must be regarded as state aid within the meaning of that provision.

f 95. The answer to the first part of the question referred for a preliminary ruling must therefore be that the condition for the application of art 92(1) of the Treaty that the aid must be such as to affect trade between member states does not depend on the local or regional character of the transport services supplied or on the scale of the field of activity concerned.

g However, public subsidies intended to enable the operation of urban, suburban or regional scheduled transport services are not caught by that provision where such subsidies are to be regarded as compensation for the services provided by the recipient undertakings in order to discharge public service obligations. For the purpose of applying that criterion, it is for the national court to ascertain that the following conditions are satisfied:

h —first, the recipient undertaking is actually required to discharge public service obligations and those obligations have been clearly defined;

i —second, the parameters on the basis of which the compensation is calculated have been established beforehand in an objective and transparent manner;

—third, the compensation does not exceed what is necessary to cover all or part of the costs incurred in discharging the public service obligations, taking into account the relevant receipts and a reasonable profit for discharging those obligations;

—fourth, where the undertaking which is to discharge public service obligations is not chosen in a public procurement procedure, the level of compensation needed has been determined on the basis of an analysis of the costs which a typical undertaking, well run and adequately provided with means of transport so as to be able to meet the necessary public service requirements, would have incurred in discharging those obligations, taking into account the relevant receipts and a reasonable profit for discharging the obligations. a
b

THE SECOND PART OF THE QUESTION REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

96. By the second part of the question referred for a preliminary ruling, the national court essentially asks whether art 77 of the Treaty may be applied to public subsidies which compensate for the additional costs incurred in discharging public service obligations without taking into account Regulation 1191/69. c

Observations submitted to the court

97. Altmark Trans submits that the option available to the national legislature to authorise public subsidies intended to compensate for deficits resulting from the operation of urban, suburban or regional public transport without regard being had to Regulation 1191/69 exists independently of art 77 of the Treaty. d

98. The Regierungspräsidium submits for its part that art 77 of the Treaty does not confer power on the national legislature to authorise public subsidies without having regard to Regulation 1191/69. e

99. Nahverkehrsgesellschaft says that, in so far as the public subsidies at issue in the main proceedings fall under the prohibition in art 92 of the Treaty, art 77 excludes that application, since those subsidies meet the conditions laid down by the latter article. That being so, it submits that in this case Regulation 1191/69 does not preclude the grant of such subsidies. f

100. The Commission takes the view that, under art 77 of the Treaty, the national legislature has power to grant public subsidies intended to compensate for deficits incurred in the field of urban, suburban or regional public transport without having regard to Regulation 1191/69, but that those subsidies are then subject entirely to the prior notification procedure laid down in art 93(3) of the EC Treaty (now art 88(3) EC) concerning the examination of state aid. g

Findings of the court

101. Article 77 of the EC Treaty provides that aids which meet the needs of co-ordination of transport or represent reimbursement for the discharge of certain obligations inherent in the concept of a public service are compatible with the Treaty. h

102. In para 37, above, it was stated that, if there were no regulation applicable to the case in the main proceedings, it would have to be examined whether the subsidies at issue in the main proceedings fell within the provisions of the Treaty concerning state aid. i

103. It follows from paras 65 and 66, above that Regulation 1191/69 could be applicable to the case in the main proceedings to the extent that the German legislature has not excluded the application of that regulation to commercial operations or has not done so in compliance with the principle of legal certainty. If that proves to be the case, the provisions of that regulation will

a apply to the subsidies at issue in the main proceedings, and the national court will not have to consider whether they are consistent with the provisions of primary law.

b 104. If, however, Regulation 1191/69 were not applicable to the case in the main proceedings, it follows from the answer to the first part of the question that, in so far as the subsidies at issue in the main proceedings are to be regarded as compensation for the transport services provided in order to discharge public service obligations and satisfy the conditions set out in paras 89–93, above, those subsidies would not come under art 92 of the Treaty, so that there would be no need to rely on the exception to that provision under art 77 of the Treaty.

c 105. Consequently, the provisions of primary law concerning state aid and the common transport policy would be applicable to the subsidies at issue in the main proceedings only in so far as, first, those subsidies did not come under the provisions of Regulation 1191/69 and, second, where they were granted to compensate for the additional costs incurred in discharging public service obligations, the conditions set out in paras 89–93, above were not all satisfied.

d 106. However, even if the subsidies at issue in the main proceedings were to be tested against the Treaty provisions on state aid, the exception provided for in art 77 could not be applied as such.

e 107. On 4 June 1970 the Council adopted Regulation (EEC) 1107/70 (on the granting of aids for transport by rail, road and inland waterway) (OJ English Sp Edn 1970 (II) p 360). Article 3 of that regulation provides that—

f '[w]ithout prejudice to the provisions of... Regulation (EEC) No 1192/69 ... and of ... Regulation (EEC) No 1191/69 ... Member States shall neither take co-ordination measures nor impose obligations inherent in the concept of a public service which involve the granting of aids pursuant to Article 77 of the Treaty except in the following cases or circumstances.'

It follows that member states are no longer authorised to rely on art 77 of the Treaty outside the cases referred to in secondary Community legislation.

g 108. So, to the extent that Regulation 1191/69 does not apply in the present case and the subsidies at issue in the main proceedings fall within art 92(1) of the Treaty, Regulation 1107/70 lists exhaustively the circumstances in which the authorities of the member states may grant aids under art 77 of the Treaty.

h 109. Accordingly, the answer to the second part of the question referred for a preliminary ruling must be that art 77 of the Treaty cannot be applied to public subsidies which compensate for the additional costs incurred in discharging public service obligations without taking into account Regulation 1191/69.

COSTS

i 110. The costs incurred by the German, Danish, Spanish, French, Netherlands and United Kingdom governments and by the Commission, which have submitted observations to the court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the proceedings pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

On those grounds, the Court of Justice, in answer to the question referred to it by the Bundesverwaltungsgericht by order of 6 April 2000, hereby rules:

(1) Council Regulation (EEC) 1191/69 (on action by member states concerning the obligations inherent in the concept of a public service in transport by rail, road and inland waterway), as amended by Council Regulation (EEC) 1893/91, and more particularly the second subparagraph of art 1(1) thereof, must be interpreted as allowing a member state not to apply the regulation to the operation of urban, suburban or regional scheduled transport services which necessarily depend on public subsidies, and to limit its application to cases where the provision of an adequate transport service is not otherwise possible, provided however that the principle of legal certainty is duly observed. a
b

(2) The condition for the application of art 92(1) of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, art 87(1) EC) that the aid must be such as to affect trade between member states does not depend on the local or regional character of the transport services supplied or on the scale of the field of activity concerned. c

However, public subsidies intended to enable the operation of urban, suburban or regional scheduled transport services are not caught by that provision where such subsidies are to be regarded as compensation for the services provided by the recipient undertakings in order to discharge public service obligations. For the purpose of applying that criterion, it is for the national court to ascertain that the following conditions are satisfied: d

—first, the recipient undertaking is actually required to discharge public service obligations and those obligations have been clearly defined;

—second, the parameters on the basis of which the compensation is calculated have been established beforehand in an objective and transparent manner; e

—third, the compensation does not exceed what is necessary to cover all or part of the costs incurred in discharging the public service obligations, taking into account the relevant receipts and a reasonable profit for discharging those obligations;

—fourth, where the undertaking which is to discharge public service obligations is not chosen in a public procurement procedure, the level of compensation needed has been determined on the basis of an analysis of the costs which a typical undertaking, well run and adequately provided with means of transport so as to be able to meet the necessary public service requirements, would have incurred in discharging those obligations, taking into account the relevant receipts and a reasonable profit for discharging the obligations. f
g

(3) Article 77 of the EC Treaty (now art 73 EC) cannot be applied to public subsidies which compensate for the additional costs incurred in discharging public service obligations without taking into account Regulation 1191/69, as amended by Regulation 1893/91. h

<sup>a</sup> R (on the application of Mayer Parry Recycling Ltd) v Environment Agency
<sup>b</sup> (Case C-444/00)

COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (FIFTH CHAMBER)

JUDGES WATHELET (PRESIDENT), TIMMERMANS (RAPPORTEUR), JANN, VON BAHR AND ROSAS

<sup>c</sup> ADVOCATE GENERAL ALBER

18 APRIL, 4 JULY 2002, 19 JUNE 2003

<sup>d</sup> *European Community – Environment – Waste – Packaging waste – Definition of packaging waste recycling operation – Whether reprocessing of ferrous scrap metal packaging waste into secondary raw material constituting packaging waste recycling operation – Council Directive (EEC) 75/442 – Council Directive (EC) 94/62, art 3(7).

<sup>e</sup> The claimant company collected scrap metal (including packaging waste, from industrial and other sources), which it inspected, tested for radiation, sorted, cleaned, cut, separated and shredded (thereby transferring ferrous scrap metal into material which met the ‘Grade 3B’ specification designated by the industry), before selling it to steelmakers, who used it to produce ingots, sheets or coils of steel. It brought judicial review proceedings in relation to a decision refusing to grant it accreditation, under national law, as a reprocessor entitled to issue packaging waste recovery notes to packaging waste producers, thus enabling such producers to confirm to the competent national authorities that the packaging waste which they had produced had been recovered or recycled.

<sup>f</sup> The national court decided to stay the proceedings and refer questions for preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) to the Court of Justice of the European Communities concerning: (i) the meaning of ‘recycling’ for the purposes of art 3(7)<sup>a</sup> of Council Directive (EC) 94/62 (on packaging and packaging waste) in order to determine whether recycling took place when metal packaging waste was transferred into a secondary raw material (such as Grade 3B material), or only when it was used to produce ingots, sheets or coils of steel; and (ii) whether the answer to that first question would be different if the concepts of recycling and waste referred to in Council Directive (EEC) 75/442 (on waste) were taken into account.

<sup>g</sup> Held – (1) For the purposes of art 3(7) of Directive 94/62, metal packaging waste was ‘recycled’ when it was used to produce ingots, sheets or coils of steel, but not when it was transformed into a secondary raw material. Although art 3(7) did not specify that the waste to be recycled had to be packaging waste, it was clear from the context of the directive that only such waste was referred to. To be ‘recycled’, packaging waste had to undergo reprocessing in a production process designed to produce new material, or a new product, possessing characteristics comparable to those of the material from which it was derived, in order to be used again for the production of metal packaging or for other purposes of any kind, so long as the reprocessing did not take the form of energy recovery. That definition was consonant with the directive's environmental protection objectives and the requirements of clarity and uniformity regarding the proper functioning of the internal market, particularly the avoidance of obstacles to trade and distortion of competition. It was only at the stage identified by the definition of recycling that the ecological advantages of reducing the consumption of energy and primary raw materials were achieved, and it was only at that stage that the materials at issue in the main proceedings ceased to be packaging waste. Further, the definition removed any ambiguity as to the point at which packaging waste was to be regarded as having been recycled. Obstacles to trade could arise if different concepts of recycling were applied in different member states and, since all businesses involved in the production, use, import and distribution of packaging and packaged products were responsible under the 'polluter pays' principle, the concept of recycling had to be applied uniformly in order that those businesses were in an equal position in the internal market with regard to competition. Applying the definition to the materials at issue in the main proceedings, Grade 3B material contained various impurities (such as oil, paint, non-metallic materials and undesirable chemical elements), which remained to be removed when the material was used to produce steel. Therefore, it could not be used directly for the manufacture of new metal packaging and, accordingly, it was not to be regarded as recycled packaging waste. By contrast, the use of Grade 3B material in the production of ingots, sheets or coils of steel might be regarded as being a packaging waste recycling operation, since the production process resulted in the manufacture of new products which possessed characteristics comparable to those of the material of which the metal packaging waste incorporated in the Grade 3B material was initially composed and which might be used for a purpose identical to the original purpose of the material from which it had been derived (see judgment paras 65, 67–69, 73–79, 83–86, 88, below).

<sup>a</sup> Article 3(7) of Directive 94/62 is set out at judgment para 14, below

(2) For the purposes of Directive 75/442, metal packaging waste was 'recycled' when it was used to produce ingots, sheets or coils of steel. Packaging waste within the meaning of Directive 94/62 had to be regarded as waste within the meaning of Directive 75/442. In any event, although Directive 75/442 was the framework legislation on waste and was relevant when interpreting and applying Directive 94/62, the latter directive had to be regarded as special legislation, whose provisions prevailed over those of Directive 75/442 in the situations which it specifically sought to regulate (see judgment paras 53, 57, 90–93, below).

Notes

For the meaning of 'waste', see 38 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 173.

Cases cited

- Abfall Service AG (ASA) v Bundesminister für Umwelt, Jugend und Familie* Case C-6/00 [2002] QB 1073, [2002] 3 WLR 665, [2002] ECR I-1961, EC].
- ARCO Chemie Nederland Ltd v Minister van Volkshuisvesting, Ruimtelijke Ordening en Milieubeheer, Vereniging Dorpsbelang Hees v Directeur van de dienst Milieu en Water van de provincie Gelderland* Joined cases C-418/97 and C-419/97 [2003] All ER (EC) 237, [2002] QB 646, [2002] 2 WLR 1240, [2000] ECR I-4475, EC].

- a Evangelischer Krankenhausverein Wien v Abgabenberufungskommission Wien, Wein & Co Handelsgees mbH v Oberösterreichische Landesregierung* Case C-437/97 [2001] All ER (EC) 735, [2000] ECR I-1157, ECJ.
- Inter-Environnement Wallonie ASBL v Région Wallonie* Case C-129/96 [1998] All ER (EC) 155, [1997] ECR I-7411, ECJ.
- b Palin Granit Oy (Application by)* Case C-9/00 [2003] All ER (EC) 366, [2002] 1 WLR 2644, [2002] ECR I-3533, ECJ.
- Tombesi (Criminal proceedings against)* Joined cases C-304/94, C-330/94, C-342/94 and C-224/95 [1997] All ER (EC) 639, [1997] ECR I-3561, ECJ.
- Union Royale Belge des Sociétés de Football Association ASBL v Bosman, Royal Club Liégeois SA v Bosman, Union des Associations Européennes de Football v Bosman* Case C-415/93 [1996] All ER (EC) 97, [1995] ECR I-4921, ECJ.
- c Vessoso (Criminal proceedings against)* Joined cases C-206/88 and C-207/88 [1990] ECR I-1461, ECJ.

Reference

- By order of 9 November 2000, the High Court of Justice of England and Wales, Queen's Bench Division (Administrative Court), referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) two questions on the interpretation of Council Directive (EEC) 75/442 (on waste), as amended by Council Directive (EEC) 91/156 and Commission Decision (EC) 96/350 (adapting Annexes IIA and IIB to Directive 75/442 on waste), and of European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 94/62 (on packaging and packaging waste). Those questions were raised in proceedings between Mayer Parry Recycling Ltd and the Environment Agency concerning the latter's refusal to grant Mayer Parry's application for accreditation as a reprocessor, which is defined as a person who carries out the activities of waste recovery or recycling. Written observations were submitted on behalf of: Mayer Parry Recycling Ltd by M Fordham and T de la Mare, Barristers, instructed by Denton Wilde Sapte, Solicitors; the Environment Agency by R Navarro, acting as agent, and J Howell QC; Corus (UK) Ltd by R Singh and J Simor, Barristers, instructed by J Maton, Solicitor; the United Kingdom government by G Amodeo, acting as agent, and P Sales and M Hoskins, Barristers; the Danish government by J Molde, acting as agent; the Netherlands government by HG Sevenster, acting as agent; the Austrian government by C Pesendorfer, acting as agent; the Commission of the European Communities by RB Wainwright and H Støvlbaek, acting as agents. Oral observations were made on behalf of: Mayer Parry Recycling Ltd, represented by M Fordham; the Environment Agency, represented by J Howell; Corus (UK) Ltd, represented by R Singh; the United Kingdom government, represented by G Amodeo and P Sales; the Netherlands government, represented by J van der Oosterkamp, acting as agent; and the Commission, represented by RB Wainwright. The language of the case was English. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General.

4 July 2002. The Advocate General (S Alber) delivered the following opinion<sup>1</sup>.

I—INTRODUCTION

1. In the present proceedings, the High Court of Justice in London seeks a preliminary ruling from the Court of Justice of the European Communities on the interpretation of Council Directive (EEC) 75/442 (on waste)<sup>2</sup> (the Waste Directive) and European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 94/62 (on packaging and packaging waste)<sup>3</sup> (the Packaging Directive). The point at issue is essentially whether the treatment (sorting, cleaning, cutting, crushing, separating and/or baling) by the claimant in the main proceedings, Mayer Parry Recycling Ltd (MPR), of packaging waste made of metal amounts to complete recycling so that, after its processing, the scrap metal is no longer to be classified as waste.

<sup>1</sup> Original language: German.

2. MPR would like to be accredited as a reprocessor entitled to issue Packaging Waste Recovery Notes (PRNs) (as to the significance of PRNs, see para 19, below). That right has been granted by one of the defendants in the main proceedings, the Environment Agency, which has competence for England and Wales, to the steelmakers which melt down the material processed by MPR and produce ingots, sheets or coils from it.

II—LEGAL CONTEXT

A—Community law

(1) The Waste Directive

3. Article 1 of the Waste Directive provides:

‘For the purposes of this Directive:

(a) “waste” means any substance or object in the categories set out in Annex I which the holder discards or intends or is required to discard.’

4. Annex I to the Waste Directive specifies, under point Q5: ‘Materials contaminated or soiled as a result of planned actions (e.g. residues from cleaning operations, packing materials, containers, etc.)’. The annex also contains two sweep-up points: Q1 ‘Production or consumption residues not otherwise specified below’ and Q16 ‘Any materials, substances or products which are not contained in the above categories’.

5. For the concept of recovery, art 1(f) refers to the operations provided for in Annex IIB. That annex lists, under point R3, ‘recycling/reclamation of metals and metal compounds’.

6. Article 3(1) of the Waste Directive sets the following objectives for the member states:

‘(a) firstly, the prevention or reduction of waste production and its harmfulness ...

(b) secondly:

(i) the recovery of waste by means of recycling, re-use or reclamation or any other process with a view to extracting secondary raw materials, or
(ii) the use of waste as a source of energy.’

(2) The Packaging Directive

7. Article 3 of the Packaging Directive contains, inter alia, the following definitions:

‘2. “packaging waste” shall mean any packaging or packaging material covered by the definition of waste in Directive 75/442/EEC, excluding production residues ...

<sup>2</sup> Council Directive (EEC) 75/442 (on waste) (OJ 1975 L194 p 39), as amended by Council Directive (EEC) 91/156 (OJ 1991 L78 p 32) and by Commission Decision (EC) 96/350 (adapting Annexes IIA and IIB to Directive 75/442 on waste) (OJ 1996 L135 p 32).

<sup>3</sup> OJ 1994 L365 p 10.

a 6. "recovery" shall mean any of the applicable operations provided for in Annex II.B to Directive 75/442/EEC;

7. "recycling" shall mean the reprocessing in a production process of the waste materials for the original purpose or for other purposes including organic recycling but excluding energy recovery ...'

b 8. Article 6(1) of the Packaging Directive imposes the following obligation for the recovery of packaging waste:

'In order to comply with the objectives of this Directive, Member States shall take the necessary measures to attain the following targets covering the whole of their territory;

c (a) no later than five years from the date by which this Directive must be implemented in national law, between 50% as a minimum and 65% as a maximum by weight of the packaging waste will be recovered;

d (b) within this general target, and with the same time limit, between 25% as a minimum and 45% as a maximum by weight of the totality of packaging materials contained in packaging waste will be recycled with a minimum of 15% by weight for each packaging material ...'

9. In accordance with art 8, in order to achieve the recovery rate the member states must set up systems for the return and/or collection and also the recovery of packaging waste.

e (3) Divergences between the various language versions

10. At the heart of these proceedings is the concept of recycling within the meaning of the Packaging and Waste Directives. It is accordingly necessary at this early stage to point out some terminological differences in the various language versions of both directives.

f 11. The term 'recycling' is used in the English version of both art 3(1)(b)(i) of the Waste Directive and art 3(7) of the Packaging Directive. In the Romance languages and Dutch, words cognate with the word 'recycling' ('recyclage', 'reciclado', 'riciclo' and so forth) are likewise to be found in both provisions. In other languages, words not cognate with 'recycling', but which are the same in both directives, are chosen.

g 12. Only in the German, Swedish and Finnish versions do different terms appear in the foregoing provisions of the Waste and Packaging Directives. Thus, in German the Waste Directive refers to 'Rückführung' and the Packaging Directive to 'stoffliche Verwertung'. In the German version of the Commission of the European Communities' proposal for the Packaging Directive, the word 'Recycling' was added in brackets after the term 'stoffliche Verwertung', but it was dropped in the subsequent legislative process.

h 13. Finally, in Directive (EC) 2000/53 of the European Parliament and of the Council of the European Communities (on end-of-life vehicles) (Directive 2000/53)<sup>4</sup>, which admittedly is not directly relevant to the present case but is referred to by some parties for the purpose of comparison, the German version too speaks of 'recycling'.

i 14. Since only a small proportion of the language versions thus contain different terms in the two directives, it cannot be concluded from the difference in choice of words in those versions alone that the terms have different meanings. In the remainder of this opinion, the terms 'stoffliche Verwertung',

<sup>4</sup> OJ 2000 L269 p 34.

'Rückführung' and 'Recycling' are therefore understood linguistically as synonyms. That does not preclude, however, that 'recycling' for the purpose of the Waste Directive and for the purpose of the Packaging Directive have different meanings in accordance with their respective definitions, as remains to be examined. a

B—National rules b

15. Article 6(1) of the Packaging Directive was transposed into national law by the Producer Responsibility Obligations (Packaging Waste) Regulations 1997, SI 1997/648 (the regulations). The regulations require producers of packaging waste to recycle or recover by other means specific quantities of such waste. 'Recovery' and 'recycling' have the same definitions in the regulations as in the Packaging Directive. c

16. Under the regulations producers must be registered, take steps to recover and recycle specified quantities of packaging waste and furnish certificates of compliance in respect of their recovery and recycling obligations. It is a criminal offence to contravene those requirements.

17. Producers may also, and in practice generally do, satisfy their obligations by being a member of a registered scheme. d

18. The British environment agencies have issued guidance in 'Producer Responsibility Obligations 1997: Guidance on evidence of compliance and voluntary accreditation of reprocessors', which is known as 'the Orange Book'. The Orange Book document sets out in greater detail the requirements of the environment agencies with regard to evidence that producers have complied with their recovery and recycling obligations and provides for a voluntary system of accreditation for reprocessors entitled to issue PRNs. e

19. A reprocessor certifies in a PRN the amount of packaging waste from the United Kingdom accepted by him, whether it is to be recycled or recovered and which recovery operations are to be applied to the material. Through the submission of PRNs, a producer can demonstrate to the Environment Agency that the packaging waste which he has delivered (or had delivered on his behalf) to an accredited reprocessor has been duly recycled or recovered. PRNs are tradeable and have an economic value (£10 to £15 per tonne in 2000 in the case of the metal packaging waste at issue here). f

20. The Environment Agency accredits the businesses listed in para 3 of Annex D to the Orange Book; for metals (aluminium and steel), businesses producing ingots, sheets or coils from packaging waste are accredited as reprocessors. g

21. Accreditation is thus granted in respect of the point in the materials cycle at which a new product is made that is indistinguishable from one made from primary raw materials. That is intended to facilitate the administrative process and ensure that PRNs are not issued twice in the course of the processing of the same material. h

III—FACTS OF THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS

22. MPR obtains—generally against payment—scrap metal, including packaging waste, from industrial and other sources. It processes the scrap so that it meets the Grade 3B specification developed by the industry. That essentially requires the following processing steps: visual inspection, radiation testing, shredding into fist-sized pieces, several sorting processes to separate out foreign substances (for example plastics, non-ferrous metals, glass or stones), and further visual inspection. Around 4.1% of Grade 3B material is i a metal from packaging waste. MPR then sells the Grade 3B material to steelworks, which produce ingots, sheets or coils of steel from it. Grade 3B material is highly efficient because of its high iron content, its high density and its large surface area. It sells for around £60 per tonne.

b 23. The parties to the main proceedings disagree as to the extent to which the Grade 3B material produced by MPR still contains organic and inorganic impurities; the figures range from 2–3% (MPR—non-free contaminants) up to 7% (the Environment Agency). The impurities include remaining surface coatings such as paint or oil, non-metallic materials and undesirable chemical elements. Because of its potential pollutant content, Grade 3B material is required to be kept under cover or on a hard standing with drainage to a sump. The impurities are not removed until the steel production stage.

c 24. Steel producers are subject to the integrated pollution control regime laid down by the Environmental Protection Act 1990. Under that regime, the processes used by them must meet certain environmental standards and require authorisation. On the other hand, they are exempt from licensing under national waste management legislation.

d 25. In November 1998 MPR applied for accreditation as a reprocessor entitled to issue PRNs. By letter dated 15 November 1999, the Environment Agency refused that application. MPR then commenced proceedings before the High Court, seeking, inter alia, annulment of that decision and a declaration that it performs recovery and recycling within the meaning of the Packaging Directive.

e IV—ORDER FOR REFERENCE

26. By order of 9 November 2000 (see [2001] Env LR 630), the High Court stayed proceedings and referred the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

f 'Where an undertaking deals with packaging materials including ferrous metals, which (when received by that undertaking) constitute waste within the meaning of Article 1(a) of Council Directive 75/442/EEC on waste, as amended by Council Directive 91/156/EEC and Commission Decision 96/350/EC, by means of sorting, cleaning, cutting, crushing, separating and/or baling so as to render those materials suitable for use as a feedstock in a furnace in order to produce ingots, sheets or coils of steel:

g (1) Have those materials been recycled, and do they cease to be waste, for the purposes of Council Directive 75/442, when they have been:

(a) rendered suitable for use as a feedstock, or
(b) used by a steelmaker so as to produce ingots, sheets or coils of steel?

h (2) Have those materials been recycled for the purposes of European Parliament and Council Directive 94/62/EC on packaging and packaging waste when they have been:

(a) rendered suitable for use as a feedstock, or
(b) used by a steelmaker so as to produce ingots, sheets or coils of steel?'

i V—ARGUMENTS OF THE PARTIES

27. Observations have been submitted to the court by the following parties: MPR; the Environment Agency; Corus UK Ltd (Corus), a steel producer which has intervened in the main proceedings in support of the Environment Agency's position; the United Kingdom, Netherlands, Danish and Austrian governments; and the Commission.

A—Mayer Parry Recycling Ltd

28. MPR puts interpretation of the Waste Directive to the fore and argues in summary as follows: it recovers packaging waste and produces Grade 3B ferrous scrap, which is not waste but a secondary raw material; the Packaging Directive must be interpreted consistently with the Waste Directive; since Grade 3B scrap is not waste, the processing by MPR must also be regarded as complete recycling for the purposes of the Packaging Directive.

29. With regard to the Community law framework, MPR explains that four principal common features of the Waste Directive and the Packaging Directive can be identified.

30. First, the terms 'waste', 'recovery' and 'recycling' have the same meaning in both directives, recycling being a particular form of recovery. Recovery operations for the purposes of the directives can only be carried out on waste. Second, the decisive factor for the definition of waste is that the person holding the material discards it. Third, the directives pursue the objective of conserving raw materials through waste recovery. Fourth, a distinction is drawn between physical recovery and energy recovery.

31. MPR also explains the economic significance of eligibility to issue PRNs, a right enjoyed by the person who carries out the recycling. Since MPR's processing of the scrap metal enables it to be used by steel producers in the same way as a primary raw material, MPR's Grade 3B material is not waste but a secondary raw material. The steel producers therefore do not recover any waste and if only for that reason cannot be regarded as recyclers.

32. In its observations on the first question referred for a preliminary ruling, MPR derives the following guiding principles from the case law of the court or the opinions of Advocates General. It is for the national court to determine in the light of all the circumstances whether material is waste<sup>5</sup>. In deciding whether it is waste, the decisive factor is whether the holder discards it<sup>6</sup>. Waste recovery is to be distinguished from normal industrial treatment of products<sup>7</sup>. Recovery has been completed if the recovered substance can be used directly in a production process as a secondary raw material<sup>8</sup>.

33. MPR contests, on the other hand, the approach put forward by the Environment Agency, according to which recovery is not completed until later, that is to say when one can no longer tell whether a product has been made from waste or from primary raw materials. That argument, which is based on the definition of recycling in the Packaging Directive, is not tenable. The Packaging Directive is subordinate to the Waste Directive and cannot define the concept of recovery in a manner that diverges from the Waste Directive.

<sup>5</sup> MPR refers to the opinions of Advocate General Jacobs in Criminal proceedings against Tombesi joined cases C-304/94, C-330/94, C-342/94 and C-224/95 [1997] All ER (EC) 639, [1997] ECR I-3561 (para 56) and Inter-Environnement Wallonie ASBL v Région Wallonie Case C-129/96 [1998] All ER (EC) 155, [1997] ECR I-7411 (paras 69, 70), and to the judgment in ARCO Chemie Nederland Ltd v Minister van Volkshuisvesting, Ruimtelijke Ordening en Milieubeheer, Vereniging Dorpsbelang Hees v Directeur van de dienst Milieu en Water van de provincie Gelderland joined cases C-418/97 and C-419/97 [2003] All ER (EC) 237, [2000] ECR I-4475 (paras 51, 65–71, 73, 88, 97).

<sup>6</sup> See the opinion in the Inter-Environnement Wallonie case, cited in footnote 5, above (paras 26, 27, 60), opinion in Tombesi's case, cited in footnote 5, above (paras 50, 51) and judgment in the ARCO Chemie case, cited in footnote 5, above (paras 34, 36, 46, 47).

<sup>7</sup> See the judgment in the Inter-Environnement Wallonie case, cited in footnote 5, above (para 33).

<sup>8</sup> See the opinion in Tombesi's case, cited in footnote 5 (paras 53, 54), opinion in the Inter-Environnement Wallonie case, cited in footnote 5, above (para 78) and judgment in the ARCO Chemie case, cited in footnote 5, above (paras 93, 94).

- a 34. In art 3(7) of the Packaging Directive which defines recycling, the focus placed on reprocessing in a production process serves to distinguish recycling from energy recovery. The process applied by MPR constitutes a production process in any event, in that a secondary raw material, namely Grade 3B scrap, is produced. That material is not waste because it has an economic value and there would be no risk of its being discarded.
- b 35. MPR suggests the following factors in particular for distinguishing a secondary raw material from waste: the substance's suitability for reutilisation with or without further pre-treatment, its economic value and the environmental hazards posed by it. In MPR's view, it is for the referring court to determine the extent to which those criteria are met.
- c 36. Should the court none the less wish to consider the matter, MPR contends that Grade 3B material meets the criteria for secondary raw materials. It can be used directly for steel production, just as iron ore, without further treatment. No special environmental protection measures are required either for its storage and transportation or when it is used to produce steel.
- d 37. MPR submits with regard to the second question that materials which have been completely recovered and are no longer waste for the purposes of the Waste Directive are also to be regarded as recycled for the purposes of the Packaging Directive.

B—The Environment Agency

- e 38. The Environment Agency agrees with MPR that the same understanding of the terms 'waste' and 'recovery' underlies both directives. It takes the view, however, in contrast to MPR, that the treatment carried out by MPR does not amount to complete recycling. It is not until the Grade 3B material has been melted down and the steelmaker has produced ingots, sheets or coils of steel that recycling is completed and waste ceases to be present.
- f 39. With regard to the relationship between the two questions referred for a preliminary ruling, the Environment Agency states that the two directives must be interpreted together. The Packaging Directive merely makes clearer what is to be understood by recycling as a particular form of recovery. Article 2(2) of the Waste Directive expressly allows special directives for particular categories of waste such as packaging waste. Since both directives pursue the objective of encouraging waste recovery, the same definition of 'recovery' is to be used as a basis.
- g After complete recycling for the purposes of the Packaging Directive, the recovered material can equally no longer be regarded as waste for the purposes of the Waste Directive.
- h 40. With regard to the first question, the Environment Agency stresses first of all that the court should answer the question itself. The assessment as to when waste has been completely recovered cannot be left to the member states, as MPR submits, since that runs counter to the objective of harmonisation of laws throughout the Community. The concepts of waste and recovery are sufficiently specific to be of direct application without being further defined by national law.
- i 41. The Environment Agency also refers to the case law stating that the concept of waste is to be interpreted broadly<sup>9</sup> and to the objectives of the Waste Directive, namely to avoid waste, encourage recovery and prohibit the uncontrolled disposal of waste.

<sup>9</sup> See the judgment in the ARCO Chemie case, cited in footnote 5, above (paras 34–40).

42. The Waste Directive does not lay down when material ceases to be waste. a
In any event, that does not happen simply because waste comes into the possession of the person who wishes to recover material or carry out some other treatment. The fact that waste is subjected to one of the recovery operations specified in Annex IIB to the Waste Directive may mean that it ceases to be waste, but that is not necessarily the case, as the court has held<sup>10</sup>.

43. MPR does not carry out recycling, but only pre-processing in that it sorts the waste and changes its composition. MPR is consequently a waste producer within the meaning of art 1(b) of the Waste Directive. The treatment carried out by MPR is not reprocessing in a production process under art 3(7) of the Packaging Directive. Equally, in Directive 2000/53 the corresponding treatment of end-of-life cars is regarded as pre-treatment and not as recycling. b

44. The Environment Agency contests MPR's argument that Grade 3B scrap constitutes a secondary raw material and has therefore been recycled. Recovery does not always have the aim of extracting secondary raw materials. Nor, under the court's case law, does a material cease to be waste by being transformed into a secondary raw material. Its suitability for use as a raw material does not preclude its classification as waste. c

45. In addition, the Environment Agency disputes MPR's assertion that no special environmental protection controls are required when dealing with Grade 3B material. Steel producers who process Grade 3B scrap are subject to integrated pollution control. d

46. Moreover, the court, in contrast to certain Advocates General, has regarded the environmental protection requirements for dealing with a material or the environmental hazards posed by the material as likewise not determining whether it is classified as waste<sup>11</sup>. e

47. On the basis of its answer to the first question, the Environment Agency suggests in answer to the second question that the packaging waste has been recycled only when ingots, sheets or coils of steel have been produced. f

C—Corus UK Ltd

48. In Corus's submission, only the second question need be answered. In that connection, it is for the member state to select the point at which materials may be regarded as completely recycled and decide whether or not they are still waste, in so far as the objectives of the Packaging Directive are thereby g observed.

49. The United Kingdom has settled on a correct and perfectly justifiable point in time for completion of recycling by focusing on the production of ingots, sheets and coils by the steelmaker. Grade 3B scrap, on the other hand, is to be regarded as waste.

50. The question whether material has been recycled is to be decided on the basis of the Packaging Directive alone. The answer turns on whether the material can be used again in the manufacture of packaging or for other production purposes. This requirement is met only by Corus's products, and not MPR's upstream products. In the absence of Community provisions, the mode of proof of recycling can be laid down by the member states. h

<sup>10</sup> See the judgment in the ARCO Chemie case, cited in footnote 5, above (paras 89, 95–97).

<sup>11</sup> The Environment Agency refers in particular to the judgments in the Inter-Environnement Wallonie case, cited in footnote 5, above (para 30), and in the ARCO Chemie case, cited in footnote 5, above (paras 64–69). i

- a 51. Income from the issue of PRNs is used by the undertakings carrying out the recycling to expand capacity. This helps to increase the recycling rate for metal packaging waste which is still very low. MPR, on the other hand, has no corresponding commercial interest in the recovery of packaging waste as such waste forms only a very small part of its throughput. If MPR were entitled to issue PRNs, there would be a risk that it would process large amounts of Grade 3B scrap and then only store it.
- b

D—The Danish government

- c 52. The Danish government essentially agrees with the submissions of the Environment Agency. The concept of waste is, in its view, to be interpreted broadly in order to ensure that the waste stream and waste disposal and recovery are monitored. As soon as material ceases to be waste it is no longer subject to corresponding controls. In particular, Council Regulation (EEC) 259/93 (on the supervision and control of shipments of waste within, into and out of the European Community)<sup>12</sup> ceases to apply. In accordance with the case law, the economic value of material or its recoverability is irrelevant to the definition of waste.
- d

53. The scrap metal processed by MPR is waste. The 'reprocessing' referred to in the definition of recycling presupposes an alteration in the material's composition which makes it immediately usable again. That precondition is not met until the steelmaker makes its products.

- e 54. In Denmark, gathering and sorting are taken to be not recovery but pre-treatment. Corresponding pre-treatment may or must also take place in some circumstances before waste is disposed of, as shown by, for example, art 6 of Council Directive (EC) 1999/31 (on the landfill of waste)<sup>13</sup> and art 6 of Directive (EC) 2000/76 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 4 December 2000 on the incineration of waste<sup>14</sup>.

- f 55. If not even complete recovery necessarily deprives material of its classification as waste, as the court has held<sup>15</sup>, a fortiori pre-treatment does not lead to that result.

E—The Netherlands government

- g 56. The Netherlands government states with regard to the first question that the point in time at which material is recycled coincides with the point in time at which it ceases to be waste. In the ARCO Chemie case (at paras 36–41), the court laid stress on the importance of the idea of discarding to the concept of waste<sup>16</sup>. That concept must be interpreted in a manner consistent with the objectives of the Waste Directive and therefore broadly.

- h 57. Under the Waste Directive, there recycling takes place not only where waste is used in a production process but also in the case of recovery with the objective of extracting secondary raw materials. Whether a secondary raw material with the same characteristics as a primary raw material has been created from the waste depends on whether the holder of the material produced discards it.

i

<sup>12</sup> OJ 1993 L30 p 1.

<sup>13</sup> OJ 1999 L182 p 1.

<sup>14</sup> OJ 2000 L332 p 91.

<sup>15</sup> See the judgment in the ARCO Chemie case, cited in footnote 5, above (para 96).

<sup>16</sup> Cited in footnote 5, above.

58. In that regard, account is to be taken of the following cumulative criteria: a the material's composition must be such as to enable it to be used in the same way as the corresponding primary raw material; it must not contain more impurities than the primary raw material; it must be capable of being used without further pre-treatment; its use must not give rise to any higher environmental risk than use of the primary raw material; the use must not b consist merely of a recovery process; and the material must not have a negative economic value.

59. The answer to the first question should therefore be that packaging waste that includes metals is recycled for the purpose of the Waste Directive and no longer waste when the criteria set out above are met and the material is thus suitable for use as a raw material.

60. The Netherlands government submits with regard to the second question c that 'recycling' in the Packaging Directive has a different meaning from 'recycling' in the Waste Directive. Waste is not recycled within the meaning of the Packaging Directive until it has been re-used in a production process, hence in the present case on the production of ingots, sheets and coils of steel. The objectives of saving energy and raw materials are achieved only through actual d use in a production process. Furthermore, that is the only way of ensuring that no double-counting occurs in relation to meeting the recycling rates under art 6 of the Packaging Directive.

F—The Austrian government

61. In its examination of the first question the Austrian government points e out that recycling is defined not in the Waste Directive but in the Packaging Directive. Directive 2000/53 also contains a definition in similar terms. Those definitions focus on use in a production process and are narrower than the concept of recovery under the Waste Directive.

62. With regard to the concept of waste, the Austrian government refers to f the findings of the court in the ARCO Chemie case (at paras 40, 41, 97)<sup>17</sup>. The point at which recovery is completed is determined by the following criteria:
the material is normally used for the purpose in question and there is a market for it; quality criteria exist which take account of its characteristics as waste; it does not give rise to any higher environmental risk than comparable raw materials.

63. The Austrian government adds in relation to the second question that g recycling need not be effected in one step. At every step it must be examined whether there is, or perhaps only appears to be, recovery.

64. In summary, MPR carries out waste recovery, but only as a step preliminary to recycling within the meaning of the Packaging Directive. h

G—The United Kingdom government

65. The United Kingdom government states that only the second question needs to be answered in order to dispose of the main proceedings and it therefore focuses its observations on that question.

66. It points out that packaging waste can be recycled only once, even though i this might occur in a number of stages. It is necessary to avoid recovery operations in respect of the same material being taken into account more than once for the purposes of the recycling rate under art 6(1)(b) of the Packaging Directive. Recycling is carried out in the present case by the steel producers.

<sup>17</sup> Cited in footnote 5, above.

a 67. MPR's treatment of the waste does not correspond to the definition of recycling in art 3(7) of the Packaging Directive. Sorting, cleaning, crushing and baling do not constitute production processes.

b 68. Nor is reprocessing involved, since the waste retains its essential characteristics and does not become a new product. Reprocessing presupposes a use similar to the original use, that is to say melting down in the place of the primary raw material and the production of ingots, sheets and coils of steel. The pre-treatment carried out by MPR for that use is not itself reprocessing. Only this view meets the objective laid down in art 6(2) of the Packaging Directive of manufacturing packaging or other products from recycled packaging material where possible.

c 69. The United Kingdom government underpins that view by drawing a comparison with Directive 2000/53, which contains provisions similar to those of the Packaging Directive.

d 70. It contests the interpretation put forward by MPR under which the Packaging and Waste Directives are read as one. The Waste Directive does not establish any definitions which are to apply to all other legislation in this field; on the contrary, the definitions in art 1 of the Waste Directive are expressly stated to be for the purposes of that directive.

e 71. When the Community legislature wishes to use in other legal measures the same definitions as in the Waste Directive, it does so by express reference. The Packaging Directive contains some such references; as for the remainder, the terms used in it are to be interpreted autonomously.

f 72. Article 2(2) of the Waste Directive expressly envisages the adoption of special rules, such as the Packaging Directive. The Packaging Directive contains independent definitions of the terms 'recycling' and 'recovery'. Article 3(6), which defines 'recovery', refers only to the 'applicable operations' provided for in Annex IIB to the Waste Directive<sup>18</sup>.

g 73. It is apparent from Annex IIB to the Waste Directive that waste can pass through several recovery steps. Metallic waste could for example be stored first of all (R12) and the metal could later be reclaimed (R3). Recycling, on the other hand, is possible only once, for the reasons stated. Only such operations listed in Annex IIB to the Waste Directive as constitute recycling can be applicable operations within the meaning of art 3(6) of the Packaging Directive.

h 74. The Packaging Directive contains independent definitions of the terms 'recycling', 'energy recovery' and 'organic recycling' (art 3(7), (8) and (9)). Other forms of recovery are not mentioned. Only the types of recovery expressly mentioned are applicable operations under the Packaging Directive. Of those, only recycling is applicable to metals.

i 75. It is not sufficient for MPR to carry out a recovery operation under Annex IIB to the Waste Directive; rather, it must carry out an applicable operation under the Packaging Directive, namely recycling.

76. In order to ensure that the recovery of packaging waste is recorded in accordance with uniform standards throughout the Community, it is necessary to have a clearly definable criterion determining when material is completely recovered. To that extent the member states are left with no discretion. The most suitable point in time is when the scrap metal is melted down again.

<sup>18</sup> The language versions diverge. While the German version and some others, for example the Spanish version, refer generally to the operations provided for in Annex IIB to the Waste Directive ('die Maßnahmen', 'cualquiera de las operaciones'), other language versions have a restriction added (for example 'applicable operations', 'opérations applicables', 'pertinenti operazioni', 'toepasselijke handelingen').

77. The Packaging Directive has the objective of actual reprocessing. As long as packaging waste has only been prepared for reprocessing, actual use, namely the melting down, is not ensured. a

78. A substance is to be regarded as recycled packaging material for the purposes of art 6(1)(b) of the Packaging Directive if two conditions are met: the packaging material must have been packaging waste and it must have been recycled. It is irrelevant whether the material has ceased at any point in time to be waste within the meaning of the Waste Directive. b

79. The United Kingdom government concludes from all the foregoing considerations that it is inappropriate to read the two directives together in the absence of appropriate references in the Packaging Directive.

80. The United Kingdom government makes further observations on the first question in the alternative only. Unlike the Packaging Directive, the Waste Directive allows the member states a margin of appreciation in determining what constitutes a recovery operation<sup>19</sup>. It cannot be concluded from the fact that material has been recovered within the meaning of the Waste Directive that it has undergone an applicable recovery operation under the Packaging Directive. c

81. The court has confirmed that the concept of recovery under the Waste Directive needs to be defined more precisely by national implementing legislation<sup>20</sup>. The Packaging Directive, on the other hand, allows only three types of recovery (recycling, energy recovery and organic recycling) and to that extent confers no margin of appreciation on the member states. d

82. Nor can the Packaging Directive have retroactively altered the meaning of the Waste Directive which was enacted first. It would be contrary to the principle of legal certainty to wish to ascribe to the Waste Directive a new and different meaning following adoption of the Packaging Directive. e

H—The Commission f

83. The Commission is essentially of the same view as the Environment Agency. The terms 'waste' and 'recovery' have the same meaning in the Waste Directive and the Packaging Directive. The special definition of recycling in the Packaging Directive takes account of the objectives of that directive (priority of recycling over energy recovery).

84. It is true that MPR's activity is a step in the material's recovery, but recovery is not completed until the material is processed in the furnace. Only then is there no longer waste. Nor is that conclusion in any way altered by the fact that MPR's products have an economic value. A processed substance can still be waste even after complete recovery. That applies a fortiori where recovery consists of mere sorting and pre-treatment for subsequent use as a secondary raw material. g

85. The Commission deduces from the arguments of the parties before the national court that Grade 3B scrap still contains impurities which are not removed until it is melted down and that special environmental protection precautions are required for handling the material. This shows that it is waste. h

i

<sup>19</sup> The United Kingdom government refers to the opinion in Tombesi's case, cited in footnote 5, above (para 56).

<sup>20</sup> See the judgments in the Inter-Environnement Wallonie case, cited in footnote 5, above (para 33) and in the ARCO Chemie case, cited in footnote 5, above (para 70).

- a 86. Finally, the Commission stresses the importance of a clear definition of waste for, by way of example, the application of Regulation 259/93, even if that regulation is not of direct relevance to the present case.

VI—LEGAL ASSESSMENT

- b A—The relationship between the Waste Directive and the Packaging Directive

87. The parties hold differing views as to the relationship between the two directives and between the terms 'waste', 'recovery' and 'recycling' used in them.

- c 88. A majority is of the opinion that the directives are to be read together and that the respective terms have the same meaning in each. Most of the proponents of this view therefore consider it necessary to answer both questions referred for a preliminary ruling. Since, in their submission, the same understanding of the relevant terms underlies both directives, the answers proposed by them to both questions correspond. With the exception of MPR, they consider that MPR's activity constitutes not complete recycling but pre-treatment or some other recovery operation and that the Grade 3B scrap
d produced is waste. MPR arrives at the opposite result.

89. The United Kingdom government and Corus, on the other hand, are of the view that the Packaging Directive is to be interpreted and applied independently and that only the second question referred for a preliminary ruling is relevant to the decision in the main proceedings.

- e 90. In that regard, it must be stated first of all that the Waste Directive introduced in 1975 the first basic rules for harmonisation of national laws in the field of waste disposal. In this area of the law which was then just beginning to develop the Community confined itself in the directive to a few vague framework provisions.

- f 91. Above all, what is actually waste was not laid down precisely. It is true that the Waste Directive was substantially reformulated in 1991<sup>21</sup>. However, the definition of waste remained almost unchanged. The definition has time and again confronted the court with difficult questions of interpretation, to which it has not always been possible to find satisfactory answers.

- g 92. In 1991 art 2(2) was also introduced, which expressly envisages the laying down in further directives of specific rules concerning particular instances, or of supplementary rules, for the management of individual categories of waste. The Packaging Directive constitutes such special supplementary legislation.

- h 93. It is true that art 2(2) reads like an enabling power. However, such a power is not actually required. The power to adopt directives in the field of waste management arises directly from the EC Treaty, in the case of the Packaging Directive from art 100a (now, after amendment, art 95 EC). Even i without art 2(2) of the Waste Directive it would have been open to the Community to adopt further special directives relating to waste.

94. There is accordingly no order of precedence as between the provisions of the two directives in the sense of the Waste Directive ranking above the Packaging Directive. On the contrary, they are equal-ranking measures of secondary legislation which are directly founded on the Treaty. At the same time the Packaging Directive forms a special legislative measure for the category of waste covered by it which overrides the Waste Directive if their provisions conflict.

21 See footnote 2, above.

95. That of course does not mean that the Waste Directive is irrelevant to the handling of packaging waste. First, the Packaging Directive refers on numerous occasions to the Waste Directive. Through reference to them, definitions in the Waste Directive are also applicable to the matters covered by the Packaging Directive. In that way, account is taken of the objective, set out in the third recital in the preamble of Directive 91/156 amending the Waste Directive<sup>22</sup>, of having a basis of common terminology for Community waste law. a

96. Corresponding references appear in relation to the definition of packaging waste in art 3(2) of the Packaging Directive and of recovery in art 3(6). On the other hand, recycling is defined in art 3(7) without any reference to the Waste Directive. b

97. Second, packaging waste is simultaneously waste within the meaning of the Waste Directive, as is in any event clear from the definition in art 3(2) of the Packaging Directive. In so far as the Packaging Directive contains no divergent provisions, all other relevant waste law provisions therefore also apply to packaging waste. The Community did not wish, by the Packaging Directive, to establish a self-contained set of rules for packaging waste and to take this category of waste outside the scope of other provisions of waste law. c

98. Thus, the Packaging Directive contains detailed provisions on the recovery of packaging waste but not, for example, on its disposal or its transfrontier shipment. Articles 4 and 5 of the Waste Directive and Regulation 259/93 are consequently also to be observed when handling packaging waste. d

99. Finally, the principles of the Waste Directive are to be observed when interpreting the Packaging Directive in so far as the overall Community strategy for waste management finds expression in the former<sup>23</sup>. The Packaging Directive itself also fits into that overall strategy. e

100. Both directives thus essentially pursue the same objectives, namely, first, the prevention and reduction of waste production<sup>24</sup> and, second, the recovery of waste instead of its disposal<sup>25</sup>. This ultimately assists in the prudent and rational utilisation of natural resources, as required by the third indent of art 174(1) EC (formerly art 130r(1) of the EC Treaty). f

101. Of course, the Packaging Directive goes further than the Waste Directive in so far as it sets quantitative objectives for the proportion of packaging waste that is to be recovered and recycled. g

B—The relationship between the concept of waste and recycling

102. The relationship between classification as waste and the carrying out of a recycling operation is of crucial importance for deciding the case. It is not in dispute that the material which MPR processes is packaging waste. If the material were to cease to be packaging waste as a result of the recycling, that would turn exclusively on the interpretation of the Packaging Directive, which constitutes special legislation for the recycling of packaging waste. h

103. In the view of the court, a complete recovery operation under Annex IIB does not necessarily deprive a substance of its classification as i

<sup>22</sup> Cited in footnote 2, above.

<sup>23</sup> See the seventh recital in the preamble to the Packaging Directive.

<sup>24</sup> See in particular art 3(1)(a) of the Waste Directive and art 1(2) of the Packaging Directive.

<sup>25</sup> See in particular art 3(1)(b) of the Waste Directive and art 1(2) of the Packaging Directive.

a waste<sup>26</sup>. Rather, that fact is only one of the factors to be taken into consideration for the purpose of determining whether the substance constitutes waste. However, this finding cannot automatically be applied to the case of recycling.

b 104. It is true that, theoretically, it cannot be ruled out that a substance obtained by a recycling operation also constitutes waste. If, for instance, there were no demand for the recycled material in the foreseeable future and the storage costs exceeded the proceeds which might be obtained later, it would be conceivable that the recycling undertaking would wish to discard its products. In practice, however, it would probably be extremely rare for a holder of material recycled at considerable expense to intend to discard it again.

c 105. It would also be inconsistent with the spirit and purpose of the Packaging Directive to accept that recycled packaging waste is still waste. The central concern of the Packaging Directive is the attainment of quantitative recovery objectives. If packaging waste did not as a rule cease to be waste upon being recycled, it could undergo a recovery operation again. The same material would then be recovered twice and double-counted with regard to achievement d of the recovery rate.

e 106. A majority of the parties submit that the two directives should be read 'together' and also consider that waste ceases to be waste after recycling has been carried out. Proceeding on that basis, MPR in particular judges the recovery operation carried out on the basis of whether the processed material continues or ceases to be waste. The definition of recycling is thus determined by the recycling's outcome.

f 107. This approach fails to take into account that for the definition of recycling the Packaging Directive is special legislation vis-à-vis the Waste Directive. Regard would not be had to that relationship if the question whether recycling has been carried out were determined on the basis of whether or not a material is waste. On the view put forward in this opinion as to the relationship between the two directives, it must, quite to the contrary, be examined first and foremost whether a recycling operation has been carried out. If that is the case, it is to be concluded as a rule that the recovered material has ceased to be waste.

g 108. In this connection, it should be remembered that, in accordance with settled case law, the question whether a substance is waste cannot be answered on the basis of certain characteristics of the substance itself, but that the crucial factor is the conduct of the holder of the waste, that is to say whether or not he intends to discard the substance<sup>27</sup>. The court has thus refused to make classification of a material as waste dependent on its economic value, its fitness for re-use<sup>28</sup> or the environmental hazards posed by it<sup>29</sup>.

h 109. The holder's conduct can be appraised only with regard to his intentions, a fact which causes the body applying the law considerable difficulties. The court solves this problem by inferring an intention to discard

i 26 See the judgment in the ARCO Chemie case, cited in footnote 5, above (paras 94, 95).

27 See the judgments in the Inter-Environnement Wallonie case, cited in footnote 5, above (para 26) and in Application by Palin Granit Oy Case C-9/00 [2003] All ER (EC) 366, [2002] ECR I-3533 (para 22).

28 See the judgments in Criminal proceedings against Vessoso Joined cases C-206/88 and C-207/88 [1990] ECR I-1461 (para 9) and in Tombesi's case, cited in footnote 5, above (para 52).

29 See the ARCO Chemie case, cited in footnote 5, above (para 66).

the substance from objective indicators; in so doing it has regard both to all the factual circumstances and to the aim of the Waste Directive<sup>30</sup>. a

110. In determining whether Grade 3B scrap is to be classified as waste, all circumstances which suggest the discarding of a substance, or no such discarding, would accordingly be relevant. In this context, a crucial factor is whether the material has already undergone recycling. If it has not, a further indicator can be whether it is to be subjected to such a recovery process. Assessment of the processes carried out by MPR or the steel producers in the light of art 3(7) of the Packaging Directive is thus an issue preliminary to the classification of Grade 3B scrap as waste and not vice versa. b

111. The court has found that it may not be inferred from the mere fact that an operation referred to in Annex IIA or IIB to the Waste Directive is carried out that the holder of the material intends to discard it since it is often difficult to distinguish between waste disposal or recovery operations and the treatment of other products<sup>31</sup>. c

112. However, those findings do not preclude the approach put forward here. In contrast to the position in the judgments cited, the material to be recovered was (at any rate originally) packaging waste. The issue is solely that of determining whether it is still waste. Classification of the operations which have already been carried out or are still to be carried out has, in this case, a significance different from that in cases where it is first to be established whether the material to be dealt with is waste at all. d

113. Moreover, it is to be inferred that material is waste from the carrying out not of a recovery operation under Annex IIB to the Waste Directive but of a recycling operation, which is more precisely defined in art 3(7) of the Packaging Directive than the operations in Annex IIB. e

114. Nor is the concept of waste retroactively altered by the approach put forward here. Rather, the classification of a substance under the Waste Directive has always depended on whether the holder intends to dispose of it. The Waste Directive does not lay down the criteria to be applied in determining the holder's intention<sup>32</sup>. As already stated, that depends on the overall circumstances in each case. In this connection, not only factual circumstances but also the wider legislative context may be relevant, even if the pertinent legislation was not adopted until after the Waste Directive. f

C—The order in which the two questions referred for a preliminary ruling should be dealt with g

115. It follows from the observations set out in A and B, above that the question as to which operation constitutes complete recycling of steel from packaging waste does not turn on whether the materials arising from the process in question are still to be classified as waste within the meaning of the Waste Directive. On the contrary, the very characterisation of the operation carried out determines whether they cease to be waste. h

116. It therefore appears unnecessary, having regard to the questions of law to be decided in the main proceedings, to answer the first question submitted for a preliminary ruling. In any event, the second question is to be dealt with first. i

<sup>30</sup> See the judgment in the Palin Granit case, cited in footnote 27, above (paras 24, 25).

<sup>31</sup> See the judgments in the ARCO Chemie case, cited in footnote 5, above (paras 51, 82) and in the Palin Granit case, cited in footnote 27, above (para 27).

<sup>32</sup> See the judgment in the Palin Granit case, cited in footnote 27, above (para 25).

a D—The second question referred for a preliminary ruling

117. Article 3(7) of the Packaging Directive defines recycling for the purposes of that directive. This provision forms the basis for answering the second question submitted for a preliminary ruling. It would appear that hitherto the court has not adopted a view on the concept of recycling. Before interpreting the provision on the basis of its wording, brief consideration must be given to the Community law context, the meaning of the term 'recycling' in the light of the objectives of the Packaging Directive and the evolution of that concept in the legislative process which led to the adoption of the Packaging Directive.

(1) Preliminary remarksc (a) Recycling in Community law

118. The Packaging Directive contains the first detailed definition of the concept of recycling, which—in simple terms—consists in recovery of the materials from which the packaging has been produced in order to re-use them. This method of recovering packaging waste has two merits. First, the recycled material no longer needs to be disposed of as waste. Secondly, energy and raw materials are conserved.

119. Essentially this approach may be found in a series of older legislative measures. Thus, in the Waste Directive—if not also in the German language version—the term 'recycling' is likewise referred to in art 3(1)(b)(i). MPR places substantial reliance on that provision, where, in its submission, the aspect of recycling highlighted is the extraction of secondary raw materials. The national court too refers, in alternative (a) in its questions, to the obtaining of secondary raw materials ('a feedstock').

120. The idea of recycling had already appeared in art 2(e) of Council Directive (EEC) 85/339 (on containers of liquids for human consumption)<sup>33</sup> which was replaced by the Packaging Directive<sup>34</sup>. In addition, art 3 of Council Directive (EEC) 75/439 (on the disposal of waste oils)<sup>35</sup> should be mentioned.

121. Apart from the fact that those special legislative measures can have little bearing on the sphere of packaging waste, they also provide no further pointers as to the concept of recycling. That is equally true of the legislative measures following the Packaging Directive which took up its definition of recycling<sup>36</sup>.

(b) Recycling in the Packaging Directive's legislative context

122. Article 3(7) of the Packaging Directive cannot be looked at in isolation. On the contrary, in interpreting that provision regard is to be had to the objectives of the directive and of related legislation.

123. It is to be noted that the Packaging Directive aims, on the one hand, to prevent any impact of packaging waste on the environment or to reduce such impact, thus providing a high level of protection, and, on the other hand, to ensure the functioning of the internal market<sup>37</sup>.

<sup>33</sup> OJ 1985 L176 p 18.

<sup>34</sup> See art 23 of the Packaging Directive.

<sup>35</sup> OJ 1975 L194 p 23.

<sup>36</sup> See in particular art 2(7) of Directive 2000/53.

<sup>37</sup> See art 1(1) of the Packaging Directive and the first recital in its preamble.

(i) High level of environmental protection

124. The objective of attaining a high level of environmental protection accords with the requirements of art 174(2) EC (formerly art 130r(2) of the EC Treaty). Article 6 EC (formerly art 3c of the EC Treaty) requires environmental protection requirements to be integrated also when measures to harmonise laws are adopted. The court has deduced from that objective, which the Waste Directive also serves, that the concept of waste is to be interpreted broadly<sup>38</sup>.

125. Applied to the Packaging Directive, this means that the concept of recycling cannot be interpreted in such a way that a material ceases to be waste too quickly and consequently is no longer subject to waste controls at a time when those controls are still necessary in order to ensure a high level of environmental protection.

126. It is to be ensured in particular that used packaging does not pose an environmental hazard and that—in so far as it cannot be re-used—it is where possible recovered, avoiding disposal<sup>39</sup>.

127. Of the various forms of recovery, recycling is the one to be preferred<sup>40</sup>. It contributes to environmental protection by conserving energy and primary raw materials and reducing the amount of waste for ultimate disposal<sup>41</sup>.

(ii) No distortion of competition in the internal market

128. In contrast to the Waste Directive, the Packaging Directive sets specific recovery targets. Article 6(1)(b) thus imposes quantitative obligations on the member states with regard to the proportion of the total amount of packaging material that must as a minimum be recycled. The Packaging Directive, which is based on art 100a of the EC Treaty (now art 95 EC), is intended to standardise the provisions of the member states, and distortions of competition are intended to be avoided.

129. Even if, taking all factors into account, recycling can lead to savings in the national economy<sup>42</sup>, it represents a cost factor for the undertakings which must pay for recycling the packaging placed into circulation by them. Ultimately that expenditure makes their products more expensive and thus affects their prospects on the market.

130. The Community has to some extent accepted unequal burdens on industry in the member states by not laying down a specific minimum recovery rate but allowing a spread of rates. Greater imbalances could result if the member states take as a basis concepts of recycling which differ substantially from one another and the costs of meeting the recovery rates consequently differ.

131. The court should therefore lay down a definitive interpretation of the concept of recycling in order to ensure that the objective of harmonising laws is achieved. In addition, the interpretation must ensure that the same

38 See the judgment in the ARCO Chemie case, cited in footnote 5, above (para 40).

39 See art 1(2) of the Packaging Directive and the seventh recital in its preamble.

40 See the eighth recital in the preamble to the Packaging Directive. The priority accorded to recycling is, however, subject to a proviso as to adequate scientific and technological knowledge concerning recovery.

41 See the 11th recital in the preamble to the Packaging Directive.

42 The Commission estimates, on the basis of various studies, that the costs of recycling are roughly equal to the saved waste disposal costs. (See the explanatory memorandum for the Commission Proposal for a Directive of the European Parliament and of the Council amending Directive (EC) 94/62 on packaging and packaging waste, COM(2001) 729 final of 7 December 2001, p 17.)

a packaging material is not counted more than once in recycling rate calculations, as the United Kingdom government correctly points out.

(c) Evolution of the concept of recycling in the legislative process

b 132. The definition of recycling in the Commission proposal<sup>43</sup> differs from the version in force (see para 7, above), stating:

‘recycling means the recovery of the waste materials for the original purpose or for other purposes excluding energy recovery; recycling means also regeneration and composting.’

c 133. The definition is not considered in greater detail in the explanatory memorandum. It lacks some elements which are included in the version now in force. According to the German version of the proposal, simply ‘materials’ (‘Stoffe’) can undergo recycling; it is left open whether or not they must be waste. In addition, the process is characterised solely by the objective of re-use of the material for the original or other purposes. The draft does not contain a more detailed description of the process of recycling.

d 134. A version corresponding in essence to the current formulation first appears in Common Position (EC) 13/94 of the Council of 4 March 1994<sup>44</sup>. No reason is given for the amendment. Nor does it appear to be commented on by either the Commission or the Parliament in the subsequent procedure. It can merely be stated that the definition ultimately adopted describes the process of recycling more precisely and thus enables a clearer line to be drawn between recycling and other recovery operations, a fact which has significance with regard to the recovery rates in art 6(1).

(d) Subsequent evolution

f 135. Recycling has in the meantime acquired considerable importance and will in the future play an even more significant role in the recovery of packaging waste.

g 136. It is apparent from the interim report prescribed by art 6(3), which the Commission submitted in 1999<sup>45</sup>, that almost all the member states had already attained the minimum targets four years after the directive entered into force and some had clearly exceeded the maximum targets. The United Kingdom, with a recycling share of 30% by weight, occupied a place nearer the bottom of the list of member states; in the case of steel, the recycling rate reached an average of 26% by weight<sup>46</sup>.

h 137. In the meantime the Commission has submitted a proposal to amend the Packaging Directive<sup>47</sup>. The proposal envisages a significant increase in the recovery rates (between 60% and 75% by weight for recovery and between 55% and 70% by weight for recycling). Furthermore, the Commission follows a new approach of introducing separate rates for the recycling of various materials. Thus, the recycling rate for metals should reach 50% by weight in the future.

43 COM(92) 278 final, also reproduced without the statement of reasons at OJ 1992 C263 p 1.

i 44 OJ 1994 C137 p 65.

45 COM(1999) 596 final.

46 See Table III.5 of the 1999 interim report (cited in footnote 45, above), which reproduces figures for the United Kingdom for 1997.

47 See the Commission Proposal for a Directive of the European Parliament and of the Council amending Directive (EC) 94/62 on packaging and packaging waste (COM(2001) 729 final, also reproduced without the explanatory memorandum at OJ 2002 C103E p 17).

138. In particular with regard to plastics, a distinction is, moreover, drawn a between mechanical, chemical and feedstock recycling. Those further definitions could be illuminating if taken as sub-categories of recycling.
However, doubts are engendered by use of a Commission proposal for the amendment of the Packaging Directive in order to draw conclusions as to the interpretation of the directive in the version in force. b

(2) Interpretation of art 3(7) of the Packaging Directive

139. The definition of recycling in art 3(7) of the Packaging Directive contains three elements of relevance here: recycling is undergone by 'waste materials' (a); the waste materials are reprocessed for the original or another purpose (b); and the reprocessing occurs in a production process (c). The inclusion of organic recycling and exclusion of energy recovery are irrelevant to the present case. c

(a) Waste materials

140. MPR submits that the steel producers do not carry out any recycling if d only because the starting material supplied by MPR, Grade 3B scrap, is already no longer waste.

141. In the definition of recycling, however, the term used is not 'waste' but 'waste materials' which is not to be found anywhere else in the Packaging Directive, or in the Waste Directive. It could be concluded from this choice of words that the materials which can undergo recycling derive from (packaging) e waste but at the time of recycling do not necessarily still have to be waste within the meaning of the Waste Directive. Classification of the steel producers' activity would then no longer depend on whether or not the Grade 3B scrap melted down by them is still waste.

142. This must be prefaced by the observation that some language versions f of the Packaging Directive simply use the term corresponding to 'waste' in art 3(7) too (as the French, Spanish, Portuguese and Finnish versions do). The majority of the language versions, on the other hand, parallel the English version where 'waste materials' appears (as the German, Danish, Swedish, Dutch and Italian versions do). It therefore cannot be ruled out that use of the term 'waste materials' was intended to indicate that not only waste may g undergo recycling.

143. A factor running counter to that interpretation is the function, already set out, of the definition of recycling in relation to achievement of the recovery targets. If material which derives from waste but is no longer waste could still be subjected to a recycling operation, there would be the risk that material which has already been recycled once would undergo recycling once again. h
That could result in the same material being counted more than once when calculating the recovery rate.

144. Furthermore, the definition of packaging waste in art 3(2) of the Packaging Directive actually includes 'packaging material' in so far as it is covered by the definition of waste in the Waste Directive. In view of that, it is hardly possible to proceed on the basis that the term 'waste materials' was i intended to denote substances which are not waste.

145. One might, however, wonder whether materials which are subjected to recycling can be waste at all. Since recycling is described as use in a production process, it might be supposed that the element of discarding which is central to the definition of waste is missing.

a 146. That proposition is opposed, however, by the fact that all recovery constitutes a beneficial use of waste but the materials to be recovered do not cease to be waste for that reason. On the contrary, in accordance with the court's case law discarding of material takes place precisely when it is recovered or disposed of<sup>48</sup>. Since recycling is to be regarded as a special form of recovery<sup>49</sup>, material which is to be subjected to an appropriate production process cannot cease to be waste solely for that reason.

b 147. The term 'waste materials' emphasises on the contrary only the material-based starting point for recycling. Recycling is underlain by the idea that certain substances are recovered from waste and re-used, so that a materials cycle arises, as the word 'recycling' makes clear.

c 148. Starting out from that idea, the term 'waste materials' makes it clear that the various materials or substances joined together as packaging must be dealt with separately with regard to their recycling. Glass, metal, plastic, paper and so forth can be used only in specific production processes applicable to the material in question. That differentiates recycling, including organic recycling, from energy recovery, for which mixtures of substances can also be used.

d 149. It must therefore be concluded that it was not intended, by employing the term 'waste materials', to indicate that substances which undergo recycling no longer have to be waste. Rather, that term merely takes account of the fact that the materials must be recovered separately.

e (b) Reprocessing for the original purpose or another purpose

150. The concept of reprocessing means that the waste materials are, by their treatment, returned to a state in which they were before they became packaging waste. That process should make the materials re-usable for the original or another purpose.

f 151. The United Kingdom government has put forward the view, as Corus did at the hearing, that the term 'other purposes' must mean purposes similar to the production of new packaging. However, the directive's wording provides no basis for that interpretation. Nor is it even the issue. In accordance with the spirit and purpose of the directive, it is intended merely to preclude the recycling of material for the purpose of then treating it as waste again, that is to say carrying out further recovery operations or even disposing of it.

g

(c) Production process

h 152. The distinguishing feature of a production process is that, with some utilisation of means of production and the use of energy, one or more starting materials are transformed or joined together in such a way that in the end a new product is created. The starting materials can be raw materials or semi-finished products. The new product is characterised by a higher degree of processing than the starting material.

(3) Classification of the operation carried out by MPR

i 153. It must be examined whether, on the basis of the interpretation of art 3(7) of the Packaging Directive put forward in this opinion, MPR's activity is to be regarded as recycling.

<sup>48</sup> See the judgment in the ARCO Chemie case, cited in footnote 5, above (para 47).

<sup>49</sup> See the 11th recital in the preamble to the Packaging Directive.

154. The materials processed by MPR include a certain proportion of metal packaging waste which indisputably amounts to waste materials falling within the definition that has been elucidated. a

155. It is open to doubt, however, whether MPR carries out reprocessing for the original purpose or for other purposes. For that to be the case, MPR would have to return the material to a state in which it was before it became packaging or packaging waste. b

156. It cannot be reconverted into iron ore. Even if it is assumed that Grade 3B scrap has already been used in producing the packaging, MPR does not return the material to an identical state. Grade 3B scrap is a mixture containing, in addition to steel, a certain amount of foreign substances. The previously processed Grade 3B scrap and the Grade 3B scrap obtained by MPR from packaging waste do not have the same composition. Rather, the material does not attain a previous state until it is pure steel again. c

157. Nor can Grade 3B scrap be used directly for the original purpose of producing new packaging. At most, 'another purpose' is possible, namely use as material for stoking furnaces.

158. The aim of recycling is, however, to recover starting materials. As long as there are still mixtures of substances which must be cleaned and have foreign substances removed from them in further processes, reprocessing has not yet been completed. Rather, subsequent cleaning and separation processes are to be regarded as recovery operations. The production of a substance which must be subjected to further recovery operations cannot amount to 'another purpose' within the meaning of art 3(7) of the Packaging Directive. d

159. As is apparent from the order for reference, Grade 3B scrap contains impurities which must be removed before the steel is re-used. Those foreign substances are not separated from the steel by means of physical or chemical processes until the melting-down stage when they are removed with the slag which forms a sediment on the liquid metal or vaporise. e

160. Finally, the operations carried out by MPR cannot be regarded as a production process. It is true that MPR indisputably uses both machines and energy. The crushing could also be regarded as a kind of transformation. However, the process does not result in a product which displays a higher degree of processing than the starting material. Rather, MPR produces a secondary raw material. That material may admittedly meet the Grade 3B specification established by the industry and therefore be suitable for use in a production process. However, it is still a raw material which—as its appellation already indicates—is unprocessed. f

161. The wording in art 3(1)(b)(i) of the Waste Directive concerning the concept of recycling (see para 6, above) does not preclude that outcome. On MPR's reading of that provision, the objective of recycling is precisely to extract secondary raw materials. g

162. First, it is, however, not entirely clear whether the phrase 'with a view to extracting secondary raw materials' refers to the word 'recycling' or only to the final matter listed, namely 'any other process'. As the Environment Agency correctly points out, on 'reclamation' at any rate, which is also included in the list, no secondary raw material is extracted. h

163. Nor is the term 'recycling' included in art 1 of the Waste Directive where any other definitions applying to the Waste Directive are set out. It is therefore questionable whether the term 'recycling' should be defined at all at this point in the directive. i a 164. Secondly, regard is to be had to the relationship between the two directives. On the interpretation of the Packaging Directive put forward in this opinion, when a secondary raw material is produced recycling within the meaning of the directive has not yet taken place. That is at any rate the case where the secondary raw material still contains foreign substances which must be removed in subsequent operations. If a different concept of recycling were

b to underlie the Waste Directive in this regard, the Packaging Directive, as special legislation, would override it.

165. This interpretation also accords with the objectives of the Packaging Directive, in accordance with which recycling is to result in the saving of primary raw materials. Primary raw materials are not saved until steel is obtained from Grade 3B scrap instead of from iron ore.

c 166. Moreover, a narrow interpretation is required in order that the packaging waste processed by MPR does not cease to be waste at a time when it still needs to be controlled as waste. It is apparent from the order for reference that, even after processing by MPR, the material contains impurities which call for special storage precautions, as in the case of waste, in order to d avoid soil contamination. In addition, on the subsequent processing of the material the steel producers are subject to integrated pollution control.

167. MPR's treatment of packaging waste is thus not recycling within the meaning of the Packaging Directive because the metal is not completely recovered, foreign substances still requiring removal, and because there is no production process from which a new product comes into being.

e
(4) Classification of the operation carried out by the steel producers

168. The Grade 3B scrap which the steel producers melt down should comprise waste materials derived from packaging. The material processed by MPR originally contained packaging waste. The fact that the operation carried f out by MPR is not to be classified as recycling is an indication that the material is still waste.

169. The only issue which might require consideration is whether MPR has recovered the material in another way and it has thereby ceased to be waste. The processing by MPR could for example involve 'recycling/reclamation of metals and metal compounds' in accordance with point R3 of Annex IIB to the g Waste Directive.

170. It is, however, to be remembered that the court has held that the carrying out of a complete recovery operation under Annex IIB does not necessarily deprive a substance of its classification as waste<sup>50</sup>. That applies a fortiori where pre-treatment such as sorting and grinding is involved which h does not purge the material of all unwanted foreign substances<sup>51</sup>.

171. Since the material is to undergo a further processing operation, in which the steel is rid of the final foreign substances, only when it reaches the steel producers, MPR's treatment has not caused the packaging material to cease to be waste. Regard is also to be had in this connection to the fact that the steel producers are subject to integrated pollution control when they process the i Grade 3B material.

50 See the judgment in the ARCO Chemie case, cited in footnote 5, above (paras 94, 95).

51 See the judgment in the ARCO Chemie case, cited in footnote 5, above (para 96); as to grinding, see the judgment in Tombesi's case, cited in footnote 5, above (para 53).

172. The fact that Grade 3B scrap has an economic value and is suitable for use as a raw material does not prevent it from continuing to be waste<sup>52</sup>. In the Palin Granit case, the court (at para 37) regarded the degree of likelihood that a substance will be re-used, without any further processing prior to its re-use, as a relevant criterion for determining whether it is waste for the purposes of the Waste Directive<sup>53</sup>.

173. In the present case, the precise likelihood that the Grade 3B material will be further processed by the steel producers immediately after being treated by MPR is unknown. There are, however, some indications that the Grade 3B scrap is used in the steelworks at once.

174. In the Palin Granit case, however, the issue to be decided was whether leftover stone which arises as a by-product from quarrying is waste in the first place. In answering that question, different criteria are to be applied from those in the present case, in which it is clear that the material at issue was waste. In order to take account of the protective aim of the Waste and Packaging Directives, it is to be presumed that the material continues to be waste at least until it has demonstrably been fully recovered. As a rule, material ceases to be waste upon being recycled<sup>54</sup>. That is not necessarily the case with other forms of recovery<sup>55</sup>.

175. The treatment by the steel producers also constitutes reprocessing for the original or another purpose. Through re-melting, pure steel is obtained and the material is thus again brought to a state in which it was before the packaging was produced. The ingots, sheets or coils of steel can be used to produce packaging again or other products.

176. Finally, the melting down also forms a production process. In the steelmaking process, using furnaces and energy, (semi-finished) products are made, from the Grade 3B scrap which have a higher degree of processing than the starting material.

177. The answer to the second question should therefore be that the materials have not already been recycled within the meaning of art 3(7) of the Packaging Directive when they have been rendered suitable for use as a feedstock but have been recycled only when they have been used by a steelmaker so as to produce ingots, sheets or coils of steel.

E—The first question

178. In view of the answer to the second question, it appears no longer necessary to answer the first question. The question whether packaging waste has been recycled is to be determined exclusively on the basis of the Packaging Directive.

179. The question whether and when it ceases to be waste is relevant in relation to recycling only in so far as waste materials form the starting material for recycling. In the absence of recycling by MPR, Grade 3B scrap has—as set out—not ceased to be waste and can be recycled by the steel producers.

<sup>52</sup> See the judgments in Vessoso's case, cited in footnote 28, above (paras 12, 13), in Tombesi's case, cited in footnote 5, above (para 54) and in the Inter-Environnement Wallonie case, cited in footnote 5, above (para 31).

<sup>53</sup> See the judgment in the Palin Granit case, cited in footnote 27, above.

<sup>54</sup> See paras 104 and 105, above.

<sup>55</sup> See the case law cited in footnote 26, above.

a 180. The first question might, however, also be understood as meaning that the High Court wishes to ascertain when other materials not covered by the Packaging Directive are to be regarded as recycled.

b 181. In accordance with settled case law, it is first of all solely for the national court before which the dispute has been brought, and which must assume responsibility for the subsequent judicial decision, to determine in the light of the particular circumstances of the case both the need for a preliminary ruling in order to enable it to deliver judgment and the relevance of the questions which it submits to the Court of Justice<sup>56</sup>.

c 182. Nevertheless, the court has held that it has no jurisdiction to give a preliminary ruling on a question submitted by a national court where it is quite obvious that the interpretation of Community law, or the decision as to validity of Community law, sought by that court bears no relation to the actual facts of the main action or its purpose or where the problem is hypothetical<sup>57</sup>.

d 183. The parties to the proceedings before the High Court are in dispute as to the entitlement to issue PRNs in respect of the recycling of packaging waste. The order for reference provides no indication at all that the question of when waste other than packaging waste has been recycled is relevant to the decision in the case pending before the High Court.

184. Accordingly, the question should not be answered.

VII—CONCLUSION

e 185. On the basis of the foregoing arguments, I propose the following answer to the second question referred for a preliminary ruling:

f Packaging waste made of steel has not already been recycled within the meaning of art 3(7) of European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 94/62 (on packaging and packaging waste) when it has been rendered suitable for use as a feedstock but has been recycled only when it has been used by a steelmaker so as to produce ingots, sheets or coils of steel.

19 June 2003. The COURT OF JUSTICE (Fifth Chamber) delivered the following judgment.

g 1. By order of 9 November 2000, received at the Court of Justice of the European Communities on 30 November 2000, the High Court of Justice of England and Wales, Queen's Bench Division (Administrative Court), referred to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) two questions on the interpretation of Council Directive (EEC) 75/442 (on waste) (OJ 1975 L194 p 39), as amended by Council Directive (EEC) 91/156 (OJ 1991 L78 p 32) and Commission Decision (EC) 96/350 (adapting Annexes IIA and IIB to Directive 75/442 on waste) (OJ 1996 L135 p 32) (Directive 75/442), and of European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 94/62 (on packaging and packaging waste) (OJ 1994 L365 p 10).

h 2. Those questions were raised in proceedings between Mayer Parry Recycling Ltd (Mayer Parry) and the Environment Agency concerning the latter's refusal to grant Mayer Parry's application for accreditation as a 'reprocessor', which is defined as a person who carries out the activities of waste recovery or recycling. a

i

<sup>56</sup> See in particular the judgment in Union Royale Belge des Sociétés de Football Association ASBL v Bosman, Royal Club Liégeois SA v Bosman, Union des Associations Européennes de Football v Bosman Case C-415/93 [1996] All ER (EC) 97, [1995] ECR I-4921 (para 59).

<sup>57</sup> See the judgments in Bosman's case, cited in footnote 56, above (para 61) and in Evangelischer Krankenhausverein Wien v Abgabenberufungskommission Wien, Wein & Co Handelsges mbH v Oberösterreichische Landesregierung Case C-437/97 [2001] All ER (EC) 735, [2000] ECR I-1157 (para 52).

LEGAL CONTEXT

Community legislation b

3. Article 1 of Directive 75/442 states:

'For the purposes of this Directive:

(a) "waste" shall mean any substance or object in the categories set out in Annex I which the holder discards or intends or is required to discard.

The Commission, acting in accordance with the procedure laid down in Article 18, will draw up, not later than 1 April 1993, a list of wastes belonging to the categories listed in Annex I. This list will be periodically reviewed and, if necessary, revised by the same procedure; c

(b) "producer" shall mean anyone whose activities produce waste ("original producer") and/or anyone who carries out pre-processing, mixing or other operations resulting in a change in the nature or composition of this waste ... d

(c) "disposal" shall mean any of the operations provided for in Annex II, A;

(f) "recovery" shall mean any of the operations provided for in Annex II, B ...' e

4. The recovery operations specified in Annex IIB include, at point R3, '[r]ecycling/reclamation of metals and metal compounds'. The introductory note to Annex IIB explains that that annex is intended to list recovery operations as they occur in practice.

5. Article 3(1) of Directive 75/442 provides: f

'Member States shall take appropriate measures to encourage:

(a) firstly, the prevention or reduction of waste production and its harmfulness, in particular by ...

(b) secondly:

(i) the recovery of waste by means of recycling, re-use or reclamation or any other process with a view to extracting secondary raw materials, or g

(ii) the use of waste as a source of energy.'

6. Article 4 of Directive 75/442 provides:

'Member States shall take the necessary measures to ensure that waste is recovered or disposed of without endangering human health and without using processes or methods which could harm the environment ...' h

Member States shall also take the necessary measures to prohibit the abandonment, dumping or uncontrolled disposal of waste.'

7. Article 8 of Directive 75/442 states:

'Member States shall take the necessary measures to ensure that any holder of waste: i

—has it handled by a private or public waste collector or by an undertaking which carries out the operations listed in Annex II A or B, or —recovers or disposes of it himself in accordance with the provisions of this Directive.'

a 8. The first subparagraph of art 9(1) of Directive 75/442 is worded as follows:

b 'For the purposes of implementing Articles 4, 5 and 7, any establishment or undertaking which carries out the operations specified in Annex II A must obtain a permit from the competent authority referred to in Article 6.'

9. Article 10 of Directive 75/442 states:

c 'For the purposes of implementing Article 4, any establishment or undertaking which carries out the operations referred to in Annex II B must obtain a permit.'

10. Article 12 of Directive 75/442 provides:

d 'Establishments or undertakings which collect or transport waste on a professional basis or which arrange for the disposal or recovery of waste on behalf of others (dealers or brokers), where not subject to authorization, shall be registered with the competent authorities.'

11. Article 13 of Directive 75/442 provides:

e 'Establishments or undertakings which carry out the operations referred to in Articles 9 to 12 shall be subject to appropriate periodic inspections by the competent authorities.'

12. Article 15 of Directive 75/442 states:

f 'In accordance with the "polluter pays" principle, the cost of disposing of waste must be borne by:

—the holder who has waste handled by a waste collector or by an undertaking as referred to in Article 9,
and/or

—the previous holders or the producer of the product from which the waste came.'

13. Article 1 of Directive 94/62 states:

g '1. This Directive aims to harmonize national measures concerning the management of packaging and packaging waste in order, on the one hand, to prevent any impact thereof on the environment of all Member States as well as of third countries or to reduce such impact, thus providing a high level of environmental protection, and, on the other hand, to ensure the functioning of the internal market and to avoid obstacles to trade and distortion and restriction of competition within the Community.

h 2. To this end this Directive lays down measures aimed, as a first priority, at preventing the production of packaging waste and, as additional fundamental principles, at reusing packaging, at recycling and other forms of recovering packaging waste and, hence, at reducing the final disposal of such waste.'

i 14. Article 3 of Directive 94/62 provides:

'For the purposes of this Directive:

1. "packaging" shall mean all products made of any materials of any nature to be used for the containment, protection, handling, delivery and presentation of goods, from raw materials to processed goods, from the producer to the user or the consumer. "Non-returnable items" used for the same purposes shall also be considered to constitute packaging ... a

2. "packaging waste" shall mean any packaging or packaging material covered by the definition of waste in Directive 75/442/EEC, excluding production residues ...

6. "recovery" shall mean any of the applicable operations provided for in Annex II.B to Directive 75/442/EEC; b

7. "recycling" shall mean the reprocessing in a production process of the waste materials for the original purpose or for other purposes including organic recycling but excluding energy recovery ...'

15. Article 6(1) of Directive 94/62 states:

'In order to comply with the objectives of this Directive, Member States shall take the necessary measures to attain the following targets covering the whole of their territory; c

(a) no later than five years from the date by which this Directive must be implemented in national law, between 50% as a minimum and 65% as a maximum by weight of the packaging waste will be recovered; d

(b) within this general target, and with the same time limit, between 25% as a minimum and 45% as a maximum by weight of the totality of packaging materials contained in packaging waste will be recycled with a minimum of 15% by weight for each packaging material;

(c) no later than 10 years from the date by which this Directive must be implemented in national law, a percentage of packaging waste will be recovered and recycled, which will have to be determined by the Council in accordance with paragraph 3(b) with a view to substantially increasing the targets mentioned in paragraphs (a) and (b).'e

16. The first subparagraph of art 7(1) of Directive 94/62 provides:

'Member States shall take the necessary measures to ensure that systems are set up to provide for: f

(a) the return and/or collection of used packaging and/or packaging waste from the consumer, other final user, or from the waste stream in order to channel it to the most appropriate waste management alternatives;

(b) the reuse or recovery including recycling of the packaging and/or packaging waste collected, g in order to meet the objectives laid down in this Directive.'

National legislation

17. Section 93 of the Environment Act 1995 empowers the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions to make regulations imposing producer responsibility obligations on such persons, and in respect of such products or materials, as may be prescribed. That section was enacted to ensure implementation of art 6(1) of Directive 94/62. h

18. The Producer Responsibility Obligations (Packaging Waste) Regulations 1997, SI 1997/648 (the 1997 regulations) were adopted pursuant to ss 93-95 of the 1995 Act. i

19. The 1997 regulations use the definitions of recovery and recycling contained in art 3 of Directive 94/62 and define reprocessor as a person who, in the ordinary course of conduct of a trade, occupation or profession, carries out the activities of recovery or recycling.

- a* 20. Under the 1997 regulations, a waste producer must furnish to the Environment Agency a certificate of compliance stating that he has complied with his recovery and recycling obligations for the relevant year. It is a criminal offence to contravene this provision. In addition, under reg 22 a producer must provide the Environment Agency with information from his records, including the amount in tonnes of packaging waste provided to a reprocessor.
- b* 21. The 1997 regulations allow a producer to fulfil the foregoing obligations by being a member of a registered scheme throughout a relevant year. There is no requirement for the operator of the scheme to furnish the Environment Agency with a certificate of compliance, but he is required, under reg 24 of the 1997 regulations, to maintain records of, and supply the Environment Agency with, certain information, including the amount in tonnes of packaging waste provided to a reprocessor.
- c* 22. The Environment Agency and the Scottish Environment Protection Agency have issued a document called the Orange Book, which establishes a voluntary accreditation system. The system allows accredited reprocessors to issue Packaging Waste Recovery Notes (PRNs) as evidence of delivery of packaging waste to them by producers or registered schemes.
- d* 23. The accreditation system is intended to enable a producer to confirm to the Environment Agency or the Scottish Environment Protection Agency that the packaging waste which he has delivered to a reprocessor has been recovered or recycled, thereby permitting satisfactory monitoring of producers and registered schemes with regard to their obligations under the 1997 regulations. It is also intended to provide a means of establishing consistency with regard to the provision of documentary evidence of recovery and recycling.
- e* 24. Under the system established by the Orange Book, the Environment Agency accepts that PRNs issued by accredited reprocessors contain all the information which producers are normally obliged to supply to it pursuant to reg 22 of the 1997 regulations. Only accredited reprocessors are entitled to issue PRNs. PRNs are transferable and have an economic value. They are sold by accredited reprocessors to producers of packaging waste.
- f* 25. The Environment Agency's policy is to accredit those businesses specified in para 3 of Annex D to the Orange Book, which states that 'for metals (aluminium and steel), the reprocessor will be the business producing the ingots, sheets or coils of aluminium or steel from packaging waste'.
- g* 26. The point in the cycle in respect of which accreditation is granted generally corresponds to the point at which a new product is made that is indistinguishable from one made from materials which have never been waste. The scheme was set up so as to ensure that PRNs would not be issued twice in the course of the processing of the same materials and to reduce the possibility of fraud.
- h* 27. The integrated pollution control regime laid down by the Environmental Protection Act 1990 regulates pollution of the environment from certain prescribed processes, including those relating to the production of steel. Such processes may be carried out only if authorised by the Environment Agency.
- i* Activities which form part of a process subject to integrated pollution control are excluded from the national waste management licensing regime as established by the Waste Management Licensing Regulations 1994, SI 1994/1056, which implement Directive 75/442.

THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING a

28. Mayer Parry is a company which specialises in the treatment of scrap metal so as to render it suitable for use by steelmakers for the purpose of producing steel.

29. Mayer Parry obtains scrap metal, which includes packaging waste, from industrial and other sources. The scrap metal has commercial value and Mayer Parry generally has to pay to obtain it. Mayer Parry collects, inspects, tests for radiation, sorts, cleans, cuts, separates and shreds (fragmentises) the scrap metal. Through this process, Mayer Parry transforms ferrous scrap metal into material which meets the specifications of Grade 3B (Grade 3B material). It sells the Grade 3B material to steelmakers, which use it to produce ingots, sheets or coils of steel. b

30. In November 1998, Mayer Parry applied to the Environment Agency for accreditation as a reprocessor entitled to issue PRNs under the voluntary scheme established by the Environment Agency and the Scottish Environment Protection Agency, as set out in the Orange Book. c

31. The Environment Agency refused the application by decision of 15 November 1999. Mayer Parry brought judicial review proceedings before the High Court of Justice of England and Wales, Queen's Bench Division (Administrative Court), seeking, inter alia, the annulment of that decision and a declaration that it carries out recovery and recycling within the meaning of Directive 94/62. Corus (UK) Ltd (Corus) and Allied Steel and Wire Ltd (ASW) have intervened in the High Court proceedings. d

32. The High Court states that, during the course of the proceedings before it, it has become apparent that it is necessary to establish whether the activities carried out by Mayer Parry do or do not constitute recycling within the meaning of Directive 94/62. In the light of the arguments of the parties, it is also necessary to consider certain issues arising with regard both to Directive 75/442 and to the relationship between that directive and Directive 94/62. e

33. The High Court also points out that there were earlier proceedings between Mayer Parry and the Environment Agency concerning the definition of 'waste', which gave rise to a first judgment of the High Court, dated 9 November 1998 (see [1999] Env LR 489). Following that judgment, the scrap metal treated by Mayer Parry so as to constitute Grade 3B material was not considered to be waste. f

34. Since the High Court of Justice of England and Wales, Queen's Bench Division (Administrative Court), considered that the case before it necessitated interpretation of the Community rules, it decided to stay proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling: g

'Where an undertaking deals with packaging materials including ferrous metals, which (when received by that undertaking) constitute waste within the meaning of Article 1(a) of Council Directive 75/442/EEC on waste, as amended by Council Directive 91/156/EEC and Commission Decision 96/350/EC, by means of sorting, cleaning, cutting, crushing, separating and/or baling so as to render those materials suitable for use as a feedstock in a furnace in order to produce ingots, sheets or coils of steel: h

(1) Have those materials been recycled, and do they cease to be waste, for the purposes of Council Directive 75/442, when they have been: i

(a) rendered suitable for use as a feedstock, or

(b) used by a steelmaker so as to produce ingots, sheets or coils of steel?

a (2) Have those materials been recycled for the purposes of European Parliament and Council Directive 94/62/EC on packaging and packaging waste when they have been:

(a) rendered suitable for use as a feedstock, or

(b) used by a steelmaker so as to produce ingots, sheets or coils of steel?

b OBSERVATIONS SUBMITTED TO THE COURT

35. Mayer Parry contends that Directives 75/442 and 94/62 display four features of importance for the main proceedings. First, Directive 75/442 provides common terminology. Second, it is apparent from those directives that 'the discard rule' affects whether material is classified as waste in that Grade 3B material could be classified as 'waste' only if Mayer Parry were to discard it. Third, the objective of seeking to 'conserve natural resources' is achieved when secondary raw materials, such as the Grade 3B material, are obtained. Fourth, a distinction is drawn in the two directives between 'physical recovery' and 'energy recovery'.

c 36. Mayer Parry further contends that, under the court's case law, there are four guiding principles for determining when waste has been recycled. First, the question whether a substance is 'waste' is one for the national court and must be determined in the light of all the circumstances of the case, regard being had to the aim of Directive 75/442 and the need to ensure that its effectiveness is not undermined. Second, any substance is waste if its holder has discarded it or seeks to do so. Third, there is a distinction between 'waste recovery' and 'normal industrial treatment'. Fourth, recovery has been completed where the process has produced a secondary raw material for use in an industrial process. Once a secondary raw material has been produced for use of this kind, such as, in the main proceedings, the Grade 3B material produced by Mayer Parry, recovery and therefore recycling are considered to have been completed and the material is no longer waste.

d 37. The Environment Agency argues that the concept of recycling must be given the same meaning in Directive 75/442 and Directive 94/62 because they have the same objectives. Furthermore, since the concept of waste is the same in Directive 75/442 and Directive 94/62, the directives fall to be considered together. The Environment Agency also submits that the question submitted by the High Court concerns the interpretation of Community law and that the answer to such a question cannot be left to the national court.

e 38. With regard to determining when waste has been recycled, the Environment Agency argues, first, that a substance does not cease to be waste merely because it is in the possession of someone other than the original producer and that person does not himself intend, and is not required, to discard it. Second, although waste does not necessarily cease to be waste merely because it may be said to have undergone a recovery operation, the description of some of those operations may none the less enable the point at which material ceases to be waste to be determined. Thus, there is no reason to retain waste management controls over materials once they have been used to generate energy (see point R1 of Annex IIB to Directive 75/442) or have been reclaimed, regenerated, recycled, re-used or applied to land resulting in benefit to agriculture or ecological improvement (see points R2 to R10 of that annex), or once any wastes obtained from such operations have been used (see point R11 of the annex).

f 39. The Environment Agency contends that the activities of an undertaking such as Mayer Parry do not result in recycling because, as a producer, it carries out only pre-processing or other operations resulting in a change in the nature or composition of the scrap metal which it handles. a

40. The United Kingdom government contends that, in order to decide the main proceedings, it is sufficient to establish whether Mayer Parry's activities constitute recycling within the meaning of Directive 94/62 and, accordingly, there is no need to consider Directive 75/442. In this connection it states, first, that under Directive 94/62 waste can be recycled only once. Second, Mayer Parry's activities do not satisfy the conditions of the definition of recycling in art 3(7) of Directive 94/62, because they do not constitute a production process and Mayer Parry does not carry out reprocessing in the sense of either a reconstitution of waste materials into some new item or use in a process similar to that in which the raw material is used. Third, art 6(2) of Directive 94/62 shows that recycling occurs only at the stage at which a steelmaker produces ingots, sheets or coils of steel. b
c

41. The United Kingdom government also submits that, if it is necessary to examine the relationship between Directive 94/62 and Directive 75/442, the operation of the latter allows the member states a margin of appreciation in defining for themselves what constitutes a recovery operation, whereas Directive 94/62 does not. So far as concerns determination of the point at which material ceases to be waste, a different approach is required for each of the directives since they pursue different objectives. d

42. Corus is a steelmaker which uses Grade 3B material produced by Mayer Parry in the manufacture of ingots, coils and sheets of steel. It is accredited as a reprocessor by the Environment Agency and is one of the interveners in the main proceedings. Corus concurs with the observations of the United Kingdom government, stressing, first, that it is sufficient in the present case for the court to rule on Directive 94/62. Second, it submits that its activities constitute recycling for the purposes of Directive 94/62 because they enable the Grade 3B material to be used for production purposes. Third, the mode of proof of recycling is a matter falling within member state competence. e
f

43. The Danish government indorses the arguments of the Environment Agency, emphasising that the concept of waste must be interpreted broadly in order to protect the environment. In interpreting that concept, weight must be attached to the question whether the waste has undergone such an alteration in its composition that it is possible to speak of a new product which need not be made subject to control by the member states on environmental grounds. It concludes that treatment such as that carried out by Mayer Parry does not constitute recycling within the meaning of Directives 75/442 and 94/62, so that the Grade 3B material produced by it remains waste. g

44. The Netherlands government submits that, for the purposes of Directive 75/442, the concept of recycling covers not only the use of waste in a production process, but also its processing in a recovery operation designed to obtain a secondary raw material. In order to determine whether such an operation has been completed and whether the material is consequently no longer waste, it is necessary to examine whether its holder is liable to 'discard' it within the meaning of art 1(a) of Directive 75/442. In this connection, it should be established whether the recovery operation has yielded material which has the same characteristics and properties as a raw material. h
i

45. The Netherlands government argues that 'recycling' within the meaning of art 3(7) of Directive 94/62 must, on the other hand, be interpreted differently. It follows from that article that the recycling of packaging waste cannot be completed before the waste—qua secondary raw material—has been a re-used in a 'production process'. In other words, recycling within the meaning of Directive 94/62 has not yet been completed at the moment when a secondary raw material is obtained, even if the material has, at that moment, ceased to be waste within the meaning of Directive 75/442. Only if the packaging waste is in fact used, as a secondary raw material, in a production process can there be a guarantee that the consumption of primary raw materials will be reduced. Consequently, the Grade 3B material produced by Mayer Parry has been recycled within the meaning of Directive 94/62 only once it has been used by a steelmaker for the production of ingots, sheets or coils of steel.

b
c 46. The Austrian government contends, first, that the definitions set out in Directive 94/62 cannot deviate from those in Directive 75/442. Second, in order to determine whether waste which has undergone a recovery operation is no longer waste, it is necessary to balance the interests of environmental protection and protection of human health against the promotion of recycling. Third, the recovery of waste need not necessarily be effected in one step. At every individual step it is necessary to examine whether recovery occurs. Mayer Parry accordingly does not carry out recycling, but simply recovery of waste in order to have it undergo recycling within the meaning of Directive 94/62.

d
e 47. The Commission of the European Communities contends that the definitions of recovery and of recycling, as a mode of recovery, in the context of Directive 75/442 must be interpreted in the same way as the definitions in Directive 94/62. Any divergent interpretation would mean that there is a danger of double-counting an operation for the purpose of achievement of the directives' goals. The Commission further submits that waste can be regarded as having been recycled only when the reprocessing has been completed and a new product created. The material produced by Mayer Parry cannot be regarded as having undergone recycling, that is to say as no longer being waste. The fact that the Grade 3B material produced by Mayer Parry has an economic value and is sold to steel producers does not detract from this conclusion.

f
g 48. In addition, the Commission stresses that the designation of waste is crucial to the proper operation of waste management control mechanisms. It points out that art 2(a) of Council Regulation (EEC) 259/93 (on the supervision and control of shipments of waste within, into and out of the European Community) (OJ 1993 L30 p 1) incorporates by reference the definition of the term 'waste' contained in art 1(a) of Directive 75/442. Within that framework, substances which are potentially environmentally hazardous may not circulate within the Community and cross its borders without any supervisory or monitoring controls. Thus, scrap metal which has not yet been completely recycled or recovered cannot circulate uncontrolled within the Community.

THE COURT'S ANSWER

Preliminary remarks

i 49. It is necessary, as a preliminary point, to define the link between Directive 75/442 and Directive 94/62, given that the observations submitted to the court differ on this point and the questions relate to both directives.

50. Directive 75/442, in its initial version, was the first directive containing measures designed to harmonise national legislation of the member states with regard to preventing the generation of waste and to its disposal.

51. That directive was substantially amended by Directive 91/156, although its amendment did not fundamentally alter the concept of waste which still covers substances or objects which the holder discards or intends or is required to discard. The new provisions introduced by Directive 91/156 include art 2(2), according to which specific rules for particular instances, or supplementary rules, on the management of particular categories of waste may be laid down by means of individual directives, thus making Directive 75/442 framework legislation. a

52. Directive 94/62 contains specific rules or rules supplementing Directive 75/442, within the meaning of art 2(2), for the management of a particular category of waste, namely packaging waste. b

53. Nevertheless, Directive 75/442 remains very important for the interpretation and application of Directive 94/62.

54. First, as stated in the seventh recital in its preamble, Directive 94/62 forms part of the Community strategy for waste management set out, inter alia, in Directive 75/442. c

55. Second, taking account of the objective, set down in the third recital in the preamble to Directive 91/156, of having common waste terminology, Directive 94/62 contains provisions which expressly refer to Directive 75/442, such as art 3(2) defining packaging waste. d

56. Third, since packaging waste is waste within the meaning of Directive 75/442, the latter remains applicable to such waste in so far as Directive 94/62 does not otherwise provide. That is so, for example, in the case of the requirements set out in arts 4 and 5 of Directive 75/442 as regards waste disposal.

57. Accordingly, Directive 94/62 must be considered to be special legislation (a lex specialis) vis-à-vis Directive 75/442, so that its provisions prevail over those of Directive 75/442 in situations which it specifically seeks to regulate. e

Consideration of the questions referred for a preliminary ruling

58. The main proceedings are concerned with the question whether Mayer Parry, in producing Grade 3B material, carries out a recycling operation enabling it to be accredited as a 'reprocessor' and, therefore, to issue PRNs. f

59. It is common ground between the parties to the main proceedings that the Grade 3B material is produced by Mayer Parry from metal packaging waste. Those proceedings thus relate, in the first place, to the concept of recycling with regard to packaging waste.

60. The second question, which relates to the recycling of packaging waste within the meaning of Directive 94/62, should therefore be answered first. g

Question 2

61. By its second question, the national court essentially seeks to ascertain whether 'recycling' within the meaning of art 3(7) of Directive 94/62 is to be interpreted as including the reprocessing of metal packaging waste when it has been transformed into a secondary raw material, such as Grade 3B material, or only when it has been used to produce ingots, sheets or coils of steel. h

62. In order to answer this question, it is necessary, first of all, to interpret the term 'recycling', as defined in art 3(7) of Directive 94/62, and secondly, to consider whether it is the production of Grade 3B material or the manufacture of ingots, sheets or coils of steel from metal packaging waste which must be classified as 'recycling'. i

63. It is apparent both from the preambles and from the provisions of Directives 75/442 and 94/62 that recycling is a form of recovery. It follows from art 3(1)(b) of Directive 75/442 and the fourth recital in its preamble that

- a the essential characteristic of a waste recovery operation is constituted by its principal objective that the waste serve a useful purpose in replacing other materials which would have had to be used for that purpose, thereby enabling natural resources to be conserved (see Abfall Service AG (ASA) v Bundesminister für Umwelt, Jugend und Familie Case C-6/00 [2002] QB 1073, [2002] ECR I-1961 (para 69)). Recycling as a form of recovery must accordingly pursue the same objective.

b 64. The definition of recycling in art 3(7) of Directive 94/62 sets out the elements which make up such an operation, namely the reprocessing of waste materials, in a production process, and for the original purpose or for other purposes excluding energy recovery.

- c 65. In accordance with that definition, the recycling process has at its base waste material which must be reprocessed. Although the definition does not specify that the waste must be packaging waste, it is clear from the context of Directive 94/62, which relates only to packaging and packaging waste, that only such waste is referred to. By virtue of art 3(2) of Directive 94/62 and art 1(a) of Directive 75/442, to which art 3(2) refers, packaging waste is defined as any packaging or packaging material, excluding production residues, which the holder discards or intends or is required to discard. Packaging waste thus derives from 'packaging' within the meaning of art 3(1) of Directive 94/62.

- d 66. According to the definition of recycling, the packaging waste must undergo 'reprocessing in a production process'. Such a process requires the packaging waste to be worked in order to produce new material or to make a new product. In this sense, recycling can be clearly distinguished from other recovery or waste processing operations referred to by the Community legislation, such as reclamation of raw materials and compounds of raw materials (points R3 to R5 of Annex IIB to Directive 75/442), pre-processing, mixing or other operations, which result only in a change in the nature or composition of the waste (see art 1(b) of Directive 75/442).

- e 67. Also, the waste may be regarded as recycled only if it has been reprocessed so as to obtain new material or a new product 'for the original purpose'. This means that the waste must be transformed into its original state in order to be useable, where appropriate, for a purpose identical to the original purpose of the material from which it was derived. In other words, metal packaging waste must be regarded as recycled where it has undergone reprocessing in the course of a process designed to produce new material or make a new product possessing characteristics comparable to those of the material of which the waste was composed, in order to be able to be used again for the production of metal packaging.

- f 68. The definition of recycling states in addition that the waste may be reprocessed in a production process for the original purpose 'or for other purposes'. It follows that the concept of recycling is not limited to the situation where the new material or new product, possessing characteristics comparable to those of the original material, is used for the same purpose of metal packaging. Use for other purposes also features in the concept.

- g 69. Those other purposes may be of any kind so long as the reprocessing of the packaging waste does not take the form of energy recovery, since that is expressly excluded by art 3(7) of Directive 94/62, and is not effected by means of disposal, a method which would run counter to the very concept of recycling as a form of waste recovery.

- i 70. The definition of recycling, as interpreted in paras 63–69 of this judgment, is consonant with the objectives of Directive 94/62.

71. As is apparent from the first recital in its preamble and art 1(1), Directive 94/62 is intended, first, to prevent and reduce the impact of packaging waste on the environment so as to provide a high level of environmental protection and, second, to ensure the proper functioning of the internal market.

72. Preserving the environment and achieving a high level of environmental protection constitute an objective reflecting the requirements of art 174(1) and (2) EC (formerly art 130r(1) and (2) of the EC Treaty). In order to attain that objective, the Community legislature has laid down minimum targets in art 6(1)(a) of Directive 94/62 in order to ensure that at least one-half by weight of packaging waste will be recovered. Recycling is to be regarded as constituting an important part of recovery in its various forms and, along with re-use, is a form to be given preference, as the eleventh and eighth recitals in the preamble to Directive 94/62 respectively state.

73. By interpreting the definition of recycling in art 3(7) of Directive 94/62 as meaning that the reprocessing of packaging waste must enable new material or a new product possessing characteristics comparable to those of the material from which the waste was derived to be obtained, a high level of environmental protection is ensured.

74. It is only at that stage that the ecological advantages which led the Community legislature to accord a degree of preference to this form of waste recovery are fully achieved, namely a reduction in the consumption of energy and of primary raw materials (see the 11th recital in the preamble to Directive 94/62).

75. Furthermore, it is also only at that stage that the materials at issue cease to be packaging waste and the various waste controls laid down by the Community legislature accordingly lose their rationale. Since the recycling involves the transformation of the packaging waste into new material or a new product possessing characteristics comparable to those of the material from which the waste was derived, the result of that transformation can no longer be classified as 'packaging waste'.

76. Finally, the interpretation of the concept of recycling which results from paras 63–69 of this judgment removes any ambiguity as to the point at which packaging waste must be regarded as recycled and thereby makes it possible to discount the risk of a number of processing operations in respect of the same waste each being taken into account as a recycling operation for the purpose of application of the percentages laid down in art 6(1) of Directive 94/62.

77. Such an interpretation is also consonant with the requirements of clarity and uniformity which flow from the purpose of Directive 94/62 regarding the proper functioning of the internal market, consisting, more specifically, in the avoidance of obstacles to trade and distortion of competition.

78. First, obstacles to trade could arise if different concepts of recycling were applied in the member states, so that the same material or product could be regarded as recycled in one member state—and would accordingly have ceased to be classified as packaging waste and been freed from all waste-specific controls—while that would not be the case in another member state.

79. Second, given that all businesses involved in the production, use, import and distribution of packaging and packaged products must take on the responsibility incumbent upon them under the 'polluter pays' principle (see the 29th recital in the preamble to Directive 94/62), the concept of recycling must be applied uniformly in order that those businesses are in an equal position in the internal market with regard to competition.

a 80. The concept of waste having thus been clarified, it is necessary, secondly, to consider whether Grade 3B material, such as that produced by Mayer Parry in the main proceedings, may be regarded as falling within that concept.

81. It is common ground between the parties to the main proceedings that the materials or objects forming the starting point for Mayer Parry's production of Grade 3B material are packaging waste.

b 82. Mayer Parry collects, inspects, tests for radiation, sorts, cleans, cuts, separates and shreds (fragmentises) metal packaging waste by means of a process as described by the national court in paras 34 and 35 of the order for reference. The national court has established that Mayer Parry, in producing Grade 3B material, reprocesses packaging waste in order to create a secondary raw material suitable for use in substitution for a primary raw material, such as iron ore. It therefore cannot be ruled out from the outset that Mayer Parry reprocesses ferrous metal packaging waste in a production process within the meaning of art 3(7) of Directive 94/62, namely in a process designed to produce new material or to manufacture a new product.

c 83. However, the production of Grade 3B material does not constitute reprocessing of metal packaging waste with the objective of returning that material to its original state, namely steel, and of re-using it in accordance with its original purpose, namely the manufacture of metal packaging, or for other purposes. In other words, the metal packaging waste reprocessed by Mayer Parry does not undergo reprocessing in a production process conferring on the Grade 3B material characteristics comparable to those of the material of which the metal packaging was composed.

d 84. Grade 3B material is a mixture which, apart from ferrous elements, contains impurities (ranging from 3–7% according to the various parties), such as paint and oil, non-metallic materials and undesirable chemical elements, which remain to be removed when the material is used to produce steel. Grade 3B material cannot therefore be used directly for the manufacture of new metal packaging.

e 85. It follows that Grade 3B material such as that produced by Mayer Parry cannot be regarded as recycled packaging waste.

f 86. It accordingly remains to consider whether the use of Grade 3B material in the production of ingots, sheets or coils of steel, in circumstances such as those of the main proceedings, may be regarded as a packaging waste recycling operation.

g 87. That is in fact the case, since the production process in question results in the manufacture of new products, namely ingots, sheets or coils of steel, which possess characteristics comparable to those of the material of which the metal packaging waste incorporated in the Grade 3B material was initially composed and which may be used for a purpose identical to the original purpose of the material from which that waste was derived, namely the metal packaging, or for other purposes.

h 88. It follows from all the foregoing considerations that the answer to the second question must be that 'recycling' within the meaning of art 3(7) of Directive 94/62 is to be interpreted as not including the reprocessing of metal packaging waste when it is transformed into a secondary raw material such as Grade 3B material, but as covering the reprocessing of such waste when it is used to produce ingots, sheets or coils of steel.

i

Question 1

89. By its first question, the national court essentially seeks to ascertain whether the answer to the second question would be different if the concepts of 'recycling' and 'waste' referred to by Directive 75/442 were taken into account.

90. 'Packaging waste' is defined in art 3(2) of Directive 94/62 as any packaging or packaging material covered by the definition of the term 'waste' in Directive 75/442. 'Packaging waste' within the meaning of Directive 94/62 must therefore be regarded as 'waste' within the meaning of Directive 75/442.

91. First, it is apparent from paras 86 and 87 of this judgment that a manufacturer of ingots, sheets or coils of steel from Grade 3B material that derives from metal packaging waste carries out 'recycling' within the meaning of Directive 94/62. Second, it also follows from para 75 of this judgment that, once packaging waste has been recycled within the meaning of Directive 94/62, it is no longer to be regarded as packaging waste for the purposes of that directive or, therefore, of Directive 75/442. Accordingly, ingots, sheets or coils of steel manufactured from Grade 3B material which derives from metal packaging waste that has been recycled is no longer 'packaging waste' for the purposes of Directives 94/62 and 75/442.

92. Furthermore, recycling is not defined in Directive 75/442. Should that term, as envisaged by Directive 75/442, not have the same meaning as the term appearing in Directive 94/62, only the latter term would be applicable to packaging waste. As is clear from paras 53 and 57 of this judgment, even though Directive 75/442 is the framework legislation and is relevant when interpreting and applying Directive 94/62, that does not prevent the provisions of the latter, as special legislation, from prevailing over those of Directive 75/442.

93. The answer to the first question must therefore be that the answer to the second question would be no different if the concepts of 'recycling' and 'waste' referred to by Directive 75/442 were taken into account.

COSTS

94. The costs incurred by the United Kingdom, Danish, Netherlands and Austrian governments and the Commission, which have submitted observations to the court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Fifth Chamber), in answer to the questions referred to it by the High Court of Justice of England and Wales, Queen's Bench Division (Administrative Court), by order of 9 November 2000, hereby rules:

(1) 'Recycling' within the meaning of art 3(7) of European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 94/62 (on packaging and packaging waste) is to be interpreted as not including the reprocessing of metal packaging waste when it is transformed into a secondary raw material such as material meeting the specifications of Grade 3B, but as covering the reprocessing of such waste when it is used to produce ingots, sheets or coils of steel.

(2) That interpretation would be no different if the concepts of 'recycling' and 'waste' referred to by Council Directive (EEC) 75/442 (on waste) were taken into account.

R (on the application of Bidar) v Ealing London Borough Council and another
(Case C-209/03)

COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (GRAND CHAMBER)

JUDGES SKOURIS (PRESIDENT), JANN, TIMMERMANS, ROSAS, LENAERTS (RAPPORTEUR) AND BORG BARTHET (PRESIDENTS OF CHAMBERS), PUISOCHET, SCHINTGEN, COLNERIC, ILEŠIČ, MALENOVSKÝ, KLUČKA AND LÖHMUS
ADVOCATE GENERAL GEELHOED

28 SEPTEMBER, 11 NOVEMBER 2004, 15 MARCH 2005

European Community – Discrimination – Discrimination on grounds of nationality – Provision of assistance with maintenance costs for students – Whether assistance outside prohibition on discrimination on grounds of nationality – Article 12 EC (formerly EC Treaty, art 6).

B, a French national, had come to the United Kingdom where he had lived with his grandmother as her dependant. He had completed his secondary education in the United Kingdom without recourse to social assistance. He then started a tertiary education course. Under the Education (Student Support) Regulations 2001<sup>a</sup> a person was eligible for a student loan if he was ordinarily resident in England and Wales on the first day of the first academic year of the course and had been ordinarily resident throughout the preceding three-year period and his residence during that period had not been wholly or mainly for the purpose of receiving full-time education. Consequently, B's application for financial assistance in respect of his maintenance costs, in the form of a student loan, was refused on the grounds that he was not settled in the United Kingdom. B brought proceedings against that refusal, contending, inter alia, that by making the grant of a student loan conditional on settlement in the United Kingdom, the 2001 regulations had introduced discrimination prohibited by art 12 EC<sup>b</sup> (formerly art 6 of the EC Treaty). Article 3<sup>c</sup> of Council Directive (EEC) 93/96 (on the right of residence for students) provided that that directive did not establish any entitlement to the payment of maintenance grants by the host member state on the part of students benefiting from the right of residence. In those circumstances, the High Court of England and Wales decided to stay the proceedings and refer three questions to the Court of Justice of the European Communities. The first question related to whether, given developments in the law of the European Union and previous decisions of the Court of Justice, assistance with maintenance costs for students attending university courses, given by way of either (a) subsidised loans, or (b) grants, continued to fall outside the scope of the EC Treaty for the purposes of art 12 EC and the prohibition on discrimination on grounds of nationality? Secondly, if assistance with maintenance costs for students in the form of grants or loans now fell within the scope of art 12 EC, what was the criteria to be applied in determining whether the conditions governing eligibility for such assistance were based on objectively justifiable considerations not dependent on nationality? Finally, whether art 12 EC could be relied upon to claim entitlement to assistance with maintenance costs from a date prior to the date of the judgment of the Court of Justice in the present case and, if not, whether an exception should be made for those who initiated legal proceedings before that date? a

<sup>a</sup> The regulations, so far as material, are set out at judgment paras 13–16, below

<sup>b</sup> Article 12 EC, so far as material, is set out at judgment para 3, below

<sup>c</sup> Article 3 of the directive is set out at judgment para 10, below

b

Held — (1) Assistance, whether in the form of subsidised loans or of grants, provided to students lawfully resident in the host member state to cover their maintenance costs fell within the scope of application of the EC Treaty for the purpose of the prohibition of discrimination as laid down in the first paragraph of art 12 EC. A national of a member state who lived in another member state where he pursued and completed his secondary education, without it being objected to that he did not have sufficient resources or sickness insurance, enjoyed a right of residence in that state. Article 3 of Directive 93/96 did not preclude a national of a member state who was lawfully resident in the territory of another member state where he intended to start or pursue higher education from relying during that residence on the fundamental principle of equal treatment enshrined in the first paragraph of art 12 EC (see judgment paras 36, 42, 46, 48, below); Lair v Universität Hannover Case 39/86 [1988] ECR 3161 and Brown v Secretary of State for Scotland Case 197/86 1989 SLT 402 distinguished. c
d
e

(2) The first paragraph of art 12 EC had to be interpreted as precluding national legislation which granted students the right to assistance covering their maintenance costs only if they were settled in the host member state, while precluding a national of another member state from obtaining the status of settled person as a student even if that national was lawfully resident and had received a substantial part of his secondary education in the host member state and had consequently established a genuine link with the society of that state. It was permissible for a member state to ensure that the grant of assistance to cover the maintenance costs of students from other member states did not become an unreasonable burden which could have consequences for the overall level of assistance which might be granted by that state. Although it was legitimate for a member state to grant assistance only to students who had demonstrated a certain degree of integration into the society of that state, a member state could not require students to establish a link with its employment market, as a student's situation was not comparable to that of an applicant for, inter alia, a jobseeker's allowance. The existence of a certain degree of integration might be regarded as established by a finding that the student in question had resided in the host member state for a certain length of time. It was common ground that the rules at issue in the main proceedings precluded any possibility of a national of another member state obtaining settled status as a student. They therefore made it impossible for such a national, whatever his actual degree of integration into the society of the host member state, to satisfy that condition and hence to enjoy the right to assistance to cover his maintenance costs. Such treatment could not be regarded as justified by the legitimate objective which those rules sought to secure as it prevented a student, in the position of B, from being able to pursue his studies under the same conditions as a student who was a national of that state and was in the same situation (see judgment paras 56–59, 61–63, below). f
g
h
i

- a (3) There was no need to limit the temporal effects of the present judgment. In the instant case, the information provided by various member state governments was not capable of supporting their argument that if its effects were not limited in time, the judgment might entail significant financial consequences for the member states (see judgment paras 70, 71, below).
- b Notes
For admission to the United Kingdom under European law, see 4(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn 2002 reissue) para 225.
- Cases cited
- c Administration des Douanes et Droits Indirects v Legros Case C-163/90 [1992] ECR I-4625, ECJ.
Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato v Denkavit Italiana Srl Case 61/79 [1980] ECR 1205, ECJ.
Baumbast v Secretary of State for the Home Dept Case C-413/99 [2003] ICR 1347, [2002] ECR I-7091, ECJ.
- d Bernini v Minister van Onderwijs en Wetenschappen Case C-3/90 [1992] ECR I-1071, ECJ.
Bickel (Criminal proceedings against) Case C-274/96 [1998] ECR I-7637, ECJ.
Blaizot v University of Liège Case 24/86 [1988] ECR 379, ECJ.
Brown v Secretary of State for Scotland Case 197/86 1989 SLT 402, [1988] ECR 3205, ECJ.
- e Collins v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions Case C-138/02 [2004] All ER (EC) 1005, ECJ.
D'Hoop v Office National de l'Emploi Case C-224/98 [2003] All ER (EC) 527, [2002] ECR I-6191, ECJ.
- f Echternach v Netherlands Minister for Education and Science Joined cases 389/87 and 390/87 [1989] ECR 723, ECJ.
European Commission v Italy Case C-212/99 [2001] ECR I-4923, ECJ.
Garcia Avello v Belgium Case C-148/02 [2004] All ER (EC) 740, [2003] ECR I-11613, ECJ.
Gravier v City of Liège Case 293/83 [1985] ECR 593, ECJ.
- g Grzelczyk v Centre Public d'Aide Sociale d'Ottignies-Louvain-la-Neuve Case C-184/99 [2003] All ER (EC) 385, [2001] ECR I-6193, ECJ.
Kaba v Secretary of State for the Home Dept Case C-356/98 [2000] All ER (EC) 537, [2000] ECR I-2623, ECJ.
Lair v Universität Hannover Case 39/86 [1988] ECR 3161, ECJ.
- h Leo (di) v Land Berlin Case C-308/89 [1990] ECR I-4185, ECJ.
Martínez Sala v Freistaat Bayern Case C-85/96 [1998] ECR I-2691, ECJ.
Meeusen v Hoofddirectie van de Informatie Beheer Groep Case C-337/97 [1999] ECR I-3289, ECJ.
Meints v Minister van Landbouw, Natuurbeheer en Visserij Case C-57/96 [1997] ECR I-6689, ECJ.
- j Ninni-Orasche v Bundesminister für Wissenschaft, Verkehr und Kunst Case C-413/01 [2004] All ER (EC) 765, ECJ.
Raulin v Minister van Onderwijs en Wetenschappen Case C-357/89 [1992] ECR I-1027, ECJ.
Sotgiu v Deutsche Bundespost Case 152/73 [1974] ECR 153, ECJ.
Sürül v Bundesanstalt für Arbeit Case C-262/96 [1999] ECR I-2685, ECJ.

Trojani v Centre Public d'Aide Sociale de Bruxelles (CPAS) Case C-456/02 [2004] All ER (EC) 1065, ECJ. a

Reference

This reference for a preliminary ruling concerned the interpretation of the first paragraph of arts 12 and 18 EC (formerly arts 6 and 8a of the EC Treaty). The reference was made in the course of proceedings between Dany Bidar and the London Borough of Ealing and the Secretary of State for Education and Skills concerning the refusal of his application for a subsidised student loan to cover his maintenance costs. Observations were submitted on behalf of: Mr Bidar, by R Scannell and M Soorjoo, Barristers, and J Luqmani, Solicitor; the United Kingdom government, by R Caudwell, acting as agent, E Sharpston QC and C Lewis, Barrister; the Danish government, by J Molde, acting as agent; the German government, by C-D Quassowski and A Tiemann, acting as agents; the French government, by G de Bergues and C Bergeot-Nunes, acting as agents; the Netherlands government, by C M Wissels and H G Sevenster, acting as agents; the Austrian government, by E Riedl, acting as agent; the Finnish government, by T Pynnä, acting as agent; the Commission of the European Communities, by N Yerrell and M Condou, acting as agents. The language of the case was English. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General. b
c
d

11 November 2004. The Advocate General (LA Geelhoed) delivered the following opinion<sup>1</sup>. e

I—INTRODUCTION

1. In its judgments of 21 June 1988 in Lair v Universität Hannover and Brown v Secretary of State for Scotland, the Court of Justice of the European Communities ruled that at the stage of development of Community law at the material time, financial assistance granted to students for maintenance costs and training, as opposed to assistance to cover costs related to access to education, fell in principle outside the scope of the EEC Treaty<sup>2</sup>. In view of the evolution of Community law since that time, the High Court of Justice of England and Wales, Queen's Bench Division (Administrative Court), in this preliminary reference essentially asks the Court of Justice whether such assistance with maintenance costs for students, in either the form of grants or loans, continues to fall outside the scope of the EC Treaty for the purposes of the application of art 12 EC (formerly art 6 of the EC Treaty) and if not, under which conditions the member states may restrict eligibility for such assistance. f
g

II—RELEVANT PROVISIONS h

A—Community law

2. The relevant provisions of Community law in this case are art 12 EC and art 18(1) EC (formerly art 8a(1) of the EC Treaty) (and art 3 of Council Directive (EEC) 93/96 (on the right of residence for students)<sup>3</sup> (hereinafter Directive 93/96); i

<sup>1</sup> Original language: English.

<sup>2</sup> Case 39/86 [1988] ECR 3161 (para 15 of the judgment) and Case 197/86 1989 SLT 402, [1988] ECR 3205 (para 18 of the judgment).

<sup>3</sup> OJ 1993 L317 p 59.

a

Article 12

Within the scope of application of this Treaty, and without prejudice to any special provisions contained therein, any discrimination on grounds of nationality shall be prohibited ...

b

Article 18

1. Every citizen of the Union shall have the right to move and reside freely within the territory of the Member States, subject to the limitations and conditions laid down in this Treaty and by the measures adopted to give it effect.'

Preamble to Directive 93/96, seventh recital:

c

'Whereas, in the present state of Community law, as established by the case law of the Court of Justice, assistance granted to students, does not fall within the scope of the [EEC] Treaty within the meaning of Article 7 thereof [now art 12 EC].'

Article 3 of Directive 93/96:

d

'This Directive shall not establish any entitlement to the payment of maintenance grants by the host Member State on the part of students benefiting from the right of residence.'

B—National law

e

3. The national provisions concerned are laid down in the Education (Student Support) Regulations 2001, SI 2001/951 (hereinafter the Student Support Regulations). Under the Student Support Regulations, assistance with maintenance costs for students is provided by way of loans for living costs. The amount of the loan depends upon a number of factors such as whether the student lives at home with his or her parents and whether the student lives in London or elsewhere. A student is eligible automatically for 75% of the maximum amount of the loan available and the eligibility to receive the 25% depends upon the financial position of the student and the student's parents or partner. The loan is provided at an interest rate which is linked to the rate of inflation and the rate of interest is, therefore, below the rate which would normally be payable on a commercial loan. The loan is repayable after the student completes his or her course and providing that the student is earning in excess of £10, 000. If that is the case, the student pays 9% per annum of the income earned above £10, 000 until the loan is paid.

f

g

4. Nationals of a member state are only eligible to receive a loan under the Student Support Regulations if:

h

(1) they are settled in the United Kingdom within the meaning of the domestic law (the Immigration Act 1971), that is —that they are ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom and are not subject to restrictions as to the period for which they may remain in the United Kingdom;

—and they are resident in England or Wales on the first day of the first academic year of the course

i

—and they have been resident in the United Kingdom for the three years prior to the first day of the course;

or

(2) the student is an EEA migrant worker entitled to support by virtue of art 7(2) or (3) of Council Regulation (EEC) 1612/68 as extended by the EEA Agreement signed at Oporto on 2 May 1992.

A person is only regarded as being settled if he has resided in the United Kingdom for four years. Time spent for the purpose of receiving full-time education is not taken into consideration in calculating the period of residence. a

III—FACTS, PROCEDURE AND PRELIMINARY QUESTIONS

5. Mr Dany Bidar is a French national, born in Paris in August 1983. It appears from the documents in the case file that in August 1998 he moved to the United Kingdom with his sister and mother, who was seriously ill at the time, to stay with Bidar's grandmother. Following the decease of his mother in December 1999, Bidar's grandmother became his legal guardian. Bidar attended a High School in London where he completed his secondary education in June 2001 and acquired the necessary qualifications to gain access to university in the United Kingdom. During that period he was supported financially by his grandmother and he never applied for social assistance. As he intended to begin a course of university studies in the academic year beginning in September 2001, Bidar applied to the London Borough of Ealing for funding for these studies. He was granted assistance with his tuition fees, but was refused a loan for maintenance costs as he was not 'settled' in the United Kingdom, not yet having fulfilled a period of residence of four years as required by the domestic provisions. In fact, as a student he would not be able to acquire that status given that the period spent attending full-time education is not recognised for that purpose. Bidar began his studies in economics in September 2001 at University College London. b
c
d

6. Bidar challenged the decision refusing him a student loan for maintenance costs claiming that the settlement requirement in the regulations constitutes a discrimination within the meaning of art 12 EC in conjunction with art 18 EC. The defendant in the main proceedings contends that assistance with maintenance costs falls outside the scope of art 12 EC, as was confirmed by the court in Lair's case and Brown's case. However, in view of the fact that Community law has developed since these judgments, most notably through the insertion of the provisions on citizenship and on education in the EC Treaty by the Treaty of Maastricht, which entered into force on 1 November 1993, the High Court decided to stay the proceedings ([2001] EWHC Admin 1177) and refer the following preliminary questions to the court under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty): e
f

(1) Whether, given the decisions of the Court of Justice of the European Communities in ... Lair ... and ... Brown ... and developments in the law of the European Union, including the adoption of Article 18 EC and developments in relation to the competence of the European Union in the field of education, assistance with maintenance costs for students attending university courses, such assistance being given by way of either (a) subsidised loans or (b) grants, continues to fall outside the scope of the application of the EC Treaty for the purposes of Article 12 EC and the prohibition on discrimination on grounds of nationality? g
h

(2) If either part of question (1) is answered in the negative, and if assistance with maintenance costs for students in the form of grants or loans [does] now fall within the scope of Article 12 EC, what criteria should the national court apply in determining whether the conditions governing eligibility for such assistance are based on objectively justifiable considerations not dependent on nationality? i

(3) If either part of question (1) is answered in the negative, whether Article 12 EC may be relied upon to claim entitlement to assistance with a maintenance costs from a date prior to the date of the judgment of the Court of Justice in the present case and, if [not], whether an exception should be made for those who initiated legal proceedings before that date?

b 7. Written submissions under art 20 of the Statute of the Court of Justice were presented by the applicant in the main proceedings, the Austrian, Danish, Finnish, French, German, Netherlands and United Kingdom governments and by the Commission of the European Communities. Further observations were made by Bidar, by the United Kingdom and Netherlands governments and by the Commission at the oral hearing on 28 September 2004.

c 8. On 16 June 2004, the court addressed a series of written questions to the United Kingdom government aimed at elucidating the requirement that, in order to be eligible for a student loan, a person must be 'ordinarily resident' within the United Kingdom or the European Economic Area depending on his status as a non-worker or a worker respectively. The answers to these questions were received by the court on 21 July 2004.

d IV—GENERAL CONTEXT: THE LAW AS IT STANDS

A—Community law and assistance with study costs

e 9. In order to place the questions raised by the High Court in a broader perspective, it is useful to view them against the background of how eligibility of students for financial support with study costs by the host member state hitherto has been governed by Community law. In this respect two points of reference should be distinguished. The first of these is the object of the financial support, which concerns the scope ratione materiae of the EC Treaty. The second is the capacity in which persons may be eligible for financial support, the scope ratione personae of the EC Treaty.

f 10. The questions referred by the High Court focus mainly on whether grants or (subsidised) loans provided by the national authorities for covering students' maintenance costs, as distinct from assistance with tuition fees, now fall within the scope ratione materiae of the EC Treaty for the purposes of applying the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of nationality contained in art 12 EC. Since the court's judgment in Gravier v City of Liège<sup>4</sup>, it is well settled that, as access to education leading to professional qualifications is within the scope of the EC Treaty, nationals of the member states are entitled to equal treatment in respect of all conditions governing such access. The implication of this is that not only may no distinction be made between national students and students from other member states in respect of the level of enrolment fees and other access-related costs, any assistance provided to cover these costs must also be made available under equal conditions to students from all member states<sup>5</sup>. In accordance with this principle Bidar was indeed granted assistance with the tuition fees for his course of studies at University College London.

g 11. In the case law dealing explicitly with this issue, assistance with maintenance costs, by contrast, was considered as falling outside the scope ratione materiae of the E(EC) Treaty for persons who did not qualify as workers within the meaning of art 39 EC (formerly art 48 of the EC Treaty).
i On the one hand, this subject was considered to be 'a matter of educational

4 Case 293/83 [1985] ECR 593.

5 See e.g. Raulin v Minister van Onderwijs en Wetenschappen Case C-357/89 [1992] ECR I-1027 (para 28 of the judgment).

policy, which is not as such included in the spheres entrusted to the Community institutions' and, on the other, it was regarded as 'a matter of social policy, which falls within the competence of the Member States in so far as it is not covered by specific provisions of the EEC Treaty'<sup>6</sup>. a

12. As the status enjoyed by a person under Community law, therefore, determines his entitlement to benefits and other social advantages in the host member state, it is necessary to distinguish between the various capacities in which nationals of member states intending to pursue a course of studies in another member state than their state of origin, may be resident in that member state. In this respect a broad distinction must be made between economically active persons (workers and self-employed persons) and their children, on the one hand, and economically inactive persons, on the other hand. b

13. Where a student enjoys the status of a worker within the meaning of art 39 EC, he is entitled under art 7(2) of Council Regulation (EEC) 1612/68<sup>7</sup> to social benefits provided by the host member state on an equal footing with nationals of that member state. The court has confirmed on various occasions that grants awarded for maintenance and training with the view to the pursuit of university studies leading to a professional qualification constitutes a social advantage within the meaning of art 7(2) of that regulation<sup>8</sup>. c

14. The cases in this field generally involved marking out what might be called the outer limits of the concept of a Community worker given the often rather marginal character of the work performed<sup>9</sup>. The court also considered the situation of a person who had terminated an employment relationship in order to take up a course of studies. Here the court ruled that a worker retains this status on taking up full-time education where there is continuity between the previous occupational activity and the course of study, unless the migrant worker has become involuntarily unemployed<sup>10</sup>. d

15. Under art 12 of Regulation 1612/68, the children of migrant workers similarly are entitled to equal treatment in respect of the social advantages accorded to nationals aimed at facilitating following education<sup>11</sup>. This applies even where the parent worker has returned to his country of origin and the child cannot continue his studies there because of a lack of co-ordination of school diplomas<sup>12</sup> and where the child intends to follow a course of studies in his home state if nationals of the host member state are eligible for financial support for studies outside that state<sup>13</sup>. e

6 See e.g. Lair's case, cited in footnote 2, above (para 15 of the judgment). f

7 On freedom of movement for workers within the Community (OJ English Sp Edn 1968 (II) p 475).

8 See Lair's case, cited in footnote 2, above (paras 23, 24, 28 of the judgment), Brown's case, cited in footnote 2, above (para 25 of the judgment) and Bernini v Minister van Onderwijs en Wetenschappen Case C-3/90 [1992] ECR I-1071 (para 23 of the judgment). g

9 See e.g. Brown's case, cited in footnote 2, above, Raulin's case, cited in footnote 5, above and Bernini's case, cited above.

10 See Lair's case, cited in footnote 2, above (para 37 of the judgment). h

11 See e.g. Echternach v Netherlands Minister for Education and Science Joined cases 389/87 and 390/87 [1989] ECR 723 and Meeusen v Hoofdinspectie van de Informatie Beheer Groep Case C-337/97 [1999] ECR I-3289. i a 16. As is apparent from the court's judgment in Meeusen's case<sup>14</sup>, these considerations apply mutatis mutandis to self-employed persons and their children.

12 See Echternach's case (para 21 of the judgment).

13 See di Leo v Land Berlin Case C-308/89 [1990] ECR I-4185 (para 15 of the judgment).

b 17. Within the category of economically inactive students, a subdivision must be made between persons who move to another member state for the sole or primary purpose of following education in that member state and persons who move to a member state for other reasons and subsequently decide to take up their studies in the host member state.

c 18. The position of students of the first group who move to another member state in order to pursue a full course of studies has been regulated in Directive 93/96. This directive ensures that these students have a right of residence for the duration of their studies in accordance with the court's case law<sup>15</sup>. It also provides that member states may require of students who are nationals of a different member state and who wish to exercise the right of residence on their territory, first, that they satisfy the relevant national authority that they have sufficient resources to avoid becoming a burden on the social assistance system of the host member state during their period of residence, next, that they be enrolled in a recognised educational establishment for the principal purpose of following a vocational training course there and, lastly, that they be covered by sickness insurance in respect of all risks in the host member state<sup>16</sup>. Furthermore, in what may be regarded as a codification of the court's judgments in Lair's case and Brown's case, art 3 of Directive 93/96 lays down explicitly that the directive shall not establish any entitlement to the payment of maintenance grants on the part of students benefiting from the right of residence.

f 19. The second group of economically inactive persons consists of persons who have arrived in a member state, not as a worker or as a student intending to take up vocational training, but as an EU citizen making use of the right to move and reside guaranteed by art 18 EC and regulated in more detail in Council Directive (EEC) 90/364<sup>17</sup>. Unlike persons coming within the ambit of Directive 93/96, EU citizens making use of their right to move to another member state and to stay there retain their right of residence as long as they fulfil the conditions laid down in Directive 90/364. Their motives are immaterial in this respect.

g 20. Where persons in this second category decide to pursue their studies in the host member state, it is clear that, under the Gravier and Raulin case law, they are entitled to assistance with the costs of access to education. This is not disputed in the present case and, as was mentioned earlier, Bidar did receive financial support for this purpose. However, in the absence of a provision equivalent to art 3 of Directive 93/96 in Directive 90/364, the situation as to the entitlement of students, who are already resident in the host member state as EU citizens, to assistance with maintenance costs remains uncharted territory. In order to obtain some guidance for filling this gap in Directive 90/364 in respect of the legal position of EU citizens in this situation, it is i 14 Cited in footnote 11, above (paras 27–29 of the judgment).

15 See Raulin's case cited in footnote 5, above (paras 33, 34 of the judgment).

16 See art 1 of the directive, as reproduced by the court in Grzelczyk v Centre Public d'Aide Sociale d'Ottignies-Louvain-la-Neuve Case C-184/99 [2003] All ER (EC) 385, [2001] ECR I-6193 (para 38 of the judgment).

17 On the right of residence (OJ 1990 L180 p 26) (hereinafter Directive 90/364).

necessary to have regard to the court's case law on EU citizenship under art 17 EC (formerly art 8 of the EC Treaty) and art 18 EC and social benefits. a

B—Citizenship and social benefits: case law

21. In various cases the court has had occasion to consider whether EU citizens could derive entitlement to social benefits of various kinds from art 18(1) EC. I refer in particular to Martínez Sala, Grzelczyk, D'Hoop, Collins and Trojani.<sup>18</sup> b

22. In its judgments in cases concerning art 18(1) EC, the court has repeatedly emphasised that Union citizenship is destined to be the fundamental status of nationals of the member states, enabling those who find themselves in the same situation to enjoy the same treatment in law irrespective of their nationality, subject to such exceptions as are expressly provided for.<sup>19</sup> Citizens lawfully resident in the territory of a member state can rely on art 12 EC in all situations which fall within the scope ratione materiae of Community law.<sup>20</sup> Those situations include those involving the exercise of the fundamental freedoms guaranteed by the EC Treaty and those involving the exercise of the right to move and reside freely in another member state as conferred by art 18(1) EC. This right to reside is, moreover, conferred directly on every citizen of the Union by a clear and precise provision of the EC Treaty, as the court held in Baumbast v Secretary of State for the Home Dept.<sup>21</sup> It can therefore be invoked by individuals in proceedings before the national courts. c

23. In its first judgment in this field, Martínez Sala's case, the court ruled— d

'that a citizen of the European Union ... lawfully resident in the territory of the host Member State, can rely on Article [12 EC] in all situations which fall within the scope ratione materiae of Community law, including the situation where that Member State delays or refuses to grant to that claimant a benefit that is provided to all persons lawfully resident in the territory of that State on the ground that the claimant is not in possession of a document which nationals of that same State are not required to have and the issue of which may be delayed or refused by the authorities of that State.'<sup>22</sup> e

As the child-raising allowance at issue in that case was covered by both Council Regulation (EEC) 1408/71<sup>23</sup> and Regulation 1612/68 and was therefore within the scope ratione materiae of the EC Treaty, Mrs Martínez Sala was entitled to that benefit on the same conditions as German nationals. f

24. Grzelczyk's case concerned a French student studying in Belgium who, after having managed to provide for himself in the first three years of his studies, in his fourth and final year applied for a minimum subsistence allowance (minimex), as the combination of work and studies would be too g

18 Martínez Sala v Freistaat Bayern Case C-85/96 [1998] ECR I-2691, Grzelczyk's case, cited in footnote 16, above, D'Hoop v Office National de l'Emploi Case C-224/98 [2003] All ER (EC) 527, [2002] ECR I-6191, Collins v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions Case C-138/02 [2004] All ER (EC) 1005 and Trojani v Centre Public d'Aide Sociale de Bruxelles (CPAS) Case C-456/02 [2004] All ER (EC) 1065.

19 See e.g. Grzelczyk's case, cited in footnote 16, above (para 31 of the judgment). i

20 See e.g. Martínez Sala's case cited in footnote 18, above (para 63 of the judgment).

21 Case C-413/99 [2003] ICR 1347, [2002] ECR I-7091 (para 84 of the judgment).

22 See para 63 of the judgment.

23 On the application of social security schemes to employed persons, to self-employed persons and to members of their families moving within the Community, as amended and updated by Council Regulation (EC) 118/97 (OJ 1997 L28 p 1).

a demanding at that stage of his course. This benefit was first granted and then withdrawn as he was not a worker, but a student, and he did not have Belgian nationality. Although recognising the conditions imposed by art 1 of Directive 93/96 on a student's right to reside in another member state and that under art 3 of that directive students are not entitled to maintenance grants by the host member state, the court observed that there are no provisions in b the directive that preclude those to whom it applies from receiving social security benefits<sup>24</sup>. Where this implied Grzelczyk becoming a burden on the social assistance system, thus no longer fulfilling one of the conditions of residence, the court pointed out that Directive 93/96 only requires students to make a declaration that they have sufficient resources at the beginning of their stay in the host member state and that their financial position may change for c reasons beyond their control. The fact that the directive aims at preventing students from becoming an 'unreasonable' burden on the public finances of the host member state means that the directive 'accepts a certain degree of financial solidarity between nationals of a host member state and nationals of other member states, particularly if the difficulties which a beneficiary of the right of residence encounters are temporary'<sup>25</sup>. As it had been established in d earlier case law that the minimex was within the scope ratione materiae of the EC Treaty and the conditions governing eligibility were contrary to art 12 EC, Grzelczyk was entitled to this benefit.

25. In D'Hoop's case, a Belgian student was refused a tideover allowance (an unemployment benefit granted to young people who have just completed their
e studies and are seeking their first employment) by the Belgian authorities on the sole ground that she had completed her secondary education in France. Here, the court considered that making eligibility for this allowance conditional on the school diploma having been obtained in Belgium places certain of its nationals at a disadvantage simply because they have exercised their freedom to move in order to pursue education in another member state.
f 'Such inequality of treatment is contrary to the principles which underpin the status of citizen of the Union, that is, the guarantee of the same treatment in law in the exercise of the citizen's freedom to move.'<sup>26</sup> The court did accept, however, that in view of the aim of the tideover allowance to facilitate for young people the transition from education to the employment market, it is legitimate for the national legislature to wish to ensure that there is a real link
g between the applicant for that allowance and the geographic employment market concerned. A single condition concerning the place where the diploma of completion of secondary education was obtained was, however, too general and exclusive in nature<sup>27</sup>.

26. Collins' case arose from an Irish national, who had gone to the United h Kingdom in order to find work there, being refused a jobseeker's allowance on the ground that he was not habitually resident in the United Kingdom. Although arts 2 and 5 of Regulation 1612/68 do not refer to financial benefits assisting persons seeking access to the employment market, the court

i

24 See Grzelczyk's case, cited in footnote 16, above (para 39 of the judgment).

25 See footnote above (para 44 of the judgment).

26 See D'Hoop's case, cited in footnote 18, above (para 35 of the judgment).

27 See footnote above (paras 38 and 39 of the judgment).

considered that these provisions<sup>28</sup> 'should be interpreted in the light of other provisions of Community law, in particular art [12 EC] of the Treaty'.<sup>29</sup> It went on to state that—

'[i]n view of the establishment of citizenship of the Union and the interpretation in the case law of the right to equal treatment enjoyed by citizens of the Union, it is no longer possible to exclude from the scope of art [39(2) EC] of the Treaty—which expresses the fundamental principle of equal treatment, guaranteed by art [12 EC] of the Treaty—a benefit of a financial nature intended to facilitate access to employment in the labour market of a member state.'<sup>30</sup>

As in D'Hoop's case, the court recognised that the member states may lay down conditions in order to ensure that there is a genuine link between an applicant for an allowance in the nature of a social advantage within the meaning of art 7(2) of Regulation 1612/68 and the geographical employment market in question. A residence requirement could be considered to be appropriate for this purpose, but must not go beyond what is necessary to attain that objective. In particular, its application must rest on clear criteria which are made known in advance and provision must be made for judicial protection<sup>31</sup>.

27. Finally, in Trojani's case, a French national working at a Salvation Army hostel in Belgium in return for board and lodging and some pocket money was refused the Belgian minimex benefit on the same grounds as Grzelczyk's case: he did not have Belgian nationality and could not benefit from the application of Regulation 1612/68. In this case the court found, that the applicant could not derive a right of residence from art 18(1) EC in conjunction with Directive 90/364 due to his lack of resources. However, as he was in possession of a residence permit and was lawfully resident in Belgium, he was entitled to benefit from the fundamental principle of equal treatment as laid down in art 12 EC. The court therefore concluded that, in so far as national legislation does not grant a social assistance benefit to EU citizens from other member states, who reside lawfully within its territory even though they satisfy the conditions required of nationals of that member state, this constitutes discrimination on grounds of nationality prohibited by art 12 EC<sup>32</sup>.

C—Citizenship and social benefits: overall picture

28. If these judgments are viewed together, a number of principles emerge in relation to EU citizenship as such and, subsequently, to the entitlement of EU citizens to non-contributory benefits of a social nature. By placing emphasis on the fundamental character of EU citizenship, the court makes clear that this is not merely a hollow or symbolic concept, but that it constitutes the basic status of all nationals of EU member states, giving rise to certain rights and privileges in other member states where they are resident. In particular, EU citizenship entitles nationals of other member states to equal treatment with nationals of the host member state in respect of situations coming within the substantive scope of Community law. Pursuing studies in

<sup>28</sup> The court in para 60 of its judgment uses the term 'this principle', though it appears from the context that arts 2 and 5 are the subject of this consideration.

<sup>29</sup> See Collins' case, cited in footnote 18, above (para 60 of the judgment).

<sup>30</sup> See footnote above (para 63 of the judgment).

<sup>31</sup> See footnote 29, above (paras 67–72 of the judgment).

<sup>32</sup> See Trojani's case, cited in footnote 18, above (para 44 of the judgment).

a another state than that of which the EU citizen is a national cannot of itself deprive him of the possibility of relying on art 12 EC<sup>33</sup>. As the cases described above make clear, various social benefits which member states previously granted to its nationals and to economically active persons under Regulations 1612/68 or 1408/71 now have been extended to EU citizens who are lawfully resident in the host member state. I refer to the child-raising benefit in Martinez Sala's case, the minimex benefit in Grzelczyk's case and Trojani's case and the tideover allowance in D'Hoop's case. In these cases the benefits were covered by existing Community regulations and therefore clearly were within the scope ratione materiae of the Treaty.

c 29. In contrast, it is interesting to note that in Collins's case, the court did not place the jobseeking allowance claimed by the applicant explicitly within the scope ratione materiae of the Treaty. Rather, in the context of interpreting the provisions in Regulation 1612/68 on access to employment in other member states, it used the concept of citizenship to draw it within the scope of the Treaty:

d '... in view of the establishment of citizenship of the Union and the interpretation in the case law of the right to equal treatment enjoyed by citizens of the Union, it is no longer possible to exclude from the scope of art [39(2) EC] ... a benefit of a financial nature intended to facilitate access to employment in the labour market of a member state.'

e In other words, it would appear that citizenship itself may imply that certain benefits can be brought within the scope of the Treaty, if these allowances are provided for purposes which coincide with objectives pursued by the primary or secondary Community legislation.

f 30. It is also clear from the case law that entitlement by lawfully resident EU citizens to social benefits in these situations is not absolute and that the member states may subject eligibility to these benefits to certain objective, ie non-discriminatory, conditions in order to protect their legitimate interests. In the two cases involving benefits which were aimed at assisting the beneficiary to gain access to the employment market, D'Hoop's case and Collins's case, the court recognised that the member states may impose requirements to ensure that the applicant has a real link with the relevant geographical employment market. These requirements must be applied in such a way that they comply with the basic Community principle of proportionality.

g 31. As indicated, an EU citizen must also be lawfully resident in the host member state in order to be eligible for social benefits. Under Directives 90/364 and 93/96, the EU citizen or student must possess sufficient resources to avoid becoming a burden on the public finances of the host member state and he must be adequately insured against sickness costs. Here, too, these limitations and conditions must be applied in compliance with the general principles of Community law, in particular the principle of proportionality<sup>34</sup>. In Grzelczyk's case the court thus held that the condition that an EU citizen must not become an unreasonable burden on the public finances of the host member state did not preclude him, in the given circumstances, from being entitled to a social benefit. Neither, for that matter, did the fact that art 3 of Directive 93/96 excludes students from entitlement to maintenance grants preclude him from receiving the minimex benefit. The notion of 'unreasonable burden' is apparently flexible and, according to the court, implies that Directive 93/96 accepts a degree of financial solidarity between the member states in assisting each other's nationals residing lawfully on their territory. As the same principle is at the basis of the conditions imposed by Directive 90/364, there is no reason to presume that this same financial solidarity does not apply in that context, too.

33 See Grzelczyk's case, cited in footnote 16, above (para 36 of the judgment).

34 See Baumbast's case, cited in footnote 21, above (para 91 of the judgment).

32. The question arises as to what is meant by the term 'a degree' of financial solidarity. Clearly the court does not envisage the member states opening up the full range of their social assistance systems to EU citizens entering and residing within their territory. To accept such a proposition would amount to undermining one of the foundations of the residence directives. It would seem to me that this is a further reference to the observance of the principle of proportionality in applying the national requirements in respect of eligibility for social assistance. On the one hand, the member states are entitled to ensure that the social benefits which they make available are granted for the purposes for which they are intended. On the other hand, they must accept that EU citizens, who have been lawfully resident within their territory for a relevant period of time, may equally be eligible for such assistance where they fulfil the objective conditions set for their own nationals. In this respect, they must ensure that the criteria and conditions for granting such assistance do not discriminate directly or indirectly between their own nationals and other EU citizens, that they are clear, suited to attaining the purpose of the assistance, are made known in advance and that the application is subject to judicial review<sup>35</sup>. To this I would add that it should also be possible to apply them with sufficient flexibility to take account of the particular individual circumstances of applicants, where refusal of such assistance is likely to affect what is known in German constitutional law as the 'Kernbereich' or the substantive core of a fundamental right granted by the Treaty, such as the rights contained in art 18(1) EC. It is interesting to note that this principle has been laid down in art II-112 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the Union which is incorporated in the Draft Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe<sup>36</sup>. This provides that any limitation on the exercise of the rights and freedoms recognised by the Charter must respect the essence of these rights and freedoms. Article II-105 of the Charter guarantees the freedom of EU citizens to move and reside within the territory of the member states in terms which are essentially identical to art 18(1) EC.

33. There has, in other words, been a marked development in EU citizenship (arts 17 and 18(1) EC) in conjunction with the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of nationality (art 12 EC) in providing a basis for entitlement to certain social benefits in the member states in which EU citizens are lawfully resident. As I observed in para 29, above, where the benefits concerned were required to be explicitly within the scope ratione materiae of the EC Treaty, the court in Collins' case apparently accepted that this is the case if the benefit concerned is provided for purposes which coincide with the objectives of primary or secondary Community law. Persons who have moved to another member state and have, at least initially, complied with the residence conditions laid down in the residence directives, but have since found themselves in a situation in which they need to apply for financial assistance are, subject to the limitations and conditions laid down by the Community legislature, entitled to 35 See Collins' case, cited in footnote 18, above (para 72 of the judgment).

36 CIG 87/04 of 6 August 2004.

- a such assistance on an equal footing with nationals of the host member state. These limitations and conditions must be applied in such a way that the final result is not disproportionate to the aims for which they are imposed. Neither may that result amount to a discrimination of the EU citizen which cannot be objectively justified, where that EU citizen finds himself in the same material circumstances as a national of the host member state and is sufficiently socially
- b integrated in that member state. In this regard, depending on the nature of the benefits concerned, the member states may lay down such objective conditions as are necessary to ensure that the benefit is provided to persons who have a sufficient link with its territory.

V—THE PRELIMINARY QUESTIONS

- c A—The first question: citizenship and maintenance assistance

34. The first question referred by the High Court is aimed at ascertaining whether financial support provided by the member states to students to assist them with maintenance costs continues to fall outside the scope of the application of the EC Treaty for the purposes of art 12 EC, in view of d the addition of art 18 EC to the EC Treaty and in view of the developments in the field of education, since the court gave its judgments in Lair's case and Brown's case.

35. Bidar observes, first, that he should be regarded as an EU citizen student who resided lawfully in the United Kingdom for more than three years before his courses commenced. Consequently, he is not in the position of an e EU national falling within the ambit of Directive 93/96. As Community competence has been extended to the field of education, the material scope of the Treaty is not restricted to matters related to access to education, but also covers matters related to the encouragement of student mobility, including the provision of assistance with maintenance costs. He states that Grzelczyk's case confirms that the court's judgment in Brown's case has been overtaken by these

f developments in Community law. Even if he is considered as falling within the scope of Directive 93/96, Bidar observes that the conditions imposed by that directive are not absolute and must be applied in accordance with the general principles of Community law, in particular the principle of proportionality. In this respect he points out that his education is already very much bound up

g with the United Kingdom education system. Finally, he submits that it is artificial to make a distinction between assistance with tuition fees on the one hand and maintenance grants and subsidised loans on the other, as denial of access to either constitutes an obstacle for students to the enjoyment of free movement.

36. As to Bidar's personal status the United Kingdom government points out

h that, before the national court, he relied on Directive 93/96 and as such he cannot be regarded as being 'settled' within the United Kingdom. The German government adds that by applying for a loan even before commencing his studies, Bidar deprived himself of the possibility of acquiring the right of residence under Directive 93/96 and of invoking art 18 EC in conjunction with art 12 EC.

i 37. All member state governments having submitted written observations and the Commission consider that financial assistance with maintenance costs provided to students continues to fall outside the scope of application of the EC Treaty. Various arguments were advanced in support of this assertion, eg the introduction of art 149 EC (formerly art 126 of the EC Treaty) which recognises the responsibility of the member states for the content of teaching and the organisation of education systems. According to them this includes systems of student support. They point out that the right of residence provided for in art 18(1) EC is subject to limitations and conditions laid down in the Treaty and the measures adopted to give it effect. Article 3 of Directive 93/96 excludes a right of migrant students to maintenance grants which, in their view, was confirmed by the court in Grzelczyk's case. Reference was also made to European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 2004/38<sup>37</sup> which must be transposed by the member states by 30 April 2006. Article 24(2) of this directive explicitly provides that prior to acquisition of permanent residence, a right which is obtained after a continued period of five years of legal residence in the host member state, that state is not obliged to grant maintenance aid for studies consisting in student grants or student loans to persons other than workers, self-employed persons, persons who retain such status and members of their families. a

38. More generally, the Austrian government points out that the European Agreement on Continued Payment of Scholarships to Students Studying Abroad, adopted in the framework of the Council of Europe in 1969, is based on the principle that the home state is responsible for the payment of scholarships and that if the host state also were to become responsible in this regard, there would be danger of duplicate payments. Similarly, the Netherlands government observes that as there is no co-ordination in this field at Community level, intermingling the home state and host state principles could have disruptive effects. The Danish and Finnish governments also refer to the possible effects of a negative answer to the first question on their rules for granting maintenance assistance to students. b

39. Firstly, I would observe that the answer to the first question of the High Court depends on the factual situation of the case. Although it focuses on whether or not assistance with maintenance costs for students now comes within the ambit of the EC Treaty, it is essential to establish under which set of rules that question must be appreciated. On the one hand, the United Kingdom in particular contends that, as Bidar is a national of another member state who is in the United Kingdom in order to follow university education, he falls exclusively within the scope of Directive 93/96. Bidar, on the other hand, refers to the fact that he had already been resident in the United Kingdom for three years prior to taking up his studies and that he had also followed his secondary education in the United Kingdom. In that respect he submits that he is in the same factual situation as Ms D'Hoop and must be regarded as an EU citizen who had made use of his right to move to another member state under art 18(1) EC. This implies that the question as to his right to a student maintenance loan should be considered under that Treaty provision in conjunction with art 12 EC. In my view there are strong indications on the basis of the facts set out in para 5, above, that Bidar does indeed come within the second category and that he fulfils the conditions laid down in Directive 90/364. However, as it is up to the referring court to establish the facts and thereby determine which set of rules is applicable to the case, I will discuss both options. c

40. Article 18(1) EC subjects the rights of EU citizens to move and reside within the territory of the member states to the limitations and conditions laid d

<sup>37</sup> On the right of citizens of the Union and their family members to move and reside freely within the territory of the member states amending Regulation (EEC) 1612/68 and repealing Directives (EEC) 64/221, 68/360, 72/194, 73/148, 75/34, 75/35, 90/364, 90/365 and 93/96) (OJ 2004 L158 p 77, as corrected in OJ 2004 L229 p 35).

a down in the EC Treaty and the measures adopted to give it effect. As far as students are concerned, their situation is governed by Directive 93/96. This directive applies to students who have gone to another member state to take up a course of studies. In other words, following a course of studies in the host member state is the reason for them using the rights conferred upon them by art 18(1) EC. Students in this situation must meet the conditions already b mentioned in para 18, above, particularly in respect of their financial independence. They must not become an unreasonable burden on the public finances of the host member state nor, according to art 3 of Directive 93/96, are they entitled to maintenance grants.

c 41. In Grzelczyk's case the court confirmed these principles as such, but attenuated their severity in the light of the circumstances of the case at hand. Although barring entitlement to a maintenance grant, it found that the directive was silent as to the possibility of acquiring a social security benefit, such as a minimum subsistence allowance. In addition, though the directive was aimed at avoiding students becoming an unreasonable burden on public finance, the court considered that this principle was not to be applied in an d absolute sense, but must be understood as meaning that in certain cases, such as that of Grzelczyk's case who had run into financial difficulty in his final year of studies, member states must accept a degree of financial solidarity by supporting each other's nationals.

e 42. If Bidar is to be regarded as a student coming solely within the ambit of Directive 93/96, it is abundantly clear that art 3 of the directive presents a considerable barrier for him being eligible for a maintenance grant in the United Kingdom. However, what is at issue is not eligibility for a maintenance grant, but eligibility for a (subsidised) loan to cover maintenance costs. Student loans are not covered explicitly by art 3 of Directive 93/96 and indeed, in view of the fact that they now have been explicitly excluded by the parallel provision in Directive 2004/38, art 24(2), it could be inferred that eligibility for such loans
f is not excluded by art 3 of Directive 93/96.

g 43. That being said, the question as to whether students coming from other member states should be eligible for student loans for maintenance costs must be answered by reference to the general principle of art 1 of Directive 93/96 that in order to obtain the right to residence in the host member state, students must declare that they possess sufficient resources to avoid becoming a burden on the social assistance system during their period of residence. As the court stated in Grzelczyk's case, the directive only requires a declaration by the student to that effect at the beginning of his period of residence within the member state. There are two reasons for querying whether this condition also applies to student loans for maintenance costs. The first is that such loans
h generally are not part of the social assistance systems of the member states and indeed, in Grzelczyk's case, the court made just this distinction. The second is that, although such loans are usually provided at non-commercial conditions and repayment in certain cases is waived, the burden on the public finances resulting from these aspects is smaller than in the case of benefits that do not have to be repaid.

i 44. Nevertheless, it is clear from the basic condition that students must of themselves possess sufficient resources on arriving in the host member state, that they are precluded from applying for a (subsidised) loan in respect of maintenance costs. The cumulative effect of loans provided under conditions, such as those of the Student Support Regulations, constitutes a considerable burden on public finance, as is also apparent from the information provided by the national court on this point<sup>38</sup>. This justifies them being treated in the same manner as maintenance grants for the purposes of art 3 of Directive 93/96. a 45. I could, however, envisage an exception to this rule and, indeed, the Netherlands government also suggested that in certain exceptional circumstances there may be reasons for applying art 3 leniently. Referring to my earlier observation in paras 31 and 32, above that the conditions imposed by Directive 93/96 must be applied in accordance with the general principles of Community law, particularly the principle of proportionality, it must be ensured that the core of the fundamental rights accorded by art 18(1) EC is respected. For instance, a student who first complied with the basic conditions of the directive may encounter financial difficulties at a later stage of his studies. In such a situation, it would seem to me that the logic of the Grzelczyk judgment should apply. Where, according to that judgment, under arts 18(1) and 12 EC, an EU citizen, as a student, is entitled to a minimum subsistence allowance in his final year of studies on an equal footing with nationals of the member state if his financial position has changed since he took up his studies, there would be no reason to exclude entitlement of EU citizens in a similar situation under those provisions to the less burdensome instrument of a student loan. In such exceptional situations the principle of financial solidarity between the nationals of the member states entails that once a student has commenced a course of studies in another member state and has progressed to a certain stage of these studies, that state should enable him to complete these studies by providing the financial assistance which is available to its nationals. b

c
d

46. The second situation to be considered is based on the presumption that Bidar should not be regarded as a student falling within the scope of Directive 93/96, but as an EU citizen who has exercised his right to move to and reside on the territory of another member state. This involves examining whether following the introduction of the provisions on EU citizenship and education, the scope of the EC Treaty now extends to financial support provided by the member states for students' maintenance costs. e
f

47. In its judgments of 21 June 1988 the court held that in view of the stage of development of Community law at that time, assistance for maintenance and training given to students, who did not enjoy worker or worker-derived status, in principle, falls outside the scope of the E(E)C Treaty for the purposes of art 12 EC. This was explained by the fact that such assistance is to be regarded, on the one hand, as a matter of educational policy which is not as such included in the spheres entrusted to the Community institutions and, on the other, a matter of social policy which falls within the competence of the member states in so far as it is not covered by specific provisions of the E(E)C Treaty. g

48. After those judgments a number of provisions were added by the Treaty of Maastricht to the EC Treaty on education. Articles 3(1), sub q, and 149 EC now provide a basis for Community action in this area. The scope of these provisions is limited. Any action taken by the Community in this field is restricted to promoting co-operation between the member states in various respects, including the mobility of students and teachers. Harmonisation is excluded explicitly. Though opening the possibility to take certain incentive measures in the field of education, the Treaty provisions in this area are based on the principle that the member states retain responsibility for the content of teaching and the organisation of education systems. h a 49. I am not convinced that assistance granted for maintenance costs must still be regarded as falling outside the scope of Community law for the sole reason that such assistance must be regarded as an aspect of the 'organisation of education systems'. What is important in this context is that, although conferring limited powers on the Community institutions, these provisions do b make it possible for the Community itself to adopt measures for facilitating the mobility of students, including the provision of financial assistance with maintenance costs. Not only is educational policy as such therefore now within 'the spheres entrusted to the Community institutions', this also applies to financial measures adopted to facilitate student mobility. In Grzelczyk's case the court, too, attached importance to these developments since its judgment in Brown's case<sup>39</sup>.
i

<sup>38</sup> See para 70, below.

c 50. The inclusion of these provisions on education is therefore indicative of the fact that the subject of assistance with maintenance costs now falls within the substantive scope of the EC Treaty. Furthermore, it is important that, in comparison with the situation in 1988 under the EEC Treaty, the EC Treaty grants fundamental rights to move and reside within the territory of the d member states not only to economically active nationals of the member states, but also to nationals of the member states who are not economically active. Certainly, the exercise of these rights has been made subject to limitations and conditions and to measures adopted to facilitate the exercise of this right. As has repeatedly been emphasised by intervening parties, these include conditions relating to the financial independence of these economically
e inactive EU citizens. It does not follow from this, however, that social benefits of various kinds, including financial support for maintenance costs, fall by their nature outside the scope of the Treaty. In this respect I need only refer to the case law on EU citizenship and social benefits, reproduced above. The directives adopted to facilitate the exercise of the rights granted by art 18(1) EC
f may lay down rules concerning eligibility for benefits provided by the member states or even excluding such eligibility, this does not place these benefits outside the scope of the Treaty.

g 51. Maintenance assistance has long been regarded as a social advantage within the meaning of art 7(2) of Regulation 1612/68<sup>40</sup>. In Lair's case the court observed that such assistance is particularly appropriate from a worker's point of view for improving his professional qualifications and promoting his social advancement<sup>41</sup>. In a more general vein, the court considered in Echternach's case that equal treatment as regards benefits granted to members of workers' families contributes to their integration in the society of the host country, in accordance with the aims of the freedom of movement of workers<sup>42</sup>. Where it is acknowledged that such a benefit comes within the scope ratione materiae of h the EC Treaty for workers and given the rationale of this finding, it would seem to me artificial to exclude the same benefit from the scope of the Treaty for other categories of persons who are now also covered by the Treaty. The question whether these latter categories of persons are entitled to such benefits should be distinguished from the question whether the benefit itself is within the scope of the Treaty.

i

39 See Grzelczyk's case, cited in footnote 16, above (para 35 of the judgment).

40 See Lair's case and Brown's case, both cited in footnote 2, above (paras 24 and 25 of the judgments respectively).

41 See Lair's case (para 23 of the judgment).

42 See Echternach's case, cited in footnote 11, above (para 20 of the judgment).

52. Furthermore, it is important in this regard to point to the development of the case law described above in respect of the rights adhering to EU citizenship under art 18(1) EC since the court's judgment in Martínez Sala's case. Not only are EU citizens entitled to equal treatment with nationals of the host member state in which they are lawfully resident with respect to matters coming within the scope ratione materiae of the Treaty, citizenship itself may provide a basis for bringing certain matters within that scope where the objectives pursued by the national measure correspond with those pursued by the Treaty or secondary legislation as is apparent from the court's judgment in Collins' case. The court has already recognised that benefits of the kind at issue in this case contribute to the integration of the recipients in the society of the host member state in accordance with the aims of free movement of workers. As the provisions on citizenship likewise aim to facilitate the free movement of economically inactive persons, this provides a further reason for considering that they come within the scope ratione materiae of the EC Treaty.

53. I therefore conclude that the first question referred by the High Court should be answered in the negative, ie that since the introduction of arts 17 EC et seq on EU citizenship and in view of the developments in relation to the competence of the European Union in the field of education, assistance with maintenance costs for students attending university courses either in the form of subsidised loans or grants, no longer falls outside the scope of the application of the EC Treaty for the purposes of art 12 EC and the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of nationality.

B—The second question: grounds for justifying differential treatment

54. By its second question the High Court asks the court which criteria must be applied by the national court in determining whether the conditions governing eligibility for maintenance assistance are based on objectively justifiable conditions not dependent on nationality. This question is based on the premiss that the conditions laid down in the Student Support Regulations in respect of eligibility of EU citizens, who do not enjoy worker status or a status which is derived from a worker, for maintenance assistance, constitute discrimination within the meaning of art 12 EC.

55. In order to be eligible for maintenance assistance economically inactive EU citizens are required to be 'settled' in the United Kingdom within the meaning of national immigration law. Periods spent receiving full-time education are not taken into consideration for calculating the period of being settled. Settled status must also be demonstrated by the possession of a residence permit. This same condition of 'being settled' does not apply to British nationals. They only need to have been ordinarily resident within the United Kingdom for the three years prior to commencing their studies. I would only remark in this regard that where the eligibility conditions are more cumbersome for EU citizens who are lawfully resident in the United Kingdom than for British nationals, it is quite clear that this amounts to an indirect discrimination on grounds of nationality within the meaning of art 12 EC. Consequently, it must be considered whether such a difference in treatment can be justified under Community law.

56. Bidar and the United Kingdom, Austrian and German governments assert that a difference in treatment of this type may be justified by objective considerations which are unrelated to the nationality of the persons concerned and are proportionate to the legitimate aim of the national provisions. The United Kingdom, German, Austrian and Netherlands governments and the a Commission assert further that the member states are entitled to ensure that there is a real link between the student and the member state or its employment market or that there is a sufficient degree of integration in society. The Finnish government refers in this regard to a permanent structural and real link with the society of the member state of study. The United Kingdom submits that it is legitimate for a member state to ensure that the b parents of students have made or the students themselves are likely to make, a sufficient contribution through work and hence taxation to justify the provision of subsidised loans. Referring to Advocate General Ruiz-Jarabo Colomer's opinion in Collins' case, the Austrian, German and Netherlands governments add that the member states have a legitimate interest in preventing abuse of their student support schemes. As to the proportionality requirement, various c governments and the Commission contend that a minimum period of residence is both necessary and appropriate. In order to determine what is an adequate period, they refer to the period of five years required for permanent residence laid down in art 16 of Directive 2004/38.

57. I have already had the opportunity in my opinion of 27 February 2003 in d Ninni-Orasche v Bundesminister für Wissenschaft, Verkehr und Kunst<sup>43</sup> to express my views on the circumstances in which EU citizens enjoy equal treatment under arts 18(1) and 12 EC in respect of obtaining financial support with study costs. The facts of that case were comparable to those of the present case, but differed as to the basis of the right of residence and the personal circumstances of the persons concerned. However, the legal assessment of the grounds of e justification for differential treatment is essentially the same.

58. As the court has held on various occasions<sup>44</sup> and as all parties having submitted written and oral observations state, inequality of treatment can be justified only if it is based on objective considerations independent of the nationality of the persons concerned and it is proportionate to the legitimate aim of the national provisions. In this respect the court has recognised that it is
f legitimate for a national legislature to wish to ensure that there is a real link between the applicant for an allowance in the nature of a social advantage within the meaning of art 7(2) of Regulation 1612/68 and the geographic employment market in question<sup>45</sup>.

59. In both these cases the social benefits, the tideover allowance in D'Hoop's case and the jobseeker's allowance in Collins' case, were aimed at providing
g financial assistance to the beneficiaries either in the transition from education to employment or them otherwise genuinely seeking employment. In order to ensure that there was sufficient connection with the domestic employment market, the court considered in Collins' case that a residence requirement is in principle appropriate, but that it must not go beyond what is necessary in order
h to attain that objective. The criteria used in applying this requirement must be clear, made known in advance and provision must be made for a means of redress of a judicial nature. Where a period of residence is required in order to be eligible, 'the period must not exceed what is necessary in order for the national authorities to be able to satisfy themselves that the person concerned is genuinely seeking work in the employment market of the host member
i

<sup>43</sup> Case C-413/01 [2004] All ER (EC) 765.

<sup>44</sup> See e.g. D'Hoop's case and Collins' case, both cited in footnote 18, above (respectively paras 36 and 66 of these judgments).

<sup>45</sup> See D'Hoop's case and Collins' case, both cited in footnote 18, above (respectively paras 38 and 67 of the judgments).

state'<sup>46</sup>. In D'Hoop's case the court found that the requirement that a school diploma be obtained in Belgium in order to be eligible for the tideover allowance was 'too general and exclusive in nature', as— a

[I]t unduly favours an element which is not necessarily representative of the real and effective degree of connection between the applicant for the tideover allowance and the geographic employment market, to the exclusion of all other representative elements'<sup>47</sup>. b

60. In the case of maintenance assistance for students, be it in the form of a subsidised loan or a grant, the real link to be established is not primarily with the employment market of the host member state, although that may be an aspect which may be taken into consideration. Rather, this link is to be found in the degree of affinity which the applicant for this assistance has with the educational system and the degree of his integration into society<sup>48</sup>. It would seem to me that where an EU citizen has followed his secondary education in a member state other than that of which he is a national, which is more adapted to preparing him for entry to an establishment of higher or tertiary education in that member state than elsewhere, the link with the education system of the host member state is evident. In assessing the degree of integration, the individual circumstances of the applicant must necessarily be taken into account. As far as this is concerned, it should be emphasised that the situation of an EU citizen who has come to another member state as a minor, as the dependant of another EU citizen, must be distinguished from EU citizens who have moved to another member state as adults making their own choices. The chances that an EU citizen in the situation of Bidar has integrated into society as a young person, having lived there under the legal guardianship of his grandmother, who was already settled in the United Kingdom, and having followed secondary education in the host member state, surely must be deemed to be greater than EU citizens arriving at later stages of life. c

61. Obviously a member state must for reasons of legal certainty and transparency lay down formal criteria for determining eligibility for maintenance assistance and to ensure that such assistance is provided to persons proving to have a genuine connection with the national educational system and national society. In this respect, and as the court recognised in Collins' case, a residence requirement must, in principle, be accepted as being an appropriate way to establish that connection under the conditions set out in that judgment and cited in para 59, above. It may be inferred from these conditions that the court recognises that a residence requirement may be imposed as a starting point of the assessment of the situation of an individual applicant. The fact that it states that the period must not exceed what is necessary for the purpose of enabling the national authorities to satisfy themselves that a person is genuinely seeking work in the domestic employment market, indicates, however, that other factors must be able to be taken into account in that assessment. This is further borne out by its consideration in D'Hoop's case that the single condition applied by the national authorities in that case was too general and exclusive and that no account could be taken of other representative factors. Ultimately, it would appear to me that if the result of the application of a residence requirement is to exclude a d
e
f
g
h
i

<sup>46</sup> See Collins' case (para 72 of the judgment).

<sup>47</sup> See D'Hoop's case (para 39 of the judgment).

<sup>48</sup> Cf for children of workers, Echternach's case, cited in footnote 11, above (para 35 of the judgment).

a person, who can demonstrate a genuine link with the national education system or society, from the enjoyment of maintenance assistance, this result would be contrary to the principle of proportionality.

62. Additional factors which could be taken into account in a case such as the present one are the need for ensuring continuity in the education of the applicant<sup>49</sup>, the likelihood that he indeed will enter the national employment market and the possibility that he may not be eligible for maintenance assistance from other sources, such as the member state of which he is a national as he no longer fulfils the eligibility criteria in that member state.

63. It may also be recalled in this connection that the court, in the context of Regulation 1612/68, has stated that the freedom of workers must be guaranteed in compliance with the principles of liberty and dignity and the best possible conditions for the integration of the Community worker's family in the society of the host country<sup>50</sup>. There is no reason why this general principle should not apply in the context of the free movement of EU citizens as well.

64. All governments intervening in this case and the Commission point out that, according to art 24(2) of Directive 2004/38, the member states are not obliged to grant maintenance aid for studies to economically inactive EU citizens prior to acquisition of permanent residence. This status is only achieved after five years of continuous residence in the host member state. Leaving aside that this directive entered into force on 30 April 2004, i.e. after the facts in the present case arose, and that it must be transposed by 30 April 2006, it would seem to me that in applying this condition, the fundamental rights conferred directly by the EC Treaty on EU citizens must be fully respected. This implies that the considerations set out above in respect of applying a residence requirement in individual cases are valid in respect of the application of a settlement requirement such as that contained in the Student Support Regulations and that account must be taken of all relevant factors in determining whether or not a genuine link exists with the educational system and the society of the host member state. I do not consider that this amounts to an undermining of the requirement adopted by the Community legislature. Rather it is necessary to ensure that this requirement is applied in conformity with the fundamental provisions of the EC Treaty.

65. The United Kingdom government contends that it is legitimate for a member state to ensure that students' parents have contributed sufficiently, or that the students themselves are likely to make a sufficient contribution to the public finances through taxation in order to justify maintenance assistance being granted. This argument suggests that there is a direct or indirect link between the obligation of residents of a member state to pay taxes and the entitlement to benefits of the kind at issue in the present case. If it is taken to its logical conclusion, this argument implies that if parents have not contributed to taxation or only made a modest contribution, their children would not be eligible for maintenance assistance, whereas students whose parents have contributed significantly would be entitled to such assistance. It does not seem probable that the United Kingdom seriously would accept the social discrimination inherent to this position. Furthermore, as it is loans which are at issue here, it is illogical to require that a person has first contributed to public finances in order to be eligible for a loan which he thereafter must repay even though there is an element of subsidy in the terms for granting this loan. This ground for justification therefore is inherently contradictory.

<sup>49</sup> See Echternach's case (para 22 of the judgment).

<sup>50</sup> See Di Leo's case, cited in footnote 13, above (para 13 of the judgment), Baumbast's case, cited in footnote 21, above (paras 50 and 59 of the judgment) and Kaba v Secretary of State for the Home Dept Case C-356/98 [2000] All ER (EC) 537, [2000] ECR I-2623 (para 20).

66. Finally, it was submitted by various intervening governments that the member states have a legitimate interest in preventing abuse of their student support schemes and in preventing 'benefit tourism'. I do consider that this is indeed a legitimate concern of the member states, but the manner in which this should be ensured should not be such as to undermine the fundamental rights of EU citizens residing lawfully within their territory. A simple residence requirement is too non-selective for achieving this aim. In my view it can be achieved adequately in the context of establishing whether or not an applicant has a genuine link with the national education system or society as set out above.

67. These considerations lead me to the following conclusion: where the result of the application of a settlement requirement, such as that laid down in the Student Support Regulations, to an EU citizen, who is sufficiently integrated into society in the host member state, whose education is closely linked to the education system in the member state and who is in a comparable situation to a national of the host member state, is to deny that EU citizen access to assistance with maintenance costs, this amounts to an unjustified discrimination within the meaning of art 12 EC in conjunction with art 18(1) EC. In those circumstances, the result of the application of such a settlement requirement is not in proportion with the aim it seeks to achieve, ie that maintenance assistance is granted to those who have a genuine link with the national educational system.

68. In the light of the foregoing observations the following answer must be given to the second question. Conditions laid down in national law governing eligibility for assistance with maintenance costs for students must be objectively justified and unrelated to the nationality of EU citizens. In order to determine whether this is the case a national court must ascertain that these conditions are appropriate for establishing a real link between an EU citizen applying for such assistance and the national education system and society. In addition, these conditions must not go beyond what is necessary for achieving that aim.

C—The third question: temporal effects

69. The third question concerns the temporal effects of a judgment by the court finding that assistance with maintenance costs, either in the form of a subsidised loan or a grant, now comes within the scope of the EC Treaty for the purposes of the application of the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of nationality in art 12 EC.

70. Bidar submits that there is no reason to limit the temporal effects of a judgment in this sense. To the extent that they have addressed this point, the intervening governments of the member states have argued that such a limitation should be imposed. The United Kingdom government points out that temporal limitations on the effects of a judgment are only imposed exceptionally and, in particular, where two conditions are satisfied. Firstly, the member state must have been led to adopt practices which did not comply with Community law by reason of objective, significant uncertainty regarding the scope of application of Community provisions, to which the conduct of the Community institutions or other member states have contributed. It

- a submits that a negative answer to the first question fulfils this condition. Secondly, there must be a risk of serious economic repercussions owing, in particular, to the large number of legal relationships entered into on good faith on the basis of rules considered to be validly in force. In this respect the government refers to the calculation made in the order for reference which shows that the cost involved could amount to £66m for the academic year 2000/2001. At the hearing it was added to this that following the enlargement of the Union on 1 May 2004, this figure could rise to £75m per annum.
- b

71. The case law on this matter is well settled and was summarised by the court in Grzelczyk's case. There it stated that it has—

- c 'repeatedly held that an interpretation it gives to a provision of Community law clarifies and defines its meaning and scope only as it should have been understood and applied from the time of its entry into force ...

- d 51. It is only exceptionally that the court may, in application of the general principle of legal certainty inherent in the Community legal order, be moved to restrict the possibility for any person concerned to rely upon a provision which it has interpreted with a view to calling into question legal relationships established in good faith ...

52. It is also settled in case law that the financial consequences which might ensue for a member state from a preliminary ruling do not in themselves justify limiting the temporal effect of the ruling ...

- e 53. The court has taken that step only in quite specific circumstances, where there was a risk of serious economic repercussions owing in particular to the large number of legal relationships entered into in good faith on the basis of rules considered to be validly in force and where it appeared that both individuals and national authorities had been led into adopting practices which did not comply with Community law by reason of objective, significant uncertainty regarding the implications of Community provisions, to which the conduct of other member states or the Commission may even have contributed ...<sup>51</sup>
- f

- g 72. Starting with this latter aspect, I agree with the submissions of the United Kingdom government, that a negative answer to the first question amounts to a new and unforeseen development in Community law. I would accept in this respect that the Student Support Regulations took account of the state of Community law prior to such a finding by the court. The answer which I gave to the second question, however, significantly restricts the scope of the answer given to the first question. The figures presented to justify the financial repercussions of a negative answer to the first question appear to be based on the presumption that all EU citizens, who do not qualify under Regulation 1612/68, would henceforth be eligible for maintenance assistance. It is not exactly clear what the financial impact would be if only those EU citizens who are lawfully resident within the territory of the United Kingdom and have a genuine link with the national educational system and society were to become eligible for such financial assistance. However it cannot be excluded that this interpretation could have wider implications which could go back to the entry into force of the provisions on EU citizenship on 1 November 1993, not only in the United Kingdom, but in all member states. In the event that the court finds that the first question must be given a negative answer, I therefore consider that it is justified to limit the temporal effect of such a judgment to legal relationships established as from the date of that judgment, except where legal proceedings have been initiated prior to that date for the purpose of challenging decisions refusing entitlement to assistance with maintenance costs for students.
- i

<sup>51</sup> See Grzelczyk's case, cited in footnote 16, above.

VI—CONCLUSION

73. I am, therefore, of the opinion that the Court of Justice should give the following answers to the questions referred by the High Court of Justice of England and Wales, Queen's Bench Division (Administrative Court):

(1) Since the introduction of arts 17 EC et seq on EU citizenship and in view of the developments in relation to the competence of the European Union in the field of education, assistance with maintenance costs for students attending university courses either in the form of subsidised loans or grants, no longer falls outside the scope of the application of the EC Treaty for the purposes of art 12 EC and the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of nationality.

(2) Conditions laid down in national law governing eligibility for assistance with maintenance costs for students must be objectively justified and unrelated to the nationality of EU citizens. In order to determine whether this is the case a national court must ascertain that these conditions are appropriate for establishing a real link between an EU citizen applying for such assistance and the national education system and society. In addition, these conditions must not go beyond what is necessary for achieving that aim.

(3) Article 12 EC may only be relied upon to claim entitlement to assistance with maintenance costs from the date of the judgment of the court except in cases where legal proceedings were already initiated for the same purpose prior to that date.

15 March 2005. THE COURT OF JUSTICE (Grand Chamber) delivered the following judgment.

1. This reference for a preliminary ruling concerns the interpretation of the first paragraph of arts 12 and 18 EC (formerly arts 6 and 8a of the EC Treaty).

2. The reference was made in the course of proceedings between Mr Bidar and the London Borough of Ealing and the Secretary of State for Education and Skills concerning the refusal of his application for a subsidised student loan to cover his maintenance costs.

LEGAL BACKGROUND

Community legislation

3. The first paragraph of art 12 EC provides:

'Within the scope of application of this Treaty, and without prejudice to any special provisions contained therein, any discrimination on grounds of nationality shall be prohibited.'

4. Article 18(1) EC reads as follows:

'Every citizen of the Union shall have the right to move and reside freely within the territory of the Member States, subject to the limitations and conditions laid down in this Treaty and by the measures adopted to give it effect.'

a 5. Article 149 EC (formerly art 126 of the EC Treaty) provides:

‘1. The Community shall contribute to the development of quality education by encouraging cooperation between Member States and, if necessary, by supporting and supplementing their action, while fully respecting the responsibility of the Member States for the content of teaching and the organisation of education systems and their cultural and linguistic diversity.

b

2. Community action shall be aimed at:

—developing the European dimension in education, particularly through the teaching and dissemination of the languages of the Member States;

c

—encouraging mobility of students and teachers, inter alia by encouraging the academic recognition of diplomas and periods of study;

—promoting cooperation between educational establishments;

—developing exchanges of information and experience on issues common to the education systems of the Member States;

—encouraging the development of youth exchanges and of exchanges of socio-educational instructors;

d

—encouraging the development of distance education ...

4. In order to contribute to the achievement of the objectives referred to in this Article, the Council:

—acting in accordance with the procedure referred to in Article 251, after consulting the Economic and Social Committee and the Committee of the Regions, shall adopt incentive measures, excluding any harmonisation of the laws and regulations of the Member States;

e

—acting by a qualified majority on a proposal from the Commission, shall adopt recommendations.’

f

6. Council Directive (EEC) 90/364 (on the right of residence) (OJ 1990 L180 p 26) provides in art 1(1) that the member states are to grant the right of residence to nationals of member states who do not enjoy this right under other provisions of Community law and to members of their families, provided that they themselves and the members of their families are covered by sickness insurance in respect of all risks in the host member state and have sufficient resources to avoid becoming a burden on that state’s social assistance system during their period of residence.

g

7. Under art 3 of that directive, the right of residence is to remain for as long as the beneficiaries of that right fulfil the conditions laid down in art 1 of the directive.

8. According to the seventh recital in the preamble to Council Directive (EEC) 93/36 (on the right of residence for students) (OJ 1993 L317 p 59):

h

‘... in the present state of Community law, as established by the case-law of the Court of Justice, assistance granted to students, does not fall within the scope of the [EEC] Treaty within the meaning of Article 7 thereof [later art 6 of the EC Treaty, now, after amendment, art 12 EC].’

i

9. Article 1 of that directive provides:

‘In order to lay down conditions to facilitate the exercise of the right of residence and with a view to guaranteeing access to vocational training in a non-discriminatory manner for a national of a Member State who has been accepted to attend a vocational training course in another Member State, the Member States shall recognise the right of residence for any student who is a national of a Member State and who does not enjoy that right under other provisions of Community law, and for the student's spouse and their dependent children, where the student assures the relevant national authority, by means of a declaration or by such alternative means as the student may choose that are at least equivalent, that he has sufficient resources to avoid becoming a burden on the social assistance system of the host Member State during their period of residence, provided that the student is enrolled in a recognised educational establishment for the principal purpose of following a vocational training course there and that he is covered by sickness insurance in respect of all risks in the host Member State.' a

10. Article 3 of that directive provides: b

'This Directive shall not establish any entitlement to the payment of maintenance grants by the host Member State on the part of students benefiting from the right of residence.'

11. Directives 90/364 and 93/96 were repealed with effect from 30 April 2006 by Directive (EC) 2004/38 of the European Parliament and of the Council (on the right of citizens of the Union and their family members to move and reside freely within the territory of the member states) (OJ 2004 L229 p 35), which, in accordance with art 40, must be transposed by the member states by 30 April 2006. c

National legislation d

12. In England and Wales, financial assistance for students to cover maintenance costs is, under the Education (Student Support) Regulations 2001, SI 2001/951 (the Student Support Regulations), provided essentially by means of loans. e

13. Under the Student Support Regulations, students who are recipients of a loan receive 75% of the maximum amount of the loan, while the remaining 25% is granted on the basis of the financial position of the student and of his parents or partner. The loan is provided at an interest rate which is linked to the rate of inflation and is therefore below the normal rate for a commercial loan. The loan is repayable after the student completes his studies, provided that he is earning in excess of £10,000. If that is the case, he pays an annual amount equivalent to 9% of the income earned above £10,000, until the loan is repaid in full. f

14. Under reg 4 of the Student Support Regulations, a person is eligible for a student loan for a designated course if he falls within one of the situations mentioned in Sch 1 to those regulations. g

15. Under para 1 of that schedule, a person is eligible to receive a student loan if he is settled in the United Kingdom within the meaning of the Immigration Act 1971 and meets the residence conditions referred to in para 8 of the schedule, namely: h

(a) he is ordinarily resident in England and Wales on the first day of the first academic year of the course; i

(b) he has been ordinarily resident throughout the three-year period preceding that day in the United Kingdom and Islands; and

(c) his residence in the United Kingdom and Islands has not during any part of that three-year period been wholly or mainly for the purpose of receiving full-time education.

a 16. As regards migrant workers and members of their families covered by Council Regulation (EEC) 1612/68 (on freedom of movement for workers within the Community) (OJ English Sp Edn 1968 (II) p 475), paras 4 to 6 of Sch 1 to the Student Support Regulations do not require them to be settled in the United Kingdom and make their eligibility for a student loan subject to the same residence conditions, while considering that they satisfy the condition of b ordinary residence in para 8(b) of that schedule from the time when they reside in the European Economic Area.

17. Under the Immigration Act 1971 a person is settled in the United Kingdom if he is ordinarily resident there without being subject to any restriction on the period for which he may remain in the territory.

c 18. However, it is apparent from the case file that under United Kingdom law a national of another member state cannot, in his capacity as a student, obtain the status of being settled in the United Kingdom.

19. As regards tuition fees, the Student Support Regulations provide for financial support on the same conditions for nationals of the United Kingdom and those of other member states.

d THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

20. In August 1998 Mr Bidar, a French national, entered the territory of the United Kingdom, accompanying his mother who was to undergo medical treatment there. It is common ground that in the United Kingdom he lived e with his grandmother, as her dependant, and pursued and completed his secondary education without ever having recourse to social assistance.

21. In September 2001 he started a course in economics at University College London.

22. While Mr Bidar received assistance with respect to tuition fees, his application for financial assistance to cover his maintenance costs, in the form of f a student loan, was refused on the ground that he was not settled in the United Kingdom.

23. In the proceedings brought by him against that refusal, Mr Bidar submits that, by making the grant of a student loan to a national of a member state conditional on his being settled in the United Kingdom, the Student Support Regulations introduced discrimination prohibited under art 12 EC. He submits,
g in the alternative, that, even if it were accepted that the provision of a grant falls outside the scope of the Treaty, that is not the case with an application for assistance in the form of a subsidised loan.

24. The Secretary of State for Education and Skills, who is the responsible authority for making the Student Support Regulations, contends, on the other
h hand, that the provision of assistance for maintenance costs, whether in the form of a grant or a loan, does not fall within the scope of art 12 EC, as the court acknowledged in Lair v Universität Hannover Case 39/86 [1988] ECR 3161 and Brown v Secretary of State for Scotland Case 197/86 1989 SLT 402, [1988] ECR 3205. Even if such assistance were to fall within the scope of the Treaty, the conditions for granting that assistance would guarantee the existence of a i direct link between the recipient of the assistance and the state which finances it.

25. The national court observes that student loans represent a cost to the state, because of the reduced rates of interest and possible problems with repayment, a cost which the Secretary of State for Education and Skills estimates at the equivalent of 50% of the amount of the loans. The average loan made to a student for the academic year 2000–01 is said to be £3,155. If the 41,713 nationals of the European Union who studied in England and Wales during that year without being settled there had received student loans, the probable cost to the state would thus have been £66m. a

26. According to the national court, Mr Bidar is not covered by Regulation 1612/68 and cannot claim any right to a student loan on the basis of Directive 93/96. b

27. In those circumstances, the High Court of Justice of England and Wales, Queen's Bench Division (Administrative Court), decided to stay the proceedings and refer the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

'(1) Whether, given the decisions of the Court of Justice of the European Communities in ... Lair ... and ... Brown ... and developments in the law of the European Union, including the adoption of Article 18 EC and developments in relation to the competence of the European Union in the field of education, assistance with maintenance costs for students attending university courses, such assistance being given by way of either (a) subsidised loans or (b) grants, continues to fall outside the scope of the application of the EC Treaty for the purposes of Article 12 EC and the prohibition on discrimination on grounds of nationality? c

(2) If either part of question (1) is answered in the negative, and if assistance with maintenance costs for students in the form of grants or loans [does] now fall within the scope of Article 12 EC, what criteria should the national court apply in determining whether the conditions governing eligibility for such assistance are based on objectively justifiable considerations not dependent on nationality? d

(3) If either part of question (1) is answered in the negative, whether Article 12 EC may be relied upon to claim entitlement to assistance with maintenance costs from a date prior to the date of the judgment of the Court of Justice in the present case and, if [not], whether an exception should be made for those who initiated legal proceedings before that date?' e

THE QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

Question (1)

28. By its first question, the national court asks essentially whether, in the present state of Community law, assistance to students in higher education intended to cover their maintenance costs, in the form of a subsidised loan or a grant, falls outside the scope of the Treaty, in particular the first paragraph of art 12 EC. f

29. According to the order for reference, the claimant in the main proceedings is not covered by Regulation 1612/68. g

30. In that context, the national court wishes to know whether assistance granted to students to cover their maintenance costs is within the scope of application of the Treaty within the meaning of the first paragraph of art 12 EC, which states that, without prejudice to any special provisions contained in the Treaty, any discrimination on grounds of nationality is prohibited within that scope of application. h

31. To assess the scope of application of the Treaty within the meaning of art 12 EC, that article must be read in conjunction with the provisions of the Treaty on citizenship of the Union. Citizenship of the Union is destined to be the fundamental status of nationals of the member states, enabling those who i

- a find themselves in the same situation to receive the same treatment in law irrespective of their nationality, subject to such exceptions as are expressly provided for (see Grzelczyk v Centre Public d'Aide Sociale d'Ottignies-Louvain-la-Neuve Case C-184/99 [2003] All ER (EC) 385, [2001] ECR I-6193 (paras 30, 31) and Garcia Avello v Belgium Case C-148/02 [2004] All ER (EC) 740, [2003] ECR I-11613 (paras 22, 23)).
- b 32. According to settled case law, a citizen of the European Union lawfully resident in the territory of the host member state can rely on art 12 EC in all situations which fall within the scope ratione materiae of Community law (see Martínez Sala v Freistaat Bayern Case C-85/96 [1998] ECR I-2691 (para 63) and Grzelczyk's case (para 32)).
- c 33. Those situations include those involving the exercise of the fundamental freedoms guaranteed by the Treaty and those involving the exercise of the right to move and reside within the territory of the member states, as conferred by art 18 EC (see Criminal proceedings against Bickel Case C-274/96 [1998] ECR I-7637 (paras 15, 16), Grzelczyk's case (para 33) and Garcia Avello's case (para 24)).
- d 34. Moreover, there is nothing in the text of the Treaty to suggest that students who are citizens of the Union, when they move to another member state to study there, lose the rights which the Treaty confers on citizens of the Union (see Grzelczyk's case (para 35)).
35. As is apparent from D'Hoop v Office National de l'Emploi Case C-224/98 [2003] All ER (EC) 527, [2002] ECR I-6191 (paras 29–34), a national of a member state who goes to another member state and pursues secondary education there exercises the freedom to move guaranteed by art 18 EC.
- e 36. Furthermore, a national of a member state who, like the claimant in the main proceedings, lives in another member state where he pursues and completes his secondary education, without it being objected that he does not have sufficient resources or sickness insurance, enjoys a right of residence on the basis of art 18 EC and Directive 90/364.
- f 37. With regard to social assistance benefits, the court held in Trojani v Centre Public d'Aide Sociale de Bruxelles (CPAS) Case C-456/02 [2004] All ER (EC) 1065 (para 43), that a citizen of the Union who is not economically active may rely on the first paragraph of art 12 EC where he has been lawfully resident in the host member state for a certain time or possesses a residence permit.
- g 38. It is true that the court held in Lair's case and Brown's case (paras 15, 18 respectively) that 'at the present stage of development of Community law assistance given to students for maintenance and for training falls in principle outside the scope of the EEC Treaty for the purposes of Article 7 thereof [later art 6 of the EC Treaty, now, after amendment, art 12 EC]'. In those judgments the court considered that such assistance was, on the one hand, a matter of education policy, which was not as such included in the spheres entrusted to the Community institutions, and, on the other, a matter of social policy, which fell within the competence of the member states in so far as it was not covered by specific provisions of the EEC Treaty.
- h 39. However, since judgment was given in Lair's case and Brown's case, the Treaty on European Union has introduced citizenship of the Union into the EC Treaty and added to Title VIII (now Title XI) of Part Three a Chapter 3 devoted inter alia to education and vocational training (see Grzelczyk's case (para 35)).
- i 40. Thus art 149(1) EC gives the Community the task of contributing to the development of quality education by encouraging co-operation between member states and, if necessary, by supporting and supplementing their action, while fully respecting the responsibility of those states for the content of teaching and the organisation of education systems and their cultural and linguistic diversity.

41. Under paras 2 and 4 of that article, the Council may adopt incentive measures, excluding any harmonisation of the laws and regulations of the member states, and recommendations aimed in particular at encouraging the mobility of students and teachers (see D'Hoop's case (para 32)).

42. In view of those developments since the judgments in Lair's case and Brown's case, it must be considered that the situation of a citizen of the Union who is lawfully resident in another member state falls within the scope of application of the Treaty within the meaning of the first paragraph of art 12 EC for the purposes of obtaining assistance for students, whether in the form of a subsidised loan or a grant, intended to cover his maintenance costs.

43. That development of Community law is confirmed by art 24 of Directive 2004/38, which states in para 1 that all Union citizens residing in the territory of another member state on the basis of that directive are to enjoy equal treatment 'within the scope of the Treaty'. In that the Community legislature, in para 2 of that article, defined the content of para 1 in more detail, by providing that a member state may in the case of persons other than workers, self-employed persons, persons who retain such status and members of their families restrict the grant of maintenance aid in the form of grants or loans in respect of students who have not acquired a right of permanent residence, it took the view that the grant of such aid is a matter which, in accordance with art 24(1), now falls within the scope of the Treaty.

44. That interpretation is not invalidated by the argument put forward by the governments which have submitted observations and by the Commission concerning the limitations and conditions referred to in art 18 EC. Those governments and the Commission observe that, while citizenship of the Union enables nationals of the member states to rely on the first paragraph of art 12 EC when they exercise the right to move and reside within the territory of those states, their situation falls within the scope of application of the Treaty within the meaning of art 12 EC only, in accordance with art 18(1) EC, subject to the limitations and conditions laid down in the Treaty and by the measures adopted to give it effect, which include those laid down by Directive 93/96. Since art 3 of that directive excludes the right to payment of maintenance grants on the part of students benefiting from the right of residence, those grants are still outside the scope of the Treaty.

45. In this respect, it is indeed the case that students who go to another member state to start or pursue higher education there and enjoy a right of residence there for that purpose under Directive 93/96 cannot base any right to payment of maintenance assistance on that directive.

46. However, art 3 of Directive 93/96 does not preclude a national of a member state who, by virtue of art 18 EC and Directive 90/364, is lawfully resident in the territory of another member state where he intends to start or pursue higher education from relying during that residence on the fundamental principle of equal treatment enshrined in the first paragraph of art 12 EC.

47. In a context such as that of the main proceedings where the right of residence of the applicant for assistance is not contested, the assertion, made by some of the governments which have submitted observations, that Community law allows a member state to take the view that a national of a another member state who has recourse to social assistance no longer fulfils the conditions of his right of residence and if appropriate to take measures, within the limits imposed by Community law, for the removal of that national (see Grzelczyk's case (para 42) and Trojani's case (para 45)) is moreover immaterial.

b 48. In the light of all the foregoing, the answer to question (1) must be that assistance, whether in the form of subsidised loans or of grants, provided to students lawfully resident in the host member state to cover their maintenance costs falls within the scope of application of the Treaty for the purposes of the prohibition of discrimination laid down in the first paragraph of art 12 EC.

c Question (2)

49. By its second question, the national court seeks to know the criteria which a national court must apply to determine whether the conditions of granting assistance to cover the maintenance costs of students are based on objective considerations independent of nationality.

d 50. For this purpose it should first be examined whether the legislation at issue in the main proceedings distinguishes on the ground of nationality between students who apply for such assistance.

e 51. It must be recalled here that the principle of equal treatment prohibits not only overt discrimination based on nationality but also all covert forms of discrimination which, by applying other distinguishing criteria, lead in fact to the same result (see, inter alia, Sotgiu v Deutsche Bundespost Case 152/73 [1974] ECR 153 (para 11), Meints v Minister van Landbouw, Natuurbeheer en Visserij Case C-57/96 [1997] ECR I-6689 (para 44) and European Commission v Italy Case C-212/99 [2001] ECR I-4923 (para 24)).

f 52. As regards persons not covered by Regulation 1612/68, para 1 of Sch 1 to the Student Support Regulations requires, for the grant to students of assistance to cover their maintenance costs, that the person concerned is settled in the United Kingdom for the purposes of national law and satisfies certain residence conditions, namely that of residing in England and Wales on the first day of the first academic year and that of having resided in the United Kingdom and Islands for the three years preceding that day.

g 53. Such requirements risk placing at a disadvantage primarily nationals of other member states. Both the condition requiring an applicant for that assistance to be settled in the United Kingdom and that requiring him to have resided there prior to his studies are likely to be more easily satisfied by United Kingdom nationals.

h 54. Such a difference in treatment can be justified only if it is based on objective considerations independent of the nationality of the persons concerned and is proportionate to the legitimate aim of the national provisions (see Bickel's case (para 27), D'Hoop's case (para 36) and Garcia Avello's case (para 31)).

i 55. According to the United Kingdom government, it is legitimate for a member state to ensure that the contribution made by parents or students through taxation is or will be sufficient to justify the provision of subsidised loans. It is also legitimate to require a genuine link between the student claiming assistance to cover his maintenance costs and the employment market of the host member state.

56. On this point, it must be observed that, although the member states must, in the organisation and application of their social assistance systems, show a certain degree of financial solidarity with nationals of other member states (see Grzelczyk's case (para 44)), it is permissible for a member state to ensure that the grant of assistance to cover the maintenance costs of students from other member states does not become an unreasonable burden which could have consequences for the overall level of assistance which may be granted by that state. a

57. In the case of assistance covering the maintenance costs of students, it is thus legitimate for a member state to grant such assistance only to students who have demonstrated a certain degree of integration into the society of that state. b

58. In this context, a member state cannot, however, require the students concerned to establish a link with its employment market. Since the knowledge acquired by a student in the course of his higher education does not in general assign him to a particular geographical employment market, the situation of a student who applies for assistance to cover his maintenance costs is not comparable to that of an applicant for a tideover allowance granted to young persons seeking their first job or for a jobseeker's allowance (see, in this regard, D'Hoop's case (para 38) and Collins v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions Case C-138/02 [2004] All ER (EC) 1005 (para 67), respectively). c

59. On the other hand, the existence of a certain degree of integration may be regarded as established by a finding that the student in question has resided in the host member state for a certain length of time. d

60. With respect to national legislation such as the Student Support Regulations, the guarantee of sufficient integration into the society of the host member state follows from the conditions requiring previous residence in the territory of that state, in this case the three years' residence required by the United Kingdom rules at issue in the main proceedings. e

61. The additional condition that students are entitled to assistance to cover their maintenance costs only if they are also settled in the host member state could admittedly, like the requirement of three years' residence referred to in the preceding paragraph, correspond to the legitimate aim of ensuring that an applicant for assistance has demonstrated a certain degree of integration into the society of that state. However, it is common ground that the rules at issue in the main proceedings preclude any possibility of a national of another member state obtaining settled status as a student. They thus make it impossible for such a national, whatever his actual degree of integration into the society of the host member state, to satisfy that condition and hence to enjoy the right to assistance to cover his maintenance costs. Such treatment cannot be regarded as justified by the legitimate objective which those rules seek to secure. f

62. Such treatment prevents a student who is a national of a member state and who is lawfully resident and has received a substantial part of his secondary education in the host member state, and has consequently established a genuine link with the society of the latter state, from being able to pursue his studies under the same conditions as a student who is a national of that state and is in the same situation. g

63. The answer to question (2) must accordingly be that the first paragraph of art 12 EC must be interpreted as precluding national legislation which grants students the right to assistance covering their maintenance costs only if they are settled in the host member state, while precluding a national of another member state from obtaining the status of settled person as a student even if that national is lawfully resident and has received a substantial part of h

i

- a his secondary education in the host member state and has consequently established a genuine link with the society of that state.

Question (3)

- b 64. By its third question, the national court asks the court whether, if the court were to rule that assistance to cover the maintenance costs of students falls within the scope of application of the Treaty within the meaning of the first paragraph of art 12 EC, the effects of such a judgment should be limited in time.
- c 65. The United Kingdom, German and Austrian governments request the court, should it so rule, to limit in time the effects of its judgment, except as regards judicial proceedings brought before the date of that judgment. In support of their request, they rely in particular on the financial implications raised by the national court.
- d 66. It should be recalled that the interpretation the court gives to a rule of Community law is limited to clarifying and defining the meaning and scope of that rule as it ought to have been understood and applied from the time of its coming into force. It follows that the rule as thus interpreted may, and must, be applied by the courts even to legal relationships arising and established before the judgment ruling on the request for interpretation, provided that in other respects the conditions enabling an action relating to the application of that rule to be brought before the courts having jurisdiction are satisfied (see Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato v Denkavit Italiana Srl Case 61/79 [1980] ECR 1205 (para 16), and Blaizot v University of Liège Case 24/86 [1988] ECR 379 (para 27)).
- e 67. It is only exceptionally that the court may, in application of the general principle of legal certainty inherent in the Community legal order, be moved to restrict the possibility for any person concerned of relying on a provision it has interpreted with a view to calling in question legal relationships established in good faith (see Blaizot's case (para 28), Administration des Douanes et Droits Indirects v Legros Case C-163/90 [1992] ECR I-4625 (para 30) and Sürül v Bundesanstalt für Arbeit Case C-262/96 [1999] ECR I-2685 (para 108)).
- f 68. Moreover, it is settled case law that the financial consequences which might ensue for a member state from a preliminary ruling do not in themselves justify limiting the temporal effect of the ruling (see, inter alia, Grzelczyk's case (para 52)).
- g 69. The court has taken that step only in quite specific circumstances, where there was a risk of serious economic repercussions owing in particular to the large number of legal relationships entered into in good faith on the basis of rules considered to be validly in force and where it appeared that both individuals and national authorities had been led into adopting practices which did not comply with Community legislation by reason of objective, significant uncertainty regarding the implications of Community provisions, to which the conduct of other member states or the Commission may even have contributed (see Grzelczyk's case (para 53)).
- h 70. In the present case, it suffices to state that the information provided by the United Kingdom, German and Austrian governments is not capable of supporting their argument that this judgment might, if its effects were not limited in time, entail significant financial consequences for the member states. The figures referred to by those governments in fact relate also to cases which are not similar to that at issue in the main proceedings.
- i

71. Consequently, the answer to question (3) must be that there is no need to limit the temporal effects of the present judgment. a

COSTS

72. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable. b

On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Grand Chamber) rules as follows:

(1) Assistance, whether in the form of subsidised loans or of grants, provided to students lawfully resident in the host member state to cover their maintenance costs falls within the scope of application of the EC Treaty for the purposes of the prohibition of discrimination laid down in the first paragraph of art 12 EC (formerly art 6 of the EC Treaty). c

(2) The first paragraph of art 12 EC must be interpreted as precluding national legislation which grants students the right to assistance covering their maintenance costs only if they are settled in the host member state, while precluding a national of another member state from obtaining the status of settled person as a student even if that national is lawfully resident and has received a substantial part of his secondary education in the host member state and has consequently established a genuine link with the society of that state. d

(3) There is no need to limit the temporal effects of the present judgment.

a Peak Holding AB v Axolin-Elinor AB
(Case C-16/03)

b COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (GRAND CHAMBER) JUDGES SKOURIS (PRESIDENT), JANN, TIMMERMANS, ROSAS AND SILVA DE LAPUERTA (PRESIDENTS OF CHAMBERS), GULMANN (RAPPORTEUR), PUISSOCHET, SCHINTGEN AND CUNHA RODRIGUES
ADVOCATE GENERAL STIX-HACKL
24 MARCH, 27 MAY, 30 NOVEMBER 2004

c European Community – Trade marks – Exhaustion of right conferred by trade mark – Putting on the market of goods by proprietor of trade mark – Interpretation of directive – First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104, arts 5, 7(1).

d The applicant, a company in a Danish group of companies, was the proprietor of the trade mark 'PEAK PERFORMANCE'. The right to use that trade mark was granted to PPP, an associated company, which produced and sold clothing and accessories under that trade mark in Sweden and other countries. At the material time, the respondent company, a company governed by Swedish law, carried out in shops in Sweden direct sales of clothing and other items, largely

e trade-marked goods which were parallel imports or re-imports or were obtained outside the normal distribution channels of the proprietor of the trade mark concerned. In 2000, the respondent marketed a consignment of approximately 25,000 garments under the 'PEAK PERFORMANCE' trade mark, after placing advertisements in the press offering the sale of those articles at half-price. Those articles had been manufactured outside the European

f Economic Area (EEA) on behalf of PPP and had been imported into the EEA in order to be sold there. According to the respondent, the garments offered for sale from 1996 to 1998 had been offered in shops belonging to independent resellers, while according to the applicant, they had been offered in PPP's shops. In late 1999, all the garments in the consignment formed part of those

g offered for sale to final consumers in a store in Denmark supplied by a sister company of PPP. The consignment thus consisted of goods which had remained unsold after the sales. PPP sold that consignment to an undertaking established in France. According to the applicant, the contract concluded on that occasion provided that the consignment was not to be resold in European countries (other than Russia and Slovenia), with the exception of 5% of the

h total quantity, which could be sold in France. The respondent contested the existence of such a restriction, and submitted that, in any event, it had no knowledge of it when it purchased the consignment. It was common ground that the consignment had not left the EEA from the time when it left PPP's warehouses in Denmark until it was delivered to the respondent in Sweden. The applicant, claiming that the conditions of marketing chosen by the

i respondent, in particular its advertisements, infringed its trade mark rights, brought an action in the district court. It asked the court to order that the respondent pay damages, that it be prohibited from marketing and selling the clothing and other articles from the consignment in question, and that those goods be destroyed. The respondent contended that those claims should be dismissed, as the goods at issue had been put on the market in the EEA by the applicant, so that it was not entitled to prohibit the use of the trade mark on the sale of the goods. The district court dismissed the application, taking the view that the goods had in fact been marketed by reason of being made available to consumers in the Danish store and that the rights conferred by the trade mark could not be restored after that had occurred. The applicant appealed against that decision. Since it considered that the outcome of the dispute depended on the interpretation of the expression 'put on the market' in art 7(1)<sup>a</sup> of First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks), the court stayed the proceedings and referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) the questions, inter alia: (i) whether goods were to be regarded as having been put on the market by virtue of the fact that the proprietor of the trade mark: (a) had imported them into the common market and paid import duty on them, with the intention that they be sold there; or (b) had offered them for sale in the trade mark proprietor's own shops or those of a related company within the common market but a sale of the goods had not taken place; and (ii) whether goods were to be regarded as having been put on the market by virtue of the fact that they had been sold by the trade mark proprietor to another company in the internal market, if, upon the sale, the trade mark proprietor imposed a restriction on the buyer under which he was not entitled to resell the goods in the common market.

Held – (1) Articles 5b and 7 of the directive effected a complete harmonisation of the rules relating to the rights conferred by a trade mark and accordingly defined the rights of proprietors of trade marks in the Community. The expression 'put on the market' in the EEA used in art 7(1) of the directive constituted a decisive factor in the extinction of the exclusive right of the proprietor of a trade mark laid down in art 5 of that directive. The directive was intended to ensure that the proprietor had the exclusive right to use the trade mark for the purpose of putting the goods bearing it on the market for the first time. By specifying that the placing of goods on the market outside the EEA did not exhaust the proprietor's right to oppose the importation of those goods without his consent, the Community legislature thus allowed the proprietor of the trade mark to control the initial marketing in the EEA of goods bearing the mark. Article 7(1) of the directive was intended to make possible the further marketing of an individual item of a product bearing a trade mark without the proprietor of the trade mark being able to oppose that. For a trade mark to be able to fulfil its essential role in the system of undistorted competition which the EC Treaty sought to establish, it had to offer a guarantee that all the goods or services bearing it had been manufactured or supplied under the control of a single undertaking which was responsible for their quality. In the instant case, it had not been disputed that, where it sold goods bearing its mark to a third party in the EEA, the proprietor put those goods on the market within the meaning of art 7(1) of the directive. A sale which allowed the proprietor to realise the economic value of his trade mark exhausted the exclusive rights conferred by the directive, more particularly the right to prohibit the acquiring third party from reselling the goods. On the other hand, where the proprietor imported its goods with a view to selling them in the EEA or offered them for sale in the EEA, it did not put

<sup>a</sup> Article 7(1) of the directive is set out at judgment para 4, below

- a them on the market within the meaning of art 7(1) of the directive. Such acts did not transfer to third parties the right to dispose of the goods bearing the trade mark. They did not allow the proprietor to realise the economic value of the trade mark. Even after such acts, the proprietor retained its interest in maintaining complete control over the goods bearing its trade mark, in order
- b in particular to ensure their quality. Moreover, art 5(3)(b) of the directive, relating to the content of the proprietor's exclusive rights, distinguished, inter alia, between offering goods, putting them on the market, stocking them for those purposes and importing them. The wording of that provision therefore also confirmed that importing the goods or offering them for sale in the EEA could not be equated to putting them on the market there. The answer to the
- c first question had therefore to be that art 7(1) of the directive had to be interpreted as meaning that goods bearing a trade mark could not be regarded as having been put on the market in the EEA where the proprietor of the trade mark had imported them into the EEA with a view to selling them there or where he had offered them for sale to consumers in the EEA, in his own shops or those of an associated company, without actually selling them (see judgment
- d paras 30–44, below).

- (2) Article 7(1) of the directive made Community exhaustion subject either to a putting on the market in the EEA by the proprietor of the trade mark itself or to a putting on the market in the EEA by a third party but with the proprietor's consent. It followed from the answer to the first question that, in circumstances such as those in the instant case, putting on the market in the
- e EEA by the proprietor presupposed a sale of the goods by him in the EEA. In the event of such a sale, art 7(1) of the directive did not make exhaustion of the rights conferred by the trade mark subject in addition to the proprietor's consent to a further marketing of the goods in the EEA. Exhaustion occurred solely by virtue of the putting on the market in the EEA by the proprietor. Any stipulation, in the act of sale effecting the first putting on the market in the
- f EEA, of territorial restrictions on the right to resell the goods concerned only the relations between the parties to that act. It could not preclude the exhaustion provided for by the directive. The answer to the second question had therefore to be that, in circumstances such as those in the instant case, the stipulation, in a contract for sale concluded between the proprietor of a trade
- g mark and an operator established in the EEA, of a prohibition on reselling in the EEA did not mean that there was no putting on the market in the EEA within the meaning of art 7(1) of the directive and thus did not preclude the exhaustion of the proprietor's exclusive rights in the event of resale in the EEA in breach of the prohibition (see judgment paras 50–56, below).

h Notes

For the statutory exhaustion of rights where goods are marketed within the European Economic Area, see 48 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn 2000 reissue) para 98.

Cases cited

- i Administration des Douanes et Droits Indirects v Rioglass SA Case C-115/02 [2004] ETMR 38, ECJ.
- Arsenal Football Club plc v Reed* Case C-206/01 [2003] All ER (EC) 1, [2003] Ch 454, [2003] 3 WLR 450, [2002] ECR I-10273, ECJ.
- Bayerische Motorenwerke AG (BMW) v Deenik* Case C-63/97 [1999] All ER (EC) 235, [1999] ECR I-905, ECJ.

- Björnekulla Fruktindustrier AB v Procordia Food AB* Case C-371/02 [2005] IP & T 112, ECJ. a
- Bristol-Myers Squibb v Paranova A/S* Joined cases C-427/93, C-429/93 and C-436/93 (1996) 34 BMLR 59, [2003] Ch 75, [2002] 3 WLR 1746, [1996] ECR I-3457, ECJ.
- Centrafarm BV v Winthrop BV* Case 16/74 [1974] ECR 1183, ECJ.
- IHT Internationale Heiztechnik GmbH v Ideal-Standard GmbH* Case C-9/93 [1994] ECR I-2789, ECJ. b
- Philips Electronics NV v Remington Consumer Products Ltd* Case C-299/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 634, [2003] Ch 159, [2003] 2 WLR 294, [2002] ECR I-5475, ECJ.
- Sebago Inc v GB-Unic SA* Case C-173/98 [1999] All ER (EC) 575, [2000] Ch 558, [2000] 2 WLR 1341, [1999] ECR I-4103, ECJ.
- Silhouette International Schmied GmbH & Co KG v Hartlauer Handelsgesellschaft mbH* Case C-355/96 [1998] All ER (EC) 769, [1999] Ch 77, [1998] 3 WLR 1218, [1998] ECR I-4799, ECJ. c
- Van Doren + Q. GmbH v Lifestyle sports + sportswear Handelsgesellschaft mbH* Case C-244/00 [2004] All ER (EC) 912, [2003] ECR I-3051, ECJ.
- Zino Davidoff SA v A & G Imports Ltd* [1999] 3 All ER 711, [2000] Ch 127, [1999] 3 WLR 849. d
- Zino Davidoff SA v A & G Imports Ltd, Levi Strauss & Co v Tesco Stores Ltd, Levi Strauss & Co v Costco Wholesale UK Ltd* Joined cases C-414–416/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 55, [2002] Ch 109, [2002] 2 WLR 321, [2001] ECR I-8691, ECJ.

Reference e

The Hovrätt över Skåne och Blekinge (Sweden) referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) questions on the interpretation of First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks) as amended by the Agreement on the European Economic Area of 2 May 1992 (OJ 1994 L1 p 3) (the directive), and in particular art 7(1) thereof. The reference was made in the course of proceedings between Peak Holding AB (Peak Holding) and Axolin-Elinor AB (Axolin-Elinor), formerly Handelskompaniet Factory Outlet i Löddeköpinge AB (Factory Outlet) at the material time, concerning the manner in which Factory Outlet marketed a consignment of clothing bearing the Peak Performance trade mark, of which Peak Holding is the proprietor. Observations were submitted on behalf of: Peak Holding, by G Gozzo, Advokat; Axolin-Elinor, by K Azelius, Advokat, and M Palm, jur kand; the Swedish government, by K Wistrand and A Kruse, acting as agents; the Commission of the European Communities, by N B Rasmussen and K Simonsson, acting as agents. The language of the case was Swedish. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General. f

g

h

27 May 2004. The Advocate General (C Stix-Hackl) delivered the following opinion<sup>1</sup>.

I—INTRODUCTION

1. In the present case, the Court of Justice of the European Communities is once again called upon to interpret art 7(1) of First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104<sup>2</sup> (hereinafter Directive 89/104) in relation to the principle of the EEA-wide exhaustion of the rights conferred by a trade mark. i

<sup>1</sup> Original language: German.

<sup>2</sup> To approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks (OJ 1989 L40 p 1).

a 2. In the main proceedings, marked goods were manufactured outside the EEA and imported into the EEA by the trade mark proprietor, or in any event by companies associated with the proprietor. Subsequent sales of those goods were made partly by the associated companies and partly by third parties, and it is not disputed that the sales were made within the EEA. The trade mark proprietor having brought proceedings for infringement of the mark with a b view to exercising control over those sales within the EEA, the national court raised the question whether, and if so from what time, the rights of the proprietor are or were to be treated as exhausted.

c 3. Against that background, the national court is essentially asking whether the mere importation of the marked goods into the EEA is to be regarded as the putting onto the market which gives rise to exhaustion, or whether this should instead be treated as occurring as a result of later acts of the trade mark proprietor.

II—LEGAL FRAMEWORK

4. Article 5 of Directive 89/104 provides in extract:

d 'Rights conferred by a trade mark'
1. The registered trade mark shall confer on the proprietor exclusive rights therein. The proprietor shall be entitled to prevent all third parties not having his consent from using in the course of trade:
e (a) any sign which is identical with the trade mark in relation to goods or services which are identical with those for which the trade mark is registered ...
3. The following, inter alia, may be prohibited under paragraphs 1 and 2 ...
f (b) offering the goods, or putting them on the market or stocking them for these purposes under that sign, or offering or supplying services thereunder;
(c) importing or exporting the goods under the sign ...'

5. Article 7 of the directive is headed 'Exhaustion of the rights conferred by a trade mark'. Article 7(1) states:

g 'The trade mark shall not entitle the proprietor to prohibit its use in relation to goods which have been put on the market in the Community under that trade mark by the proprietor or with his consent.'

h 6. Under art 65(2) in conjunction with para 4 of Annex XVII to the Agreement on the European Economic Area of 2 May 1992 (OJ 1994 L1 p 3), art 7(1) of the directive was amended for the purposes of the Agreement by substituting the words 'in a Contracting State' for the expression 'in the Community'.

III—THE FACTS, THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTIONS REFERRED

i 7. Peak Holding AB (hereinafter Peak Holding) is the owner of a number of trade marks registered in Sweden or in the Community. The right to use the trade marks was transferred to a related company Peak Performance Production AB (hereinafter Peak Production), which produces and sells garments and accessories under those trade marks in Sweden and abroad.

8. In September 2000, Handelskompaniet Factory Outlet i Löddeköpinge AB, the predecessor of Axolin-Elinor AB (hereinafter Axolin-Elinor), offered a consignment of approximately 25,000 garments with Peak Holding's trade mark for sale to consumers in its stores, and advertised the offer in newspapers. The garments in the consignment were produced outside Europe on Peak Production's behalf<sup>3</sup>. They were imported into Europe for the purposes of sale and in 1996–1998 were included in Peak Production's standard range.

9. It is common ground between the parties to the main proceedings that 70% of those garments were displayed for sale to consumers in the stores during that period. While Axolin-Elinor claimed that those garments were displayed for sale in independent stores, Peak Holding submitted that the sales had been made in Peak Production's own stores.

10. In November and December 1999, all the garments in the consignment in question were available for sale to consumers in Copenhagen in Base Camp, the store supplied by Peak Production's sister company, Carli Gry Denmark A/S. Peak Production then sold the remainder of the garments to the French company COPAD International. Peak Production claims that it was a condition of the sale that the consignment should not be resold in countries in Europe other than Slovenia and Russia, except that 5% of the total quantity could be sold in France.

11. Axolin-Elinor expressly denies that any such restriction was agreed upon, and contends instead that it acquired the consignment from the Swedish company Truefit Sweden AB.

12. The parties do not dispute that the consignment in question did not leave the EEA from the time when it left Peak Production's warehouse in Denmark until it was delivered to Axolin-Elinor.

13. Asserting that the marketing that Axolin-Elinor had carried out infringed Peak Holding's trade mark right, Peak Holding brought an action in October 2000 before the Lunds tingsrätt (Lund District Court). The tingsrätt dismissed the action, holding that the goods had been put on the market by virtue of the fact that they had been offered for sale to consumers in the Base Camp store and that the trade mark right could not be restored after that event. Peak Holding appealed against the judgment of the tingsrätt to the Hovrätt över Skåne och Blekinge (Court of Appeal for Skåne och Blekinge).

14. As that court was of the opinion that an interpretation of art 7(1) of Directive 89/104 was necessary for a resolution of the dispute, it decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following questions for a preliminary ruling:

(1) Are goods to be regarded as having been put on the market by virtue of the fact that the proprietor of the trade mark:

(a) has imported them into the common market and paid import duty on them, with the intention that they be sold there?

(b) has offered them for sale in the trade mark proprietor's own shops or those of a related company within the common market but a sale of the goods has not taken place?

(2) If goods have been put on the market under one of the above alternatives and exhaustion of the trade mark rights thereby occurs without there having been a sale of the goods, can a trade mark proprietor interrupt exhaustion by returning the goods to a warehouse?

(3) Are goods to be regarded as having been put on the market by virtue of the fact that they have been sold by the trade mark proprietor to a another company in the internal market, if, upon the sale, the trade mark proprietor imposed a restriction on the buyer under which he was not entitled to resell the goods in the common market?

<sup>3</sup> It is not possible to establish with certainty from the order for reference whether the word 'Europe' refers only to EEA contracting states. It is assumed for the purposes of this opinion that the consignment in question was manufactured outside the EEA.

(4) Is the answer to question (3) affected if the trade mark proprietor, upon selling the consignment to which the goods belonged, gave the buyer permission to resell a small part of the goods in the common market but did not specify the individual goods to which that permission applied?

b

IV—LEGAL ANALYSIS

15. The first question asks in particular at what precise time goods bearing a trade mark are to be regarded as having been 'put on the market'. The second question appears to be supplementary to the first in that it applies if goods are to be regarded as having been put on the market as a result of the acts referred to by the national court in the first question. As the first two questions are closely connected, I should like to consider them together.

c

16. The third and fourth questions referred concern the relationship between the criterion of putting goods on the market and that of the consent provided for in art 7(1), with the fourth question merely addressing a particular form of that, possibly decisive, consent. Both questions should therefore be considered together.

d

A—The first and second questions

17. The first and second questions essentially require that a definition of the concept of putting on the market be provided that will enable it to be determined at what time goods bearing a trade mark are to be treated as if they had been put on the market in the EEA by the trade mark proprietor himself. That point is of great practical importance. On its solution will depend in particular the analysis under trade mark law of intra-group transactions<sup>4</sup> and of ancillary transactions<sup>5</sup>.

e

18. It should be noted at the outset that the rights conferred by a trade mark are stated in art 5 of Directive 89/104 to be exclusive. Article 5(3) lists the rights of the trade mark proprietor in detail. Under art 5(3)(b), those rights include the right to prohibit offering goods or putting them on the market under that sign or stocking them for those purposes. According to settled Community case law, the fundamental rights of the proprietor include the right to control the place and time of the putting of goods on the market in the EEA of goods bearing the mark<sup>6</sup>.

f

g

h 4 Is, for example, the exclusive right of the trade mark proprietor to be treated as exhausted where he has disposed of goods bearing the mark to a related company?

5 Is, for example, the exclusive right of the trade mark proprietor to be treated as exhausted where he has delivered goods bearing the mark to a forwarding agent?

6 And indeed, because of the principle of EEA-wide exhaustion, even if the goods were first put on the market by the trade mark proprietor outside the EEA—see Fezer Markenrecht (3rd edn, 2001) section 24 Markengesetz, point 93. For a critical analysis, see Laddie J ([1999] 3 All ER 711, [2000] Ch 127), reference for a preliminary ruling in Zino Davidoff SA v A & G Imports Ltd, Levi Strauss & Co v Tesco Stores Ltd, Levi Strauss & Co v Costco Wholesale UK Ltd Joined cases C-414–416/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 55, [2001] ECR I-8691 (extracts of which are published in IIC Vol 30 No 5/1999, p 567) (para 36): 'In my view this illustrates how [Silhouette International Schmied GmbH & Co KG v Hartlauer Handelsgesellschaft mbH Case C-355/96 [1998] All ER (EC) 769, [1998] ECR I-4799] has bestowed on a trade mark owner a parasitic right to interfere with the distribution of goods which bears little or no relationship to the proper function of the trade mark right. It is difficult to believe that a properly informed legislature intended such a result, even if it is the proper construction of art 7(1) of the directive.'

i

19. The principle of Community-wide exhaustion embodied in art 7(1) of Directive 89/104 represents a balancing of interests between the free movement of goods on the one hand and the exercise of the rights conferred by a trade mark on the other. Without that principle, the proprietor would have the right to prevent goods bearing the mark being put onto the market in a particular member state where he himself or a third party with his consent had put the same goods on the market in another member state. That would materially affect the functioning of the internal market. In the interests of a properly functioning internal market, the principle of Community-wide exhaustion, now contained in art 7(1) of Directive 89/104, thus enables the principle of the territorial scope of the protection afforded by national trade marks to be overcome<sup>7</sup>. Because a balancing of interests is achieved, the trade mark proprietor is given the right to decide when the goods are put on the market in the EEA for the first time<sup>8</sup>, but is denied any trade mark control over the subsequent distribution of the goods.

20. A particular feature of the (partial) harmonisation of national trade mark laws under Directive 89/104 is that the principle of the Community-wide exhaustion of rights, which was originally developed in the context of the internal market, has also acquired importance for trade with non-member states<sup>9</sup>. The Court of Justice has made it clear in that regard that the putting of goods on the market outside the EEA does not exhaust the trade mark proprietor's right to oppose the importation of those goods without his consent and has concluded from that that 'the Community legislature has allowed the proprietor of the trade mark to control the initial marketing in the EEA of goods bearing the mark'<sup>10</sup> without, however, examining the spirit and purpose of the principle of exhaustion beyond the—irrelevant in the context—considerations of the proper functioning of the internal market<sup>11</sup>.

21. It should lastly be noted at the outset that a strengthening of the rights of the trade mark proprietor, for example by deferring the time of the act which is deemed to amount to exhaustion, would in principle create new opportunities for restricting the free movement of goods within the EEA.

22. The answer to the first two questions relating to the criterion of putting on the market under art 7(1) of Directive 89/104 requires that that provision be interpreted in accordance with the customary methods of interpretation. Those methods require that the suggested meanings proposed by the national court in the first question should be considered.

<sup>7</sup> With regard to the role of the exhaustion principle in the balancing of interests, see also my opinion in the Zino Davidoff case (para 80 et seq).

<sup>8</sup> That point was expressly made in the judgment in the Zino Davidoff case, cited in footnote 7, above (para 33) and the case law cited there.

<sup>9</sup> See also my opinion in the Zino Davidoff case, cited in footnote 7, above (paras 78, 84) and the observations made in footnote 6, above.

<sup>10</sup> See the judgment in the Zino Davidoff case, cited in footnote 7, above (para 33). See also in that regard the judgment in Sebago Inc v GB-Unic SA Case C-173/98 [1999] All ER (EC) 575, [1999] ECR I-4103 (para 21).

<sup>11</sup> See also Thomas Hays in Parallel Importation under European Union Law (2004) paras 7.55, 10.02 et seq and 10.11 et seq.

a Literal interpretation of art 7(1) of Directive 89/104

23. Notwithstanding any differences that there may be in the different language versions of art 7(1) of Directive 89/104<sup>12</sup>, the Swedish government rightly points out that, if one takes everyday language as a basis, the words used in the provision would mean that an act of the trade mark proprietor that is directed towards the market is necessary in any event if the criterion of putting on the market is to be regarded as satisfied. That is also confirmed by a historical consideration. In the leading case of Centrafarm BV v Winthrop BV<sup>13</sup>, the court stated:

c 'Such an obstacle [to the free movement of goods] is not justified when the product has been put onto the market in a legal manner in the Member State from which it has been imported, by the trade mark proprietor himself or with his consent, so that there can be no question of abuse or infringement of the trade mark.' (My emphasis.)

d 24. It follows from the importance of the direction of the trade mark proprietor's act, that is to say towards the market, coupled with the exhaustion of rights conferred by the mark under art 7(1) of Directive 89/104, that the wording of that provision, of itself, means that internal transactions, such as the transfer of goods bearing the mark to a retail subsidiary, or preparatory acts, such as the importation by the proprietor of goods from non-member countries which have been manufactured there on his behalf, cannot be considered to constitute the putting on the market of the goods bearing the mark.

e 25. As regards goods bearing the mark manufactured outside the EEA, it may also be observed that the trade mark proprietor need not necessarily, on their importation into the EEA, have yet decided how they are to be sold for the first time in the EEA. If the mere importation of and customs clearance on the initiative of the trade mark proprietor of goods bearing a trade mark were to be sufficient to exhaust the rights conferred by the mark, the proprietor would, in the final analysis, have no control over the first sale of the goods bearing the mark in the EEA.

f 26. If one therefore treats the mere importation into the EEA as being irrelevant to the question when goods are put on the market, the point remains open whether the offering of goods in the EEA amounts to their being put on the market, or whether it is instead necessary that they be sold, or at least that power to dispose of them is transferred under an arrangement that is more than a provisional one, for them to be treated as having been put on the market.

g 27. It hardly seems possible to resolve this question on the basis of a literal interpretation of art 7(1) of Directive 89/104, as both the offering and sale of the marked goods are acts which are 'directed towards the market'. The best that could be stated—as, for example, the Swedish government has observed—in the context of a literal interpretation is that to treat the relevant point as being the sale of the goods is not convincing, inasmuch as the goods are in fact taken off the market precisely because they are sold. Axolin-Elinor

i 12 While the German version uses the term 'Inverkehrbringen' (putting into trade or circulation), the Dutch ('in de handel zijn gebracht'), the French ('mis dans le commerce'), the Italian ('immessi in commercio') and the Spanish and the similarly-worded Portuguese versions ('comercializado' and 'comercializados') refer to sales made in course of trade, whereas the Danish ('markedsført'), English ('put on the market') and Swedish ('marknaden') versions refer specifically to the market.

13 Case 16/74 [1974] ECR 1183 (para 10).

adopts a similar approach when it contends that the offering of goods in a shop clearly indicates that they are on the market. a

Systematic interpretation of art 7(1) of Directive 89/104

28. From a systematic point of view, it is necessary to give primary consideration to the relationship between arts 5(3) and 7(1) of Directive 89/104. Article 5(3)(b) provides that the trade mark proprietor may, inter alia, prohibit 'offering the goods, or putting them on the market or stocking them for these purposes under that sign ...' Those words suggest that a distinction is to be drawn between the mere offering of goods for sale and their being put on the market. b

29. It is however open to question whether putting on the market under that provision is the same as the identical expression in art 7(1). The fact that the same words are used and that both provisions distinguish between acts directed towards the market and those which are purely internal in character support that approach<sup>14</sup>. The fact that the provisions serve different purposes argues against such a uniform interpretation; while art 5 contains detailed provisions governing the extent of the protection provided by the exclusive rights in the mark, art 7(1) contains a restriction on those exclusive rights<sup>15</sup>. c

30. A systematic interpretation of art 7(1) of Directive 89/104 accordingly fails to provide a clear answer. d

Teleological interpretation of art 7(1) of Directive 89/104

31. The starting point for a teleological interpretation of art 7(1) of Directive 89/104 is the balancing function of the principle of exhaustion of rights mentioned above<sup>16</sup>. Any interpretation must accordingly be discounted that would restrict the right of the trade mark proprietor to control the first putting on the market in the EEA of the goods bearing the mark. It should be noted at the same time that the limitations on the proprietor's rights under art 7(1) of Directive 89/104 not only serve the proper functioning of the internal market, but also assist legal certainty inasmuch as they prevent the proprietor having control over all subsequent sales, thereby enabling trade mark law to protect purchasers in good faith. e

32. It is also necessary in the context of a teleological interpretation to ensure that the proprietor may exercise his exclusive rights to the extent mentioned<sup>17</sup> and may benefit economically from them, without legal certainty being threatened thereby. f

33. It was stated above that those requirements would not be satisfied if the goods bearing the trade mark were to be treated as having been put on the market merely because of their being imported into the EEA<sup>18</sup>. g

34. Although both the Commission of the European Communities and the Swedish government accept that the opportunity to derive economic benefit from the mark is the determining factor, they draw different conclusions from the point. While the Commission is of the view that the economic benefit h

<sup>14</sup> See, in that regard, in relation to the German law transposing the directive, Ingerl and Rohnke Markengesetz (2nd edn, 2003) section 24, para 18.

<sup>15</sup> See in relation to the German law transposing the directive, Fezer Markenrecht, cited in footnote 6, para 7d and Ströbele and Hacker Markengesetz (7th edn, 2003) section 24, para 33 and the case law cited therein. i

<sup>16</sup> See para 19, above.

<sup>17</sup> See para 19, above.

<sup>18</sup> See para 24 et seq, above.

a referred to can only arise when the goods bearing the mark are sold, the Swedish government takes the view that it is sufficient that the trade mark proprietor be in a position to offer his goods to the public, as in such a case—irrespective of whether the goods are actually sold—he could in any event control the circumstances in which the first sale of the goods occurred.

b 35. The opinion of the Swedish government can certainly be supported from an economic perspective, which would equate putting on the market with marketing in the sense of introducing the goods to the market, and thus also interpret the completion of the sale of the goods as leaving the market. If the market is defined as a place where services are freely traded for consideration, in which the price is established by supply and demand, then it must be pointed out that the interpretation favoured by the Swedish government is by no means obligatory. Prices are established in the market through the interplay of supply and demand and are only finally set when goods are sold. There is thus something to be said in favour of the interpretation favoured by the Commission. Only that interpretation does justice to the concept of the market as a place in which services are freely traded for consideration<sup>19</sup>.

c 36. According to Axolin-Elinor, it can nevertheless not be disputed that goods offered in a shop have been put on the market. It is also the case that if the relevant point is treated as being the offer to final consumers, the principal function of the trade mark, that is to say the guarantee of origin, will be maintained.

d 37. There are many reasons why that approach is not convincing. Even if it must be accepted that an act directed towards the market is involved, the approach fails to give adequate consideration to the interests of the trade mark proprietor, as the protection of his investment in the mark cannot be realised in economic terms purely by offering goods bearing the mark for sale<sup>20</sup>.

e 38. Practical considerations are also against treating the offering of the goods as being the relevant point. Peak Holding argues in that regard that it is difficult to treat the offer for sale as being the relevant point, since, where goods are stored in warehouses, it is unclear which of them are subject to exhaustion. Reference should also be made in that context to the judgment in the Sebago case<sup>21</sup>, which states:

f '... the rights conferred by the trade mark are exhausted only in respect of the individual items of the product which have been put on the market with the proprietor's consent in the territory there defined. The proprietor may continue to prohibit the use of the mark in pursuance of the right conferred on him by the Directive in regard to individual items of that product which have been put on the market in that territory without his consent.'

g It follows from that judgment that in order to decide whether exhaustion has occurred, it must be established in any event which particular goods have been

19 See also, in another context, the opinion of Advocate General Léger in Björnekulla Fruktindustrier AB v Procordia Food AB Case C-371/02 [2005] IP & T 112 (para 40): 'The word marketplace implies the interface of supply and demand or an exchange, a transaction ...'

i 20 It should be noted in that context that while, in its judgment in Arsenal Football Club plc v Reed Case C-206/01 [2003] All ER (EC) 1, [2002] ECR I-10273 the court confirmed the traditional function of the mark as an indicator of the origin of the goods, at the same time, following the line of reasoning of Advocate General Ruiz-Jarabo Colomer (see the opinion in the Arsenal case (para 46)), it emphasised its growing importance as a vehicle for investment and publicity. Seen from that point of view, the approach of Axolin-Elinor appears unduly restrictive.

21 Cited in footnote 10, above (para 19).

put on the market—whether by the proprietor himself or with his consent. If it were sufficient for goods to be offered for them to be put on the market, it would be unclear how to apply the necessary tests with adequate legal certainty to goods stored in warehouses which may possibly not be intended for sale.

39. It should also be pointed out that to treat the time of the offer as being the relevant point would make it impossible to prevent parallel imports from non-member countries where the goods were in the EEA first of all and failed to find a buyer there. In Silhouette International Schmied GmbH & Co KG v Hartlauer Handelgesellschaft mbH<sup>22</sup>, where those facts arose, the court, as is well known, considered the permissibility of a national rule providing for the international exhaustion of trade mark rights, which in turn logically supposes that the rights conferred by a trade mark were not to be treated as already exhausted when goods are offered in a member state.

40. If one therefore treats—from an economic point of view—the disposal of the goods bearing the mark as being the time which is relevant to their being put on the market<sup>23</sup>, it must finally be determined from a legal point of view whether a change of ownership is required. The order for reference suggests this, as the first question refers to there being no ‘sale’ of the goods. The Commission has also argued—particularly at the hearing—in favour of ‘sale’ as being the relevant factor.

41. It should be pointed out in that regard that a change of ownership also leaves open the question whether the trade mark proprietor can obtain an economic benefit from the mark. In other words, the change of ownership of the marked goods must be irrelevant if the necessary economic approach is to be followed<sup>24</sup>.

42. If a change of ownership is irrelevant, it becomes necessary to treat the transfer of the actual right of disposal of the goods as being the relevant point. Goods are accordingly put on the market when a third party, whose decisions in relation to the sale of the goods cannot be ascribed to the trade mark proprietor, for example because that third party is objectively independent<sup>25</sup>, has acquired the actual right of disposal of the goods.

43. I therefore propose that the answer to the first question should be that goods bearing a trade mark are not put on the market merely by reason of their importation into the EEA and customs clearance, nor by reason of their being offered for sale in shops belonging to the trade mark proprietor or undertakings associated with him. Goods are instead put on the market in the EEA within the meaning of art 7(1) of Directive 89/104, with the effect that

<sup>22</sup> Case C-355/96 [1998] All ER (EC) 769, [1998] ECR I-4799.

<sup>23</sup> Which could also be inferred from, for example, the judgment in Administration des Douanes et Droits Indirects v Rioglass SA Case C-115/02 [2004] ETMR 38 (para 28), which states that a transit operation (which consists in transporting goods lawfully manufactured in a member state to a non-member country by passing through one or more member states) ‘by definition does not constitute a placing on the market [in the sense of putting a product on the market—see also para 25 of that judgment]’.

<sup>24</sup> When goods bearing a trade mark are sold under reservation of title, the transfer of the right of disposal precedes a change in legal ownership. To that extent, the reservation of title has no effect on the exhaustion provided for under trade mark law. Where goods are transferred by way of security, it is doubtful in any event whether an act directed towards the market is involved, as the assignor remains in possession of the goods in question. See to that effect Mulch Der Tatbestand der markenrechtlichen Erschöpfung (2001) p 20.

<sup>25</sup> This does not as a rule apply to transactions between related companies or to transactions within a distribution system.

a the rights are exhausted, when an independent third party has acquired the right of disposal of the goods bearing the mark.

44. In the light of that proposed answer, it is no longer necessary to consider the second question.

b B—The third and fourth questions

45. The last two questions essentially ask whether and to what extent a contractual expression of will by the trade mark proprietor with regard to the sale of the goods bearing the mark is relevant to the criterion of consent under art 7(1) of Directive 89/104.

c 46. Underlying that question is the notion that if a breach of that contractual expression of will can be proved there would be no consent within the meaning of art 7(1) of the directive, so that the question whether the marked goods had been put on the market in the EEA would no longer be relevant.

d 47. It is clear from the order for reference that the trade mark proprietor Peak Holding wished the great majority of the remaining items to be sold in non-member countries. Peak Holding inserted a provision to that effect in the contract with the French company COPAD. The third and fourth questions are clearly inspired by Peak Holding's argument that the breach of that provision imposing a territorial restriction on sales would amount to a failure of consent within the meaning of art 7(1) of Directive 89/104, thus precluding the exhaustion of the rights in the mark.

e 48. That approach misunderstands the legal nature of exhaustion as a restriction on the rights conferred by the mark which arises by operation of law, as the Swedish government rightly submits. Both semantically and from the point of view of its spirit and purpose, the concept of exhaustion requires that a distinction be made between putting on the market by the trade mark proprietor himself and putting on the market by a third party—but with the proprietor's consent<sup>26</sup>. The concept of consent in art 7(1) of Directive 89/104 represents a criterion of attributability which allows it to be established whether the putting on the market of goods in the EEA by a third party is to be attributed to the trade mark proprietor<sup>27</sup>.

f 49. Where the goods bearing the mark are put on the market in the EEA by the trade mark proprietor himself, exhaustion of rights arises by operation of law, irrespective of the contract between the proprietor and the purchaser. g Breach of any territorial restrictions on sale which the proprietor may have imposed on a purchaser of the goods in relation to their sale in the EEA may give rise to claims under the contract, but is irrelevant in principle under trade mark law.

h 50. A reference also to the judgment in the Zino Davidoff case<sup>28</sup> alters nothing in that analysis. There, the court held, inter alia, that 'a rule of national law which proceeded upon the mere silence of the trade mark proprietor would not recognise implied consent but rather deemed consent. This would not meet the need for consent positively expressed required by Community law'<sup>29</sup>. It can indeed be concluded from that that the consent of the trade mark

i
<sup>26</sup> See also my opinion cited in footnote 7, above (para 42).

<sup>27</sup> As long ago as its judgment in IHT Internationale Heiztechnik GmbH v Ideal-Standard GmbH Case C-9/93 [1994] ECR I-2789 (para 43), the court made it clear that 'the consent implicit in any assignment is not the consent required for application of the doctrine of exhaustion of rights'.

<sup>28</sup> Cited in footnote 7, above.

<sup>29</sup> See the Zino Davidoff case (para 58).

proprietor within the meaning of art 7(1) of Directive 89/104, that is to say the consent to the putting of the goods on the market in the EEA by a third party, cannot be inferred merely from the absence of territorial restrictions on sale in the contract between the trade mark proprietor and his purchaser. a

51. Whether, conversely, the insertion of a territorial restriction on sales in that contract excludes the consent of the trade mark proprietor within the meaning of art 7(1) of Directive 89/104 as a matter of principle, however, is only relevant in so far as exhaustion is to be deduced from that consent. That question arises where goods are reimported from non-member countries<sup>30</sup>. Such issues do not arise in the main proceedings, where the question is only at what time the marked goods were put on the market in the EEA by the trade mark proprietor himself. b

52. It is not necessary to consider whether the territorial restriction on sales in the contract between Peak Holding and COPAD is compatible with competition law, as that point is of no relevance in answering the third question. c

53. As regards the fourth question, suffice it to observe that if the presence of a territorial restriction on sales is of no relevance to the question whether or not exhaustion arises in a case such as that in the main proceedings<sup>31</sup>, the same must apply a fortiori where that provision is used in a particular form. d

54. The answer to the third and fourth questions should therefore be that where goods bearing the mark are sold to another undertaking within the EEA, it is irrelevant to the consideration of when exhaustion arises under art 7(1) of Directive 89/104 whether and to what extent the trade mark proprietor has imposed territorial restrictions on sale on the purchaser. e

V—COSTS

55. The costs incurred by the Swedish government and by the Commission, which have submitted observations to the court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the proceedings pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. f

VI—CONCLUSION

56. I therefore propose that the Court of Justice should answer the questions referred as follows: g

(1) Article 7(1) of First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks) is to be interpreted as meaning that goods bearing a trade mark are not put on the market merely by reason of their importation into the EEA and customs clearance, nor by reason of their being offered for sale in shops belonging to the trade mark proprietor or undertakings associated with him. Goods are instead put on the market in the EEA when an independent third party has acquired the right of disposal of the goods bearing a mark, for example as the result of a sale. h

---

<sup>30</sup> If the marked goods have not yet been put on the market in the EEA by the proprietor, but have none the less been imported by a third party into the EEA, for example by way of grey reimports, the question that arises in relation to a possible exhaustion of rights conferred by the mark is not whether the goods were put on the market in the EEA by the trade mark proprietor himself, but whether they were put on the market in the EEA by the third party with his consent. i

<sup>31</sup> See para 51, above.

- a (2) Where goods bearing a mark are sold to another undertaking within the EEA, it is irrelevant to the consideration of when exhaustion arises under art 7(1) of the directive whether and to what extent the trade mark proprietor has imposed territorial restrictions on sale on the purchaser.
- b 30 November 2004. The COURT OF JUSTICE (Grand Chamber) delivered the following judgment.
1. This reference for a preliminary ruling concerns the interpretation of art 7(1) of First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks) (OJ 1989 L40 p 1), as amended by the Agreement on the European Economic Area of 2 May 1992 (OJ 1994 L1 p 3) (the directive).
- c 2. The reference was made in the course of proceedings between Peak Holding AB (Peak Holding) and Axolin-Elinor AB (Axolin-Elinor), formerly Handelskompaniet Factory Outlet i Löddeköpinge AB (Factory Outlet) at the material time, concerning the manner in which Factory Outlet marketed a consignment of clothing bearing the Peak Performance trade mark, of which
- d Peak Holding is the proprietor.

LEGAL BACKGROUND

3. Article 5 of the directive, entitled 'Rights conferred by a trade mark', reads as follows:

- e '1. The registered trade mark shall confer on the proprietor exclusive rights therein. The proprietor shall be entitled to prevent all third parties not having his consent from using in the course of trade:
- (a) any sign which is identical with the trade mark in relation to goods or services which are identical with those for which the trade mark is registered ...
- f 3. The following, inter alia, may be prohibited under [para 1] ...
- (b) offering the goods, or putting them on the market or stocking them for these purposes under that sign, or offering or supplying services thereunder;
- (c) importing ... the goods under the sign ...'

- g 4. Article 7 of the directive, in its original version, entitled 'Exhaustion of the rights conferred by a trade mark', provided:

'1. The trade mark shall not entitle the proprietor to prohibit its use in relation to goods which have been put on the market in the Community under that trade mark by the proprietor or with his consent ...'

- h 5. In accordance with art 65(2) of the Agreement on the European Economic Area (the EEA) in conjunction with point 4 of Annex XVII to that Agreement, the original version of art 7(1) of Directive 89/104 was amended for the purposes of that Agreement, the expression 'in the Community' being replaced by 'in a Contracting Party'.

i

THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

6. Peak Holding, a company in the Danish group IC-Companys, is the proprietor inter alia of the trade mark Peak Performance. The right to use that trade mark was granted to Peak Performance Production AB (Peak Performance Production), a company associated with that group. That company produces and sells clothing and accessories under that trade mark in Sweden and other countries. a

7. At the material time Factory Outlet, a company governed by Swedish law, carried out in shops in Sweden direct sales of clothing and other items, largely trade-marked goods which were parallel imports or re-imports or were obtained outside the normal distribution channels of the proprietor of the trade mark concerned. b

8. In late 2000, Factory Outlet marketed, in particular, a consignment of approximately 25,000 garments under the Peak Performance trade mark, after placing advertisements in the press offering the sale of those articles at half-price. c

9. The articles came from the Peak Performance collections for the years 1996–1998. They had been manufactured outside the EEA on behalf of that company and had been imported into the EEA in order to be sold there.

10. According to Factory Outlet, the garments offered for sale from 1996 to 1998 had been offered in shops belonging to independent resellers, while, according to Peak Holding, they had been offered in Peak Performance Production's shops. d

11. In November and December 1999, all the garments in the consignment formed part of those offered for sale to final consumers in Copenhagen (Denmark) in the Base Camp store supplied by Carli Gry Danmark A/S, a sister company of Peak Performance Production. The consignment thus consisted of goods which had remained unsold after the sales. e

12. Peak Performance Production sold that consignment to COPAD International (COPAD), an undertaking established in France. According to Peak Holding, the contract concluded on that occasion provided that the consignment was not to be resold in European countries other than Russia and Slovenia, with the exception of 5% of the total quantity, which could be sold in France. Factory Outlet contested the existence of such a restriction, and submitted that, in any event, it had no knowledge of it when it purchased the consignment. f

13. Factory Outlet asserted that it had acquired the consignment from Truefit Sweden AB, a company governed by Swedish law.

14. It is common ground that the consignment did not leave the EEA from the time when it left Peak Performance Production's warehouses in Denmark until it was delivered to Factory Outlet in Sweden. g

15. Peak Holding, claiming that the conditions of marketing chosen by Factory Outlet, in particular its advertisements, infringed Peak Holding's trade mark rights, brought an action in the Lunds tingsrätt (Lund District Court) (Sweden) on 9 October 2000. It asked that court to order that Factory Outlet pay damages, that it be prohibited from marketing and selling the clothing and other articles from the consignment in question, and that those goods be destroyed. h

16. Factory Outlet contended that Peak Holding's claims should be dismissed. It submitted that the goods at issue had been put on the market in the EEA by Peak Holding, so that it was not entitled to prohibit the use of the trade mark on the sale of the goods. i

17. Factory Outlet submitted, first, that the goods had been put on the market by virtue of their import into the internal market by Peak Performance Production and of payment of the customs duties on them, with the intention of selling the goods in the Community. It submitted, second, that the goods

- a had been put on the market by virtue of having been offered for sale by independent resellers. It submitted, third, that they had been put on the market by virtue of having been marketed by Peak Performance Production in its own shops and in the Base Camp store and that, in those circumstances, they had been offered to consumers. It argued, fourth, that, in any event, the goods had been put on the market by virtue of having been sold to COPAD, regardless of whether they had been sold with or without a restriction on reselling in the internal market.

b 18. Peak Holding disputed that the goods had been put on the market by or with the consent of the proprietor of the trade mark. It argued that, even if the trade mark rights had been exhausted by reason of the goods having been offered for sale in the Base Camp store, that exhaustion had been interrupted and the trade mark rights restored after the goods had been returned to the warehouses.

c 19. The Lunds tingsrätt dismissed the application, taking the view that the goods had in fact been marketed by reason of being made available to consumers in the Base Camp store and that the rights conferred by the trade mark could not have been restored after that had occurred.

d 20. Peak Holding appealed to the referring court against the judgment of the Lunds tingsrätt.

e 21. Since it considered that the outcome of the dispute between Peak Holding and Axolin-Elinor depended on the interpretation of the expression 'put on the market' in art 7(1) of the directive, the Hovrätten över Skåne och Blekinge decided to stay the proceedings and refer the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

'(1) Are goods to be regarded as having been put on the market by virtue of the fact that the proprietor of the trade mark:

f (a) has imported them into the common market and paid import duty on them, with the intention that they be sold there?

(b) has offered them for sale in the trade mark proprietor's own shops or those of a related company within the common market but a sale of the goods has not taken place?

g (2) If goods have been put on the market under one of the above alternatives and exhaustion of the trade mark rights thereby occurs without there having been a sale of the goods, can a trade mark proprietor interrupt exhaustion by returning the goods to a warehouse?

h (3) Are goods to be regarded as having been put on the market by virtue of the fact that they have been sold by the trade mark proprietor to another company in the internal market, if, upon the sale, the trade mark proprietor imposed a restriction on the buyer under which he was not entitled to resell the goods in the common market?

i (4) Is the answer to question (3) affected if the trade mark proprietor, upon selling the consignment to which the goods belonged, gave the buyer permission to resell a small part of the goods in the common market but did not specify the individual goods to which that permission applied?

THE QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

Question 1

22. In the light of the circumstances of the main proceedings, the national court essentially asks, by its first question, whether art 7(1) of the directive must be interpreted as meaning that goods bearing a trade mark are regarded as having been put on the market in the EEA where the proprietor of the trade mark has imported them into the EEA with a view to selling them there or where he has offered them for sale to consumers in the EEA, in his own shops or those of an associated company, but without actually selling them. a

Observations submitted to the court

23. Peak Holding and the Commission of the European Communities submit that exhaustion of the rights conferred by the trade mark occurs only when the goods are sold in the EEA by or with the consent of the proprietor of the trade mark. The rights are not exhausted in the hypotheses referred to in the first question. b

24. Axolin-Elinor submits that exhaustion of the rights of the trade mark proprietor occurs by virtue of the mere fact of importation, customs clearance and warehousing of the goods in the EEA with a view to sale. In the alternative, it argues that the rights conferred by the trade mark are exhausted when the proprietor of the mark offers the goods for sale to consumers, even if the offer is not taken up. c

25. The Swedish government submits that the different language versions of the directive must be understood as requiring the proprietor of the trade mark to have taken a step directed towards the market for it to be possible for goods to be regarded as having been put on the market. d

26. Goods should not thus be regarded as put on the market in the EEA merely because they have been imported, cleared through customs, and then warehoused in the EEA by the proprietor, since none of those steps is directed towards the market. e

27. Exhaustion occurs at the latest when the proprietor of the trade mark or a person who has acquired the right to use the mark offers the goods for sale to consumers in the EEA.

28. Exhaustion does not occur, by contrast, when the proprietor of the trade mark offers his goods in the EEA to resellers, since an offer to sell frequently relates only to a certain quantity of the goods in question. In such a case it is not possible to identify the goods in relation to which exhaustion has occurred. Moreover, an offer which is not followed by a transfer cannot be regarded as a sufficiently definitive disposal on the part of the proprietor. f

29. Exhaustion occurs on an actual transfer to a reseller, provided that the transfer appears as a step directed towards the market. A transfer between companies within the same group should be regarded as an internal measure within the group which does not bring about exhaustion of the rights. g

Findings of the court

30. Articles 5 to 7 of the directive effect a complete harmonisation of the rules relating to the rights conferred by a trade mark and accordingly define the rights of proprietors of trade marks in the Community (see Silhouette International Schmied GmbH & Co KG v Hartlauer Handelgesellschaft mbH Case C-355/96 [1998] All ER (EC) 769, [1998] ECR I-4799 (paras 25, 29) and Zino Davidoff SA v A & G Imports Ltd, Levi Strauss & Co v Tesco Stores Ltd, Levi Strauss & Co v Costco Wholesale UK Ltd Joined cases C-414-416/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 55, [2001] ECR I-8691 (para 39)). h

31. The expression 'put on the market' in the EEA used in art 7(1) of the directive constitutes a decisive factor in the extinction of the exclusive right of the proprietor of the trade mark laid down in art 5 of that directive (see Van i a Doren + Q. GmbH v Lifestyle sports + sportswear Handelsgesellschaft mbH Case C-244/00 [2004] All ER (EC) 912, [2003] ECR I-3051 (para 34)).

32. It must therefore be given a uniform interpretation in the Community legal order (see, by analogy, the Zino Davidoff case (paras 41–43)).

b 33. The wording alone of art 7(1) of the directive does not make it possible to determine whether goods imported into the EEA or offered for sale in the EEA by the proprietor of the trade mark are to be regarded as having been ‘put on the market’ in the EEA within the meaning of that provision. The interpretation of the provision in question must therefore be sought with regard to the scheme and objectives of the directive.

c 34. Article 5 of the directive confers on the trade mark proprietor exclusive rights which entitle him inter alia to prevent any third party from importing goods bearing the mark, offering the goods, or putting them on the market or stocking them for these purposes. Article 7(1) contains an exception to that rule, in that it provides that the trade mark proprietor’s rights are exhausted where the goods have been put on the market in the EEA by him or with his consent (see the Zino Davidoff case (para 40) and the Van Doren case (para 33)).

d 35. The court has held that the directive is intended in particular to ensure that the proprietor has the exclusive right to use the trade mark for the purpose of putting the goods bearing it on the market for the first time (see, inter alia, Bristol-Myers Squibb v Paranova A/S Joined cases C-427/93, C-429/93 and C-436/93 (1996) 34 BMLR 59, [1996] ECR I-3457 (paras 31, 40, 44)).

e 36. It has also held that, by specifying that the placing of goods on the market outside the EEA does not exhaust the proprietor’s right to oppose the importation of those goods without his consent, the Community legislature thus allowed the proprietor of the trade mark to control the initial marketing in the EEA of goods bearing the mark (see Sebago Inc v GB-Unic SA Case C-173/98 [1999] All ER (EC) 575, [1999] ECR I-4103 (para 21), the Zino Davidoff case (para 33) and the Van Doren case (para 26)).

f 37. It has further stated that art 7(1) of the directive is intended to make possible the further marketing of an individual item of a product bearing a trade mark without the proprietor of the trade mark being able to oppose that (see Bayerische Motorenwerke AG (BMW) v Deenik Case C-63/97 [1999] All ER (EC) 235, [1999] ECR I-905 (para 57) and the Sebago case (para 20)).

g 38. It has held, finally, that for a trade mark to be able to fulfil its essential role in the system of undistorted competition which the EC Treaty seeks to establish, it must offer a guarantee that all the goods or services bearing it have been manufactured or supplied under the control of a single undertaking which is responsible for their quality (see, inter alia, Philips Electronics NV v Remington Consumer Products Ltd Case C-299/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 634, [2002] ECR I-5475 (para 30)).

h 39. In the present case, it is not disputed that, where he sells goods bearing his trade mark to a third party in the EEA, the proprietor puts those goods on the market within the meaning of art 7(1) of the directive.

i 40. A sale which allows the proprietor to realise the economic value of his trade mark exhausts the exclusive rights conferred by the directive, more particularly the right to prohibit the acquiring third party from reselling the goods.

41. On the other hand, where the proprietor imports his goods with a view to selling them in the EEA or offers them for sale in the EEA, he does not put them on the market within the meaning of art 7(1) of the directive.

42. Such acts do not transfer to third parties the right to dispose of the goods bearing the trade mark. They do not allow the proprietor to realise the economic value of the trade mark. Even after such acts, the proprietor retains his interest in maintaining complete control over the goods bearing his trade mark, in order in particular to ensure their quality. a

43. Moreover, it should be noted that art 5(3)(b) and (c) of the directive, relating to the content of the proprietor's exclusive rights, distinguishes inter alia between offering the goods, putting them on the market, stocking them for those purposes and importing them. The wording of that provision therefore also confirms that importing the goods or offering them for sale in the EEA cannot be equated to putting them on the market there. b

44. The answer to the first question must therefore be that art 7(1) of the directive must be interpreted as meaning that goods bearing a trade mark cannot be regarded as having been put on the market in the EEA where the proprietor of the trade mark has imported them into the EEA with a view to selling them there or where he has offered them for sale to consumers in the EEA, in his own shops or those of an associated company, without actually selling them. c
d

Question 2

45. The second question is asked only if the answer to the first question is in the affirmative.

46. There is thus no need to answer it. e

Question 3

47. By its third question, the national court essentially asks whether, in circumstances such as those of the main proceedings, the stipulation, in a contract of sale concluded between the proprietor of the trade mark and an operator established in the EEA, of a prohibition on reselling in the EEA means that there is no putting on the market in the EEA within the meaning of art 7(1) of the directive and thus precludes the exhaustion of the proprietor's exclusive rights in the event of resale in the EEA in breach of the prohibition. f

Observations submitted to the court

48. Peak Holding observes that the exhaustion provided for in art 7(1) of the directive presupposes a putting on the market by the proprietor himself or with his consent. Exhaustion thus requires the consent of the proprietor in either case. It does not therefore occur on a sale of the goods by the proprietor of the trade mark, if he stipulates that he retains his trade mark rights. In the event that that stipulation is not complied with, the goods have not been put on the market with the consent of the proprietor, so that exhaustion does not supervene. g
h

49. Axolin-Elinor, the Swedish government and the Commission submit that a stipulation such as that referred to in the third question does not prevent exhaustion, which takes place by operation of law. Such a stipulation cannot be relied on against third parties. Failure to comply with a prohibition on resale corresponds to a breach of contract, not an infringement of intellectual property rights. The legal effect of exhaustion as regards third parties is thus not left at the disposal of the contracting parties, whatever effects the agreement is supposed to have as regards the obligations. Any other interpretation would be contrary to the purpose of art 7(1) of the directive. i

a Findings of the court

50. Article 7(1) of the directive makes Community exhaustion subject either to a putting on the market in the EEA by the proprietor of the trade mark himself or to a putting on the market in the EEA by a third party but with the proprietor's consent.

b 51. It follows from the answer to the first question that, in circumstances such as those of the main proceedings, putting on the market in the EEA by the proprietor presupposes a sale of the goods by him in the EEA.

52. In the event of such a sale, art 7(1) of the directive does not make exhaustion of the rights conferred by the trade mark subject in addition to the proprietor's consent to further marketing of the goods in the EEA.

c 53. Exhaustion occurs solely by virtue of the putting on the market in the EEA by the proprietor.

54. Any stipulation, in the act of sale effecting the first putting on the market in the EEA, of territorial restrictions on the right to resell the goods concerns only the relations between the parties to that act.

55. It cannot preclude the exhaustion provided for by the directive.

d 56. The answer to the third question must therefore be that, in circumstances such as those of the main proceedings, the stipulation, in a contract of sale concluded between the proprietor of the trade mark and an operator established in the EEA, of a prohibition on reselling in the EEA does not mean that there is no putting on the market in the EEA within the meaning of art 7(1) of the directive and thus does not preclude the exhaustion of the proprietor's exclusive rights in the event of resale in the EEA in breach of the prohibition.

e

Question 4

f 57. The fourth question assumes that the answer to the third question is that the stipulation referred to in that question means that the goods have not been put on the market in the EEA in the event of resale in the EEA in breach of the territorial restriction agreed on.

58. There is therefore no need to answer it.

COSTS

g 59. The costs incurred by the Swedish government and by the Commission, which have submitted observations to the court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the proceedings pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

h On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Grand Chamber) rules as follows:

i (1) Article 7(1) of First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks), as amended by the Agreement on the European Economic Area of 2 May 1992, must be interpreted as meaning that goods bearing a trade mark cannot be regarded as having been put on the market in the European Economic Area (EEA) where the proprietor of the trade mark has imported them into the EEA with a view to selling them there or where he has offered them for sale to consumers in the EEA, in his own shops or those of an associated company, without actually selling them.

(2) In circumstances such as those of the main proceedings, the stipulation, in a contract of sale concluded between the proprietor of the trade mark and an operator established in the EEA, of a prohibition on reselling in the EEA a does not mean that there is no putting on the market in the EEA within the meaning of art 7(1) of Directive 89/104, as amended by the Agreement on the European Economic Area, and thus does not preclude the exhaustion of the proprietor's exclusive rights in the event of resale in the EEA in breach of the prohibition. b

Lindfors v Finland

(Case C-365/02)

COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (FIRST CHAMBER)

JUDGES JANN (PRESIDENT OF THE CHAMBER), ROSAS, VON BAHR, SILVA DE LAPUERTA AND LENAERTS (RAPPORTEUR)

ADVOCATE GENERAL STIX-HACKL

15 JANUARY, 4 MARCH, 15 JULY 2004

European Community – Freedom of movement – Persons – Restriction on freedom – Transfer of residence from one member state to another – Tax levied before registration or bringing into use of vehicle – Citizen of European Union bringing vehicle into use in one member state before transferring residence to another member state and importing vehicle to that member state – Whether tax levied on vehicle in second member state amounting to consumption tax and thus not to be levied – Whether tax capable of influencing decisions of citizens of Union to exercise right to freedom of movement – Council Directive (EEC) 83/183, art 1(1), (2) – Article 18 EC (formerly EC Treaty, art 8a).

In Finland, a person who imported a vehicle into national territory or who manufactured a vehicle therein was liable to pay a car tax (the autovero) before registering or permanently bringing that vehicle into use. The claimant in the main proceedings had moved permanently to Finland, importing with her a private vehicle, which she had brought into use in the Netherlands, and upon which the autovero was levied in Finland. She brought an action challenging the levying of that tax on the basis that it constituted a consumption tax prohibited by art 1(1)<sup>a</sup> of Council Directive (EEC) 83/183 (on tax exemptions applicable to permanent imports from a member state of the personal property of individuals)—which required member states to exempt personal property imported permanently from other member states by private individuals from turnover tax, excise duty and other consumption taxes which normally applied to such property. Dismissing her action, the national court held that, since the autovero was a tax connected with the registration or use in traffic of a vehicle in Finland, it was to be regarded as a specific tax connected with the use of property within the country for the purposes of art 1(2) of the directive—which exempted specific and/or periodical duties from the scope of the directive. On the claimant's appeal, the national appellate court decided to stay the proceedings and refer to the Court of Justice of the European Communities under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) a question for a preliminary ruling concerning whether a car tax such as the autovero fell within the ambit of art 1(1) or (2) of the directive. Although the national court had formally limited its question in that regard, the Court of Justice also examined the effect of the right to freedom of movement, enshrined in particular by art 18 EC<sup>b</sup> (formerly art 8a of the EC Treaty), in order to provide the national court with a full interpretation of Community law to assist in the adjudication on the case pending before it. a

<sup>a</sup> Article 1 of the directive is set out at judgment para 3, below

<sup>b</sup> Article 18 EC provides, so far as material: 'Every citizen of the Union shall have the right to move and reside freely within the territory of the Member States, subject to the limitations and conditions laid down in this Treaty and by the measures adopted to give it effect.'

Held – Where the residence of the owner of a vehicle was transferred from one member state to another, art 1 of the directive did not preclude the charging of a tax such as the autovero before the registration or bringing into use of the vehicle in the member state to which residence was transferred. b

However, having regard to the requirements deriving from art 18 EC, it was for the national court to ascertain whether the application of national law was capable of ensuring that the owner of the vehicle was not placed in a less favourable situation than that of citizens who resided permanently in the member state and, if necessary, whether such a difference in treatment was justified by objective considerations independent of the residence of the persons concerned and proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued by national law. The chargeable event for autovero was the use of a vehicle on Finnish territory, which was not necessarily connected with the act of importation. Therefore, such a tax did not fall within the scope of the tax exemption laid down by art 1(1) of the directive. Further, since autovero was payable as a result of the use of the vehicle in Finland, it was a specific tax connected with the use of the vehicle within the national territory, and, therefore, art 1(2) of the directive applied. However, autovero might have a negative influence on decisions of citizens of the European Union to exercise their right to freedom of movement as enshrined, in particular, by art 18 EC. In that regard, the EC Treaty offered no guarantee to a citizen of the Union that transferring his activities to a member state other than that in which he previously resided would be neutral as regards taxation. Furthermore, given the disparities in the tax legislation of the member states, such a transfer might be to the citizen's advantage in terms of indirect taxation or not, according to circumstance. Therefore, in principle, any disadvantage, by comparison with the situation in which that citizen carried on activities prior to that transfer, was not contrary to art 18 EC, provided that the legislation concerned did not place that citizen at a disadvantage as compared with those already subject to such a tax (see judgment paras 26–28, 31, 34, 36 below). c

D'Hoop v Office National de l'Emploi Case C-224/98 [2003] All ER (EC) 527 and Weigel v Finanzlandesdirektion für Vorarlberg Case C-387/01 [2004] 3 CMLR 931 considered. d

Notes

For the prohibition on discriminatory taxation, see 12(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 7. e

Cases cited

Consortio per la Tutela del Formaggio Gorgonzola v Käserei Champignon Hofmeister GmbH & Co KG Case C-87/97 [1999] ECR I-1301, ECJ. f

Cura Anlagen GmbH v Auto Service Leasing GmbH (ASL) Case C-451/99 [2002] ECR I-3193, ECJ.

D'Hoop v Office National de l'Emploi Case C-224/98 [2003] All ER (EC) 527, [2002] ECR I-6191, ECJ. g

De Danske Bilimportører v Skatteministeriet, Told- og Skattestyrelsen Case C-383/01 [2005] All ER (EC) 553, [2003] ECR I-6065, ECJ. h

EC Commission v Belgium Case 391/85 [1988] ECR 579, ECJ.

European Commission v Greece Case C-375/95 [1997] ECR I-5981, ECJ. i

- a Kerrutt v Finanzamt Mönchengladbach-Mitte Case 73/85 [1986] ECR 2219, ECJ.
Klattner v Greece Case C-389/95 [1998] STC 90, [1997] ECR I-2719, ECJ.
Ministère Public and Ministre des Finances du Royaume de Belgique v Ledoux Case 127/86 [1991] STC 553, [1988] ECR 3741, ECJ.
Ministère Public and Ministry of Finance v Profant Case 249/84 [1985] ECR 3237, ECJ.
- b Rigsadvokaten v Ryborg Case C-297/89 [1991] ECR I-1943, ECJ.
SARPP—Société d'application et de recherches en Pharmacologie et Phytothérapie SARL v Chambre syndicale des raffineurs et conditioneurs de sucre de France Case C-241/89 [1990] ECR I-4695, ECJ.
Tulliasiamies (Proceedings brought by) Case C-101/00 [2002] ECR I-7487, ECJ.
- c Verband Sozialer Wettbewerb eV v Clinique Laboratories SNC Case C-315/92 [1994] ECR I-317, ECJ.
Weigel v Finanzlandesdirektion für Vorarlberg Case C-387/01 [2004] 3 CMLR 931, ECJ.
Wisselink en Co BV v Staatssecretaris van Financiën Joined cases 93/88 and 94/88 [1989] ECR 2671, ECJ.

d

Reference

By order of 10 October 2002, the Korkein hallinto-oikeus (Supreme Administrative Court) referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) a question on the interpretation of art 1 of Council Directive (EEC) 83/183 (on tax exemptions applicable to permanent imports from a member state of the personal property of individuals). That question was raised in proceedings between Marie Lindfors and the Finnish authorities concerning the car tax under Finnish legislation to which she was assessed following the transfer of her residence to Finland. Written observations were submitted on behalf of: Ms Lindfors, by P Snell, oikeustieteen kandidaatti; the Finnish government, by T Pynnä, acting as agent; the Danish government, by J Bering Liisberg, acting as agent; the Greek government, by P Panagiotounakos, D Kalogiros and P Mylonopoulos, acting as agents; the Commission of the European Communities, by R Lyal and I Koskinen, acting as agents. Oral observations were submitted on behalf of: Ms Lindfors, represented by P Snell; the Finnish government, represented by T Pynnä; the Danish government, represented by J Molde, acting as agent; the Greek government, represented by M Apessos, acting as agent; and the Commission, represented by R Lyal and I Koskinen. The language of the case was Finnish. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General.

- h 4 March 2004. The Advocate General (C Stix-Hackl) delivered the following opinion<sup>1</sup>.

I—INTRODUCTION

- i 1. In this reference for a preliminary ruling the Korkein hallinto-oikeus (Supreme Administrative Court) (Finland) seeks an interpretation of art 1 of Council Directive (EEC) 83/183 (on tax exemptions applicable to permanent imports from a member state of the personal property of individuals) (hereinafter the directive)<sup>2</sup>. In particular it concerns the question whether the car tax payable under the Autoverolaki (Law on Car Tax) (1482/1994) before a vehicle is registered or brought into use is a duty or a tax from which a vehicle imported into Finland in connection with a transfer of residence should be exempted under the above provision. a

<sup>1</sup> Original language: German.

<sup>2</sup> OJ 1983 L105 p 64.

II—LEGAL FRAMEWORK b

A—National law

2. Under para 1(1) of the Autoverolaki (1482/1994) of 29 December 1994 in the version in force in 1999 (hereinafter AVL), car tax (hereinafter autovero) is payable before a vehicle is registered or brought into use in Finland.

3. Bringing into use means use of the vehicle in traffic on Finnish territory, even if the vehicle is not registered (para 2 of the AVL). c

4. Under the main provision concerning liability to tax, para 4(1) of the AVL, the autovero is payable by the importer of a vehicle or the manufacturer of a vehicle manufactured in Finland.

5. Additionally, under para 5 of the AVL, taxpayers are also liable to pay a value added tax on the autovero of an amount laid down in the Arvonlisäverolaki (Value added tax law) (1501/93) (hereinafter Arvonlisäverolaki). d

6. The amount of the autovero is, under para 6(1) of the AVL, the amount of the taxable value of the vehicle less FIM 4,600 (now €770), but in all cases at least 50% of the taxable value of the vehicle.

7. Under para 7(1) of the AVL, the tax levied in respect of an imported used vehicle is that on a new vehicle, but reduced on a percentage basis according to the number of months for which the vehicle has been in use. Under para 11(1) and (2) of the Law, the basis of the taxable value of the imported vehicle is its acquisition value to the taxpayer, which is set according to the customs value of the vehicle. e

8. Under para 25(1) of the AVL, the tax levied on a vehicle imported by an individual in connection with a transfer of his residence to Finland and privately owned may be reduced in accordance with the conditions laid down therein by a maximum of FIM 80,000 (now €13,450). f

B—Community law

9. According to the recitals of the directive, its objective is to eliminate tax obstacles to the free movement of persons within the Community. The scope of the directive is defined in art 1 as follows: g

‘1. Every Member State shall, subject to the conditions and in the cases hereinafter set out, exempt personal property imported permanently from another Member State by private individuals from turnover tax, excise duty and other consumption taxes which normally apply to such property. h

2. Specific and/or periodical duties and taxes connected with the use of such property within the country, such as for instance motor vehicle registration fees, road taxes and television licences, are not covered by this Directive.’ i

III—FACTS, MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND QUESTION REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

10. Ms Lindfors, who had resided abroad for several years, imported as a private individual a car belonging to her of the Audi A6 Avant make on 4 August 1999 in the course of her transfer of residence from another member a state of the European Communities to Finland. She had bought the car, which had left the factory on 20 March 1995, in Germany and brought it into use on 5 April 1995 in the Netherlands.

11. The Hangan tullikamari (Hanko Customs Board) by tax decision of 4 August 1999 granted Ms Lindfors a tax reduction of FIM 80,000 in accordance with para 25(1) of the AVL and assessed the autovero payable by her at FIM 16,556 plus FIM 3,642 value added tax, making a total of FIM 20,198.

b 12. Ms Lindfors applied to the Helsingin hallinto-oikeus (Helsinki Administrative Court) for the tax decision to be set aside and the taxes paid by her to be refunded. She submitted that the autovero constitutes a consumption tax within the meaning of art 1(1) of the directive which may not be levied on her car imported in connection with a transfer of residence.

c 13. The Helsinki Administrative Court dismissed the application. It took the view that the autovero is a tax connected with the registration or use of the vehicle in traffic on Finnish territory and that therefore it is to be regarded as a specific tax connected with the use of property within the country within the meaning of art 1(2) of the directive, which is not covered by the directive.

d 14. Thereupon Ms Lindfors sought leave to appeal to the Korkein hallinto-oikeus and asked in her appeal for the decision of the Helsinki Administrative Court and the tax decision of the Customs Board to be set aside.

e 15. In order to resolve the question whether in the light of the directive a car tax such as the autovero may be levied on a vehicle imported in connection with the transfer of residence, the Supreme Administrative Court decided by order of 10 October 2002 to make a reference to the court for a preliminary ruling on the following question:

f 'Is Article 1 of Directive 83/183 ... to be interpreted as meaning that car tax (autovero) charged under the Law on Car Tax (Autoverolaki) on a vehicle imported into Finland from another Member State in connection with a transfer of residence is a consumption tax within the meaning of Article 1(1) of the directive, or is it a specific duty or tax connected with the use of such property within the country within the meaning of Article 1(2)?'

g IV—THE QUESTION REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

A—Introductory remarks

16. With the exception of value added tax—for which incidentally several derogations apply in connection with the purchase of new vehicles<sup>3</sup>—the taxation of motor vehicles in the Community has not been harmonised to any extent<sup>4</sup>.

h 17. Correspondingly the taxes and duties payable on private cars in the member states vary considerably not only in their amount but also in their structure<sup>5</sup>. Certain taxes in one member state have no counterpart whatsoever

i <sup>3</sup> Even in the case of an acquisition by a private individual new vehicles are, by way of derogation from the general rule, taxed according to the country of destination: see art 28a of Sixth Council Directive (EEC) 77/388 (on the harmonisation of the laws of the member states relating to turnover taxes—common system of value added tax: uniform basis of assessment) (OJ 1977 L145 p 1) (hereinafter Sixth Value Added Tax Directive).

<sup>4</sup> See Cura Anlagen GmbH v Auto Service Leasing GmbH (ASL) Case C-451/99 [2002] ECR I-3193 (para 40).

<sup>5</sup> A useful overview of that issue can be found in the communication from the Commission of the European Communities to the Council and the European Parliament (on the taxation of passengers cars in the European Union—options for action at national and Community levels) (COM(2002) 431

in other member states. One must therefore bear in mind, in particular in a case such as the present one in which the referring court seeks to ascertain whether a particular national tax falls within a tax definition set out in a Community instrument, that there is a lack of common concepts which would permit an exact classification of different taxes. a

18. For the purposes of exposition—and because the parties concerned with this case have evidently also assumed such a classification—I should like however to make a rough distinction between three different types of tax and duty which are levied by member states in respect of private cars. b

19. Firstly, there are one-off taxes, I will call them ‘registration taxes’, which are payable on the purchase of a car or as a condition for bringing it into use on the territory of a member state. c

20. Secondly, almost all member states also levy taxes—calculated according to differing criteria—payable periodically or, as the case may be, annually, known, for example, in Germany and Austria as ‘Kraftfahrzeugsteuern’ (car taxes).

21. Finally, duties may be levied in connection with the registration of a vehicle in a member state to cover the administration costs (registration fees). d

22. It emerges from the case file and the observations of the Finnish government that in each of those cases Finland also levies such taxes on cars.

23. The autovero, as is already clear from the AVL, is a one-off tax payable on cars and other categories of vehicle before their registration or bringing them into use, calculated on the basis of their taxable value; additionally under the Finnish Arvonlisäverolaki so-called value added tax is also levied on the amount of the autovero. e

24. Additionally, there are also taxes payable periodically, that is, car taxes in the narrower sense, the ajoneuvovero (vehicle tax, or ‘vignette’) and moottorijoneuvovero (diesel tax).

25. Finally, duties are also payable in Finland on the registration of a vehicle to cover the administrative costs associated with the registration (registration fee). f

26. The present case only concerns the autovero which the court already had to consider in Proceedings brought by Tulliasiamies and in which I also delivered my opinion<sup>6</sup>.

27. That case raised the question whether a tax such as the autovero in the form and the amount as was in force at the time in respect of a used vehicle imported from another member state constitutes an unlawful discriminatory domestic tax, to which the court replied in the affirmative. The present case however concerns the question whether in specific circumstances, that is, when a private car is permanently imported within the scope of a transfer of residence, a tax such as the Finnish autovero—irrespective of its amount or the method of its calculation—may be levied at all. g
h

28. The referring court essentially wishes to know whether the tax exemption provided for by art 1 of the directive precludes such taxation.

29. I should finally like to point out that the Commission has already raised that question in connection with the Standard Fuel Consumption Tax i final), and a Study on Vehicle Taxation in the Member States of the European Union of January 2002 produced for the Commission by TIS/PT (Consultores em Transportes Inovação e Sistemas, SA) available online at: http://europa.eu.int/comm/taxation\_customs/taxation/car\_taxes/vehicle\_tax\_study\_15-02-2002.pdf.

---

<sup>6</sup> Case C-101/00 [2002] ECR I-7487.

a (Normverbrauchsabgabe or NOVA) levied in Austria in the context of the reference for a preliminary ruling in Weigel v Finanzlandesdirektion für Vorarlberg, also currently pending before the court, which however primarily concerns the compatibility of the NOVA with arts 23, 25 and 39 EC (formerly arts 9, 12 and 48 of the EC Treaty) and with the Sixth Value Added Tax Directive, and that Advocate General Tizzano has in his opinion in that case also delivered his view on the matter<sup>7</sup>.

B—Main arguments of the parties

c 30. According to Ms Lindfors and the Commission, the directive in setting out a principle of tax exemption precludes the levying of tax in a situation such as that arising in the main proceedings. In their opinion the autovero constitutes a consumption tax levied on or by reason of permanent importation, to which art 1(1) applies.

d 31. Ms Lindfors argues inter alia that in reality, or rather judging by the formalities of the tax declaration, the autovero is levied by reason of the fact of importing the vehicle to Finland. That it constitutes a consumption tax within the meaning of art 1(1) of the directive follows also indirectly from the scope of Council Directive (EEC) 83/182 (on tax exemptions within the Community for certain means of transport temporarily imported into one member state from another)<sup>8</sup> and from the proposal for a Council Directive governing the tax treatment of private motor vehicles moved permanently to another member state in connection with a transfer of residence or used temporarily in a member state other than that in which they are registered (hereinafter Commission proposal)<sup>9</sup>.

f 32. The Commission contends that art 1(1) of the directive precludes the levying of taxes whose chargeable event is the importation. This prohibition cannot be circumvented by utilising instead of the importation an alternative chargeable event, such as registration. The Commission also points out that the directive must be interpreted in the light of the provisions on free movement of persons and to avoid double taxation.

g 33. The Finnish, Danish and Greek governments, which have submitted observations in the present case, on the other hand take the view that a tax such as the autovero is not covered by the tax exemption provided for in art 1(1) of the directive, referring in this respect also to the opinion of Advocate General Tizzano in the case of Weigel<sup>10</sup>. They emphasise, essentially in agreement with one another, that the autovero does not constitute a tax which is levied on importation but rather one which is linked to utilisation. If the vehicle is not brought into use in Finland—such as in the case of a car which is to be exhibited in a museum, as the Finnish government explains by way of example—the autovero is not payable. Accordingly it is to be seen as a tax on the use of the vehicle or as ‘motor vehicle registration fees’ within the meaning of art 1(2) of the directive and therefore is not included within the tax exemption.

i 34. In so far as the governments make reference to the Commission proposal or to Directive 83/182, they draw the opposite conclusion from those texts to 7 See the opinion of Advocate General Tizzano delivered on 3 July 2003 Case C-387/01 [2004] 3 CMLR 931 (paras 40–56).

8 OJ 1983 L105 p 59.

9 COM(98) 30 final (OJ 1998 C108 p 75), as amended by COM(1999) 165 final (OJ 1999 C145 p 6).

10 Opinion cited in footnote 7, above.

Ms Lindfors or the Commission as to the interpretation of the scope of the directive. The governments also point out that registration taxes such as the autovero have not yet been harmonised within the Community and that therefore the possibility of double taxation must also be accepted as a consequence of that situation. The Danish government explains that the derogation concerning vehicle registration taxes in art 1(2) of the directive was inserted into the directive's text by the Council on the initiative of Denmark for the very purpose of expressly excluding registration taxes such as the autovero from the scope of the directive. a

35. The Commission agreeing with Ms Lindfors, however, interprets the derogation contained in art 1(2) as only referring to the administrative costs or fees which are incurred on registration and bases that interpretation above all on the French and English language versions of the directive which refer to the 'droits' and 'fees' for the registration of vehicles. b

36. The governments submitting observations reject that interpretation for linguistic and logical reasons. In particular, Community law does not in any case preclude the levying of fees to cover administrative costs. c

C—Appraisal d

37. Under art 1(1) of the directive, the scope of the directive extends to consumption taxes—'turnover tax, excise duty and other consumption taxes'—which 'normally' apply to 'personal property imported permanently from another Member State by private individuals'. Those consumption taxes are contrasted in art 1(2) with '[s]pecific and/or periodical duties and taxes connected with the use of such property' which are not in any event to be covered by the directive. '[M]otor vehicle registration fees, road taxes and television licences' are expressly cited as examples of such taxes. e

38. Evidently, then, to delimit the directive's scope, it distinguishes between those (consumption) taxes and duties which are connected with the importation of property and those which apply to its use within the country. f

39. On an initial view that distinction also appears to be obvious, since it would not be very clear why a Community citizen who permanently transfers his place of residence to another member state and as a consequence lives and uses property there should be exempted from taxes which relate to such use of the property in that member state. g

40. By contrast, taxes and duties which are linked to the importation of property do very probably constitute an immediate tax obstacle to the free movement of persons.

41. As regards the question concerning which taxes or duties relating to importation might be envisaged under art 1(1) of the directive, customs duties or charges of an equivalent effect within the meaning of arts 23 and 25 EC, for example, are not to be considered (although according to the court's case law it is of course a very characteristic of those charges that they are levied by reason of importation or the crossing of the frontier of a member state)<sup>11</sup>. Since such financial burdens are in any case precluded by primary law and also cannot under art 99 EC (formerly art 103 of the EC Treaty) be subject to harmonisation measures, it is clear that the directive does not concern them. h

<sup>11</sup> See inter alia De Danske Bilimportører v Skatteministeriet, Told- og Skattestyrelsen Case C-383/01 [2005] All ER (EC) 553, [2003] ECR I-6065 (para 34). i

a 42. Rather, art 1(1) of the directive is directed towards internal taxation—to use the terminology of art 90 EC (formerly art 95 of the EC Treaty)—or indirect taxes or, more accurately, consumption taxes which use importation as the chargeable event.

b 43. Whilst at present examples of such taxes may not immediately spring to mind, it must however not be forgotten that the directive goes back to a time before the introduction of the internal market on 1 January 1993 and the progress thereby achieved in removing tax obstacles to intra-Community trade. At that time member states could in particular still levy turnover taxes on imports or other (special) consumption taxes which for taxation purposes were linked to the fact of importation of goods<sup>12</sup>.

c 44. As regards value added taxes, the principle of imposing tax on imports within intra-Community trade was abolished by Council Directive (EEC) 91/680<sup>13</sup> as a condition of eliminating fiscal frontiers and was replaced by the concept of imposing tax on acquisitions according to the member state of destination. Since then turnover taxes on imports are only permitted in the context of trade with third countries.

d 45. Under art 33 of the Sixth Value Added Tax Directive member states are indeed left free to maintain or introduce at their discretion consumption taxes or other indirect taxes, provided that they cannot be characterised as turnover taxes within the meaning of the Sixth Directive or compromise the functioning of the common value added tax system<sup>14</sup>. However, in respect of consumption taxes—for example, also for special consumption taxes on motor vehicles—it must be noted that under art 3(3) of the 'System Directive'<sup>15</sup> those taxes may 'not give rise to border-crossing formalities' in intra-Community trade. Thus whilst the possibility for member states to introduce or maintain special consumption taxes whose chargeable event is linked to importation or the crossing of a border is de facto considerably restricted, it is however not completely excluded<sup>16</sup>.

f 46. I do not wish to elaborate further on these observations, but they may serve as an introduction to my examination of the compatibility of a tax with the characteristics of the autovero with the tax exemption provided for by the directive.

g 47. Under the AVL, the chargeable event of the autovero is linked to the registration of the vehicle or bringing it into use in Finland.

48. Even the Commission and Ms Lindfors assume, however, that the tax exemption provided for under art 1(1) of the directive relates to taxes whose chargeable event is connected to importation. They argue nevertheless that,

h 12 For an example see, for instance, the Belgian value added tax on imports also levied on motor vehicles which was the subject matter of Ministère Public and Ministry of Finance v Profant Case 249/84 [1985] ECR 3237.

13 Supplementing the common system of value added tax and amending Council Directive (EEC) 77/388 with a view to the abolition of fiscal frontiers (OJ 1991 L376 p 1).

i 14 See inter alia Wisselink en Co BV v Staatssecretaris van Financiën Joined cases 93/88 and 94/88 [1989] ECR 2671 (para 17) and Kerrutt v Finanzamt Mönchengladbach-Mitte Case 73/85 [1986] ECR 2219 (para 22).

15 Council Directive (EEC) 92/12 (on the general arrangements for products subject to excise duty and on the holding, movement and monitoring of such products) (OJ 1992 L76 p 1).

16 See also Jatzke 'Das neue Verbrauchsteuerrecht im EG-Binnenmarkt' Steuerrecht No 1 (1993) 41, p 42. For an example of a special consumption tax levied on vehicles, inter alia on their importation, see European Commission v Greece Case C-375/95 [1997] ECR I-5981.

despite the AVL providing for the linking of the autovero to registration or bringing into use, in reality it must be seen as a tax which is levied on importation. a

49. At the hearing the Finnish government demonstrated, in my opinion convincingly, that in practice neither the tax declaration relating to the autovero nor the payment thereof needs to take place on crossing the border or on importation and that the customs formalities described by Ms Lindfors relate to importation from a third country. It cannot therefore be concluded from the practical border-crossing arrangements that a tax such as the autovero in reality constitutes a tax which is levied on or because of importation. b

50. I consider to be more significant the Commission's submission that a tax such as the autovero which in formal terms is linked to registration or bringing into use is also to be regarded as a consumption tax or turnover tax levied on importation within the meaning of art 1(1) of the directive and that that provision may not be circumvented by providing for an alternative chargeable event to that of importation. c

51. In that respect it must be firstly noted that—as the Finnish government illustrated with its example of a vehicle to be exhibited in a museum—a tax such as the autovero does not operate as a 'true' consumption tax levied on importation, because despite the transfer to Finland liability does not arise or does not arise until the car is brought into circulation or registered there. d

52. It could of course be argued that in reality the link with registration or the bringing into use constitutes a substitute link which is in practical terms comparable with the fact of importation, since in respect of the vast majority of vehicles brought into a member state it can be assumed that the vehicle is also to be used. e

53. The court, in a different connection to that of the present case, had in its judgment in EC Commission v Belgium similarly to deal with the Commission's submission that the registration tax for new cars applicable at that time in Belgium in reality constituted a value added tax. The Belgian government contended inter alia that the two taxes should be distinguished from one another because they were linked to different events (delivery/registration)<sup>17</sup>. f

54. The court observed in that regard that 'that argument could be accepted only if the two taxes were genuinely independent of each other'. In that case it came to the conclusion that the registration tax was not independent, but that was against the background in that case that thanks to an offsetting mechanism a direct link existed between the registration tax and the value added tax, eliminating the difference between the chargeable events upon which the two taxes became chargeable<sup>18</sup>. g

55. In the present case the autovero however does not have a comparable link to a value added tax which might be payable on importation. In those circumstances the difference in terms of their respective chargeable events between a tax such as the autovero and a consumption tax levied by reason of importation appears sufficiently material for it not to be possible to equate the former with the latter for the purposes of art 1(1) of the directive. h

56. I am therefore assuming that a tax such as the autovero does not constitute a turnover tax, excise duty or other consumption tax levied on importation within the meaning of art 1(1) of the directive. The preceding observations have however also made it clear that those tax concepts cannot be i

<sup>17</sup> Case 391/85 [1988] ECR 579 (paras 14, 22).

<sup>18</sup> See footnote above (para 25).

a strictly delineated and that the mere fact that a tax is levied as a result of or as a condition of registration does not in itself preclude also regarding it as a type of import-consumption tax.

57. In that connection art 1(2) of the directive must now be examined. It emerges from the drafts of the directive put forward at that time that that provision was not originally contained in the Commission's proposal and was
b incorporated into the directive precisely to satisfy the wishes of several member states seeking precision as to the directive's scope<sup>19</sup>. That provision also expressly mentions 'motor vehicle registration fees' which in the view of the governments submitting observations refers to taxes such as the autovero.

58. For several reasons I am not convinced by the Commission's submission c that that only intends to refer to fees which may be payable on registration to cover administrative costs.

59. Firstly, above all the Danish government correctly pointed out, in particular at the hearing, that that argument cannot be supported convincingly by a purely literal interpretation of art 1(2) of the directive. Given the widely differing approaches and traditions of the member states in the field of
d taxation, caution is from the outset called for in this matter. Whilst, for example, in the French text one can find grounds for the Commission's view in the distinction between 'taxes' and 'droits', little support for such a view can however be found, for example, in the German text with the expressions 'Steuern' and 'Abgaben', since both expressions can be used together synonymously.

e 60. Secondly, 'motor vehicle registration fees' are cited in art 1(2) of the directive as an example of duties connected with the use of imported property. In the case of a duty covering administrative costs or as payment for administrative services that, by definition, would however not be so.

61. Moreover, it must be observed that the fact that a tax such as the autovero is not payable periodically and that it is payable (in the amount too) irrespective f of the extent to which or for how long the vehicle is actually used following registration does not preclude classifying that tax as a duty connected with the use of property within the meaning of the directive. That surely follows from art 1(2) of the directive, under which not only periodical duties can be duties within the meaning of that provision ('[s]pecific and/or periodical duties').

62. From the case file and the observations of the Finnish government it
g appears that a lawful bringing into use or operation of a vehicle in Finland is as a rule only permitted following the completion of registration<sup>20</sup>. Payment of the autovero therefore constitutes in any event a condition for the (lawful) use of a car in Finland.

63. Such a tax may correctly be regarded as a duty connected with the use of h property, which according to art 1(2) of the directive is expressly excluded from its scope.

64. Furthermore, contrary to the argument of Ms Lindfors, it cannot automatically be concluded from the inclusion of registration taxes in the tax exemption under Directive 83/182 which concerns the mere temporary

i

19 Internal document No 6205/79 of the Council Working Group on Finance of 23 April 1979, p 3, included, with the Council's permission, by the Danish government in its written observations.

20 Viewed in that way, the bringing of the vehicle into use on Finnish territory could constitute an alternative chargeable event ensuring in any event that the tax (already) becomes payable under the Autoverolaki even if the vehicle is, for example, used in traffic, contrary to the rules, without registration.

importation of vehicles that such taxes ought also to be included in the tax exemption under Directive 83/183 which concerns the permanent importation of the vehicle. a

65. The parties additionally referred to the Commission proposal for a successor provision to those directives, in which the prohibition on imposing taxes now expressly extends to registration taxes and the autovero<sup>21</sup>. Judging from its recitals, the objective of the proposal is to remove existing problems concerning the taxation of vehicles following a transfer of residence, so that the proposal evidently assumes rather that the tax exemption under the present directive does not (yet) concern registration taxes<sup>22</sup>. But of course that does not really offer a reliable indication for interpreting the meaning of the present directive. b

66. Finally, the Commission's argument that the directive should be interpreted in the light of the objectives pursued by tax harmonisation and the fundamental freedoms must be considered. c

67. It is doubtless the case that just as for Directive 83/182 also for that directive—

‘the provisions of the Directive must be interpreted in the light of the fundamental aims of the endeavour to harmonise value added tax (VAT), in particular the promotion of freedom of movement for persons and goods and the prevention of double taxation ...’<sup>23</sup> d

68. In my view, however, no conclusions can be drawn therefrom on the basis of the directive concerning motor vehicle taxes connected with registration such as the autovero, which are, as set out above, excluded from the scope of the directive. e

69. Furthermore, the prohibition on double taxation raised by the Commission—which, as is apparent from the case law cited<sup>24</sup>, constitutes an objective of harmonisation in the field of value added tax—does not apply automatically to all types of tax. f

70. Rather, in the field of vehicle taxation, as the court concluded in the case of Cura Anlagen, member states are free to exercise their powers of taxation in that area and registration appears to be ‘the natural corollary of the exercise of those powers of taxation’:

‘It is lawful for [the member states] to allocate those powers of taxation amongst themselves ... and to conclude agreements amongst themselves to ensure that a vehicle is subject to indirect taxation in only one of the signatory States.’<sup>25</sup> g

71. It therefore follows that as Community law stands with regard to motor vehicle registration taxes—such as the autovero—consequences of the lack of harmonisation in this area such as double taxation have to be accepted; at best that could be prevented by voluntary measures of the member states. h

<sup>21</sup> See art 1 together with Annex I of the Commission proposal.

<sup>22</sup> In a similar vein see also Advocate General Tizzano in his opinion in Weigel's case, cited in footnote 7, above (paras 51, 52).

<sup>23</sup> See Klattnner v Greece Case C-389/95 [1998] STC 90, [1997] ECR I-2719 (para 25); see inter alia also Profant's case, cited in footnote 12, above (para 25), Ministère Public and Ministre des Finances du Royaume de Belgique v Ledoux Case 127/86 [1991] STC 553, [1988] ECR 3741 (para 11) and Rigsadvokaten v Ryborg Case C-297/89 [1991] ECR I-1943 (para 13).

<sup>24</sup> See footnote above.

<sup>25</sup> See the Cura Anlagen case, cited in footnote 4, above (paras 40, 41). i a 72. In the light of the foregoing the answer to the question is that art 1 of the directive does not preclude the levying of a tax such as the autovero which is levied on vehicles brought from one member state into another member state in connection with the transfer of a residence.

b V—CONCLUSION

73. I therefore propose that the Court of Justice answer the question as follows:

c Article 1 of Council Directive (EEC) 83/183 (on tax exemptions applicable to permanent imports from a member state of the personal property of individuals) is to be interpreted as meaning that it does not preclude the levying of a tax such as car tax imposed under the Autoverolaki which is levied on vehicles imported from one member state into another member state in connection with a transfer of residence.

d 15 July 2004. The COURT OF JUSTICE (First Chamber) delivered the following judgment.

e 1. By order of 10 October 2002, received at the Court of Justice of the European Communities on 14 October 2002, the Korkein hallinto-oikeus (Supreme Administrative Court) referred to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) a question on the interpretation of art 1 of Council Directive (EEC) 83/183 (on tax exemptions applicable to permanent imports from a member state of the personal property of individuals) (OJ 1983 L105 p 64).

2. That question was raised in proceedings between Ms Lindfors and the Finnish authorities concerning the car tax under Finnish legislation to which she was assessed following the transfer of her residence to Finland.

f LEGAL BACKGROUND

Relevant provisions of Directive 83/183

3. Article 1 of Directive 83/183 provides:

g '1. Every Member State shall, subject to the conditions and in the cases hereinafter set out, exempt personal property imported permanently from another Member State by private individuals from turnover tax, excise duty and other consumption taxes which normally apply to such property.

h 2. Specific and/or periodical duties and taxes connected with the use of such property within the country, such as for instance motor vehicle registration fees, road taxes and television licences, are not covered by this Directive.'

Finnish legislation

i 4. The relevant provisions of national law are in the Autoverolaki (1482/1994) (Law on Car Tax) of 29 December 1994, in the version applicable in 1999 (the Law on Car Tax).

5. Paragraph 1(1) of the Law on Car Tax prescribes that that tax (or 'autovero') is 'payable to the State before registration or bringing into use of [a private vehicle] in Finland'.

6. According to para 2 of that law, 'bringing into use in Finland means use of the vehicle in traffic in Finnish territory even if the vehicle is not registered in Finland'. That provision continues:

'However, the use exclusively for his own needs for up to six months ... of a vehicle registered in a State other than Finland temporarily imported for his own use by a natural person permanently resident in a State other than Finland is not regarded as taxable use of a vehicle.'

7. Under para 4(1) of that law, '[t]he person liable to pay car tax is the importer of the vehicle or the manufacturer of a vehicle manufactured in Finland'. Similarly, para 5 of the law states that '[t]he person liable to pay car tax must also pay value added tax on the car tax'.

8. At the material time for the main proceedings, para 6(1) of the Law on Car Tax stated:

'The tax due is the taxable value of the car, reduced by FIM 4,600. The amount of the tax is, however, always at least 50% of the taxable value of the vehicle.'

9. Under para 7(1) of that law, the tax levied on an imported used car is the tax on an equivalent new vehicle, but reduced according to a proportional scale which takes into account the period (calculated in months) during which the vehicle has been in use.

10. Under para 25(1) of that law, '[t]he tax on one privately owned taxable vehicle imported in connection with a person's transfer of residence to the country is reduced by up to FIM 80,000', if the conditions set out in that provision are satisfied.

THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTION REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

11. After residing in other member states, Ms Lindfors moved permanently to Finland, and in connection with that transfer of residence imported into Finland on 4 August 1999 a private vehicle which was her personal property, which she had brought into use in the Netherlands in 1995 after buying it in Germany.

12. In a tax assessment of 4 August 1999, the Hangon tullikamari (Hanko Customs Board) (Finland) granted Ms Lindfors a tax reduction of FIM 80,000 and fixed the car tax payable by her at FIM 16,556, plus value added tax of FIM 3,642, making a total of FIM 20,198 (approximately €3,400).

13. Ms Lindfors brought proceedings against that decision in the Helsingin hallinto-oikeus (Helsinki Administrative Court) (Finland). She considered that autovero constituted a consumption tax prohibited under art 1(1) of Directive 83/183.

14. Her action was dismissed. The Helsingin hallinto-oikeus held that, as a tax connected with the registration or use in traffic of a vehicle in Finland, autovero was to be regarded as a specific tax connected with the use of property within the country within the meaning of art 1(2) of Directive 83/183, such a tax being outside the scope of that directive.

15. Ms Lindfors sought leave from the Korkein hallinto-oikeus to appeal against the decision of the Helsingin hallinto-oikeus.

16. The Korkein hallinto-oikeus decided to stay the proceedings and refer the following question to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

'Is Article 1 of Directive 83/183 ... to be interpreted as meaning that car tax (autovero) charged under the Law on Car Tax (Autoverolaki) on a vehicle imported into Finland from another Member State in connection with a transfer of residence is a consumption tax within the meaning of

- a Article 1(1) of the directive, or is it a specific duty or tax connected with the use of such property within the country within the meaning of Article 1(2)?

THE QUESTION REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

Preliminary remarks

- b 17. The court has already held, in its judgment of 19 September 2002 in Proceedings brought by Tulliasiamies Case C-101/00 [2002] ECR I-7487 (paras 61, 80), that autovero constitutes discriminatory internal taxation prohibited by art 90 EC (formerly art 95 of the EC Treaty) in so far as the amount of that tax on an imported used car exceeds the amount of the residual tax incorporated in the value of a similar used car already registered in Finnish territory.

- c 18. The national court's question concerns solely the lawfulness of levying a tax such as autovero—regardless of its method of calculation or amount—on the occasion of a transfer of residence from one member state to another.

Observations submitted to the court

- d 19. Ms Lindfors submits that autovero is a consumption tax which is levied because of the importation of a vehicle into Finnish territory. Such a tax should fall within the exemption laid down in art 1(1) of Directive 83/183.

- e 20. That autovero is a consumption tax within the meaning of that provision follows, according to Ms Lindfors, not only from the characteristics of that tax but also indirectly from the scope of Council Directive (EEC) 83/182 (on tax exemptions within the Community for certain means of transport temporarily imported into one member state from another) (OJ 1983 L105 p 59) and from Proposal 98/C 108/12 for a Council Directive governing the tax treatment of private motor vehicles moved permanently to another member state in connection with a transfer of residence or used temporarily in a member state other than that in which they are registered (OJ 1998 C108 p 75, and—amended proposal—OJ 1999 C145 p 6).

- f 21. The Finnish, Danish and Greek governments observe that autovero cannot be equated to a tax which normally applies to personal property imported permanently from another member state by private individuals within the meaning of art 1(1) of Directive 83/183. The determining circumstance for liability to the tax is the use of the vehicle on the highway in Finland, even if that tax is usually charged on the occasion of registration.
- g In any event, autovero, as a specific tax connected with use or registration, is expressly excluded from the scope of that directive by virtue of art 1(2) of the directive.

- h 22. The Commission of the European Communities notes that art 1(2) of Directive 83/183 excludes 'motor vehicle registration fees' from the scope of the directive. In contrast to taxes which are intended to contribute to the financing of the public administration, 'fees' constitute the consideration for services provided by the public authorities. According to the Commission, autovero is not a 'fee' charged on registration but a consumption tax prohibited by art 1(1) of that directive in connection with a transfer of residence. That prohibition relates to taxes whose chargeable event is the importation of property in connection with a transfer of residence.

- i 23. The Commission submits that tax has already been charged on the registration of the vehicle and its bringing into use in the state of origin. Freedom of movement would be compromised if the member state of destination could charge tax again on that basis. The provisions of Directive

83/183 must be interpreted in the light of the fundamental right to freedom of movement enshrined in art 18 EC (formerly art 8a of the EC Treaty) for citizens of the European Union. a

Findings of the court

24. It must first be examined whether, as Ms Lindfors and the Commission claim, autovero falls within the scope of art 1(1) of Directive 83/183. It should be noted in this respect that the name given to a tax in national law is not as such decisive for the assessment of whether the tax in question is one referred to in that provision. b

25. Reading paras 1 and 2 of the Law on Car Tax together shows that autovero is payable before the registration or bringing into use of a private vehicle in Finland. It is apparent from the case file, in particular from para 2 of that law and the observations of the Finnish government and Ms Lindfors, that, with the exception of temporary import, the use of a vehicle on the Finnish road system entails the charging of autovero. Thus the government explains that the determining circumstance for the charging of that tax is the use of the car in traffic, even though the tax is usually charged on the occasion of registration. Ms Lindfors similarly confirms that the Law on Car Tax is based on the principle that any use of the vehicle, however minimal, entails the charging of the tax. c
d

26. In those circumstances, a tax such as autovero cannot be regarded as a tax connected with importation falling within the scope of the exemption laid down in art 1(1) of Directive 83/183. The chargeable event for that tax is the use of a vehicle on Finnish territory, which is not necessarily connected with the act of importation (see, to that effect, Weigel v Finanzlandesdirektion für Vorarlberg Case C-387/01 [2004] 3 CMLR 931 (para 47)). e

27. It follows that a tax with the characteristics of autovero does not fall within the scope of the tax exemption laid down in art 1(1) of Directive 83/183. f

28. That conclusion is supported by art 1(2) of Directive 83/183. Since autovero is payable as a result of the use of a vehicle in Finland, taxes such as that at issue in the main proceedings constitute '[s]pecific ... duties and taxes connected with the use of ... property within the country' within the meaning of that provision. g

29. Nor can Ms Lindfors base her argument on the scope of Directive 83/182, which concerns tax exemptions applicable on the temporary import of certain means of transport. The circumstance that, in accordance with art 1 of that directive, a citizen of the Union who temporarily imports a vehicle into Finland is exempted from autovero does not allow the conclusion that that tax is within the tax exemption established by Directive 83/183, which relates to the permanent import of vehicles. h

30. The proposal for a directive 98/C 108/12 does not allow Directive 83/183 to be interpreted as Ms Lindfors and the Commission do. On the contrary, it is apparent from the fourth, fifth and seventh recitals in the preamble to that proposal that the adoption of a directive prohibiting the member states from imposing, as stated in art 1 of the proposal, 'excise duties, registration taxes or other consumption taxes ... on private motor vehicles registered in other Member States and brought into that Member State permanently in connection with the transfer of normal residence of a private individual' has i a become necessary precisely because of the inadequacy of the rules laid down by Directive 83/183, as Advocate General Tizzano pointed out in his opinion in Weigel's case (para 52).

31. It is true that, as the Commission points out, autovero is capable of having a negative influence on decisions of citizens of the Union to exercise their right to freedom of movement as enshrined in particular by art 18 EC.

b 32. Although the national court has formally limited its question to the interpretation of art 1 of Directive 83/183, that does not preclude the court from providing the national court with all those elements for the interpretation of Community law which may be of assistance in adjudicating on the case pending before it, whether or not that court has specifically referred to them in its question (see, to that effect, SARPP—Société d'application et de recherches en Pharmacologie et Phytothérapie SARL v Chambre syndicale des raffineurs et conditioneurs de sucre de France Case C-241/89 [1990] ECR I-4695 (para 8), Verband Sozialer Wettbewerb eV v Clinique Laboratories SNC Case C-315/92 [1994] ECR I-317 (para 7), Consorzio per la Tutela del Formaggio Gorgonzola v Käserei Champignon Hofmeister GmbH & Co KG Case C-87/97 [1999] ECR I-1301 (para 16) and Weigel's case (para 44)).

d 33. The court must therefore examine the effect of art 18 EC, so that the national court can assess whether the application of autovero in a case such as that in the main proceedings is compatible with the requirements deriving from that provision.

e 34. It has already been held that the EC Treaty offers no guarantee to a citizen of the Union that transferring his activities to a member state other than that in which he previously resided will be neutral as regards taxation. Given the disparities in the tax legislation of the member states, such a transfer may be to the citizen's advantage in terms of indirect taxation or not, according to circumstance. It follows that, in principle, any disadvantage, by comparison with the situation in which that citizen carried on activities prior to that transfer, is not contrary to art 18 EC, provided that the legislation concerned does not place that citizen at a disadvantage as compared with those already subject to such a tax (see Weigel's case (para 55)).

f 35. The case file shows that the Law on Car Tax provides, in para 25(1), for a tax reduction of up to FIM 80,000 (€13,455) inter alia for citizens of the Union exercising their right to freedom of movement in connection with a transfer of residence to Finland. It will be for the national court to ascertain whether the application of that provision and any other provisions of national law is capable of ensuring that, as regards that tax, Ms Lindfors is not placed in a less favourable position than that of citizens who have been permanently resident in Finland. Should the national court find that such a less favourable situation exists, it will have to examine whether that difference in treatment is justified by objective considerations independent of the residence of the persons concerned and proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued by national law (see D'Hoop v Office National de l'Emploi Case C-224/98 [2003] All ER (EC) 527, [2002] ECR I-6191 (para 36)).

h 36. In the light of all the foregoing, the national court's question must be answered as follows:

i Article 1 of Directive 83/183 must be interpreted as not precluding, in connection with a transfer of residence of the owner of a vehicle from one member state to another, a tax such as that laid down by the Law on Car Tax from being charged before the registration or bringing into use of the vehicle in the member state to which residence is transferred. However, having regard to the requirements deriving from art 18 EC, it is for the national court to ascertain whether the application of national law is capable of ensuring that, as regards that tax, that owner is not placed in a less favourable situation than that of citizens who have been permanently resident in the member state in question and, if necessary, whether such a difference of treatment is justified by objective considerations independent of the residence of the persons concerned and proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued by national law.

COSTS

37. The costs incurred by the Finnish, Danish and Greek governments and by the Commission, which have submitted observations to the court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

On those grounds, the Court of Justice (First Chamber), in answer to the question referred to it by the Korkein hallinto-oikeus by order of 10 October 2002, hereby rules:

Article 1 of Council Directive (EEC) 83/183 (on tax exemptions applicable to permanent imports from a member state of the personal property of individuals) must be interpreted as not precluding, in connection with a transfer of residence of the owner of a vehicle from one member state to another, a tax such as that laid down by the Autoverolaki (1482/1994) (Law on Car Tax) from being charged before the registration or bringing into use of the vehicle in the member state to which residence is transferred. However, having regard to the requirements deriving from art 18 EC (formerly art 8a of the EC Treaty), it is for the national court to ascertain whether the application of national law is capable of ensuring that, as regards that tax, that owner is not placed in a less favourable situation than that of citizens who have been permanently resident in the member state in question and, if necessary, whether such a difference of treatment is justified by objective considerations independent of the residence of the persons concerned and proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued by national law.

Evans v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions and another

(Case C-63/01)

COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (FIFTH CHAMBER)

JUDGES JANN (RAPPORTEUR) (ACTING FOR THE PRESIDENT OF THE FIFTH CHAMBER), EDWARD AND VON BAHR

ADVOCATE GENERAL ALBER

11 JULY, 24 OCTOBER 2002, 4 DECEMBER 2003

Motor insurance – Motor Insurers' Bureau – Liability of bureau to satisfy judgment against uninsured driver – Bureau agreeing with Secretary of State to satisfy awards of damages made against uninsured drivers – Agreement intended to give effect to European Community directive – Compatibility of agreement with directive – Whether nature of bureau sufficient to comply with directive – Whether procedural arrangements of bureau sufficient to ensure protection to which victims entitled under directive – Whether bureau required to pay interest on awards of compensation to victims – Whether bureau required to reimburse costs incurred by victims in processing applications for compensation – Whether directive properly transposed – Council Directive (EEC) 84/5, art 1(4).

In the United Kingdom, the Motor Insurers' Bureau (MIB) was a private law entity whose main purpose was to pay compensation to victims of accidents caused by uninsured or untraced drivers. In order to implement art 1(4)<sup>a</sup> of Second Council Directive (EEC) 84/5 (on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to insurance against civil liability in respect of the use of motor vehicles)—which directive required member states to set up or to authorise a body with aims corresponding to those of the MIB—a number of agreements had been concluded between the Secretary of State and the MIB. Victims were able to apply to the MIB, which was to award payment of an amount of compensation to be assessed in the same way that a court would assess damages which the victim would be able to recover from an untraced driver. Further, the victim had a right of appeal to an arbitrator against any decision of the MIB and, in certain cases, the victim might appeal thereafter to a court, with further rights of appeal to successive levels of jurisdiction. However, the agreement made no express provision for the payment of interest on the compensation awarded or for reimbursement of costs incurred in the proceedings before the MIB. In the main proceedings, the claimant had applied for, and had been granted, compensation under the agreement, but his appeals against the level of the award to the arbitrator and to the courts had been dismissed. Thereafter, he commenced proceedings against the Secretary of State, submitting that the United Kingdom had failed adequately to transpose the directive. The national court decided to stay the proceedings and refer a number of questions for preliminary ruling to the Court of Justice of the European Communities under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty),

<sup>a</sup> Article 1(4) of the directive is set out at judgment para 4, below

concerning: (i) the nature of the body which the member states were required to establish in order to implement the directive; (ii) the remedies which had to be available to victims; (iii) whether interest was payable on the sums awarded by the body; (iv) whether costs incurred by victims pursuing claims for compensation had to be reimbursed; and (v) possible liability for failure correctly to transpose the directive. a

Held – (1) A body was to be regarded as authorised by a member state within the meaning of art 1(4) of the directive where its obligation to provide compensation to victims derived from an agreement concluded between that body and a public authority of the member state and where victims might apply to the body for the compensation guaranteed to them by the directive. Although legislative action on the part of each member state was not necessarily required in order to implement a directive, it was essential for national law to guarantee that the national authorities would effectively apply the directive in full, that the legal position under national law was sufficiently precise and clear, that individuals were made fully aware of all their rights and, where appropriate, that they might rely on them before the national courts. So far as relevant to the main proceedings, the directive contained no provision concerning the legal status of the body or the detailed arrangements for its authorisation. Further, it expressly allowed the member states to regard compensation by the body as subsidiary and enabled them to make provision for the settlement of claims between that body and those responsible for the accident and for relations with other insurers or social security bodies required to compensate the victim in respect of the same accident. Therefore, the fact that the source of the obligation was in an agreement concluded between the body and a public authority was immaterial (see judgment paras 32, 34, 35, 37, below). b

(2) The procedural arrangements of the MIB were sufficient to provide the protection to which victims were entitled under the directive, save to the extent that the procedure had to guarantee that, both in dealings with the MIB and before the arbitrator, victims were made aware of, and given the opportunity to comment on, any matter that might be used against them. Whether that reservation had been fulfilled remained to be determined by the national court. Since the directive had confined itself to laying down minimum procedural requirements, it was for the domestic legal system of each member state to designate the courts and tribunals having jurisdiction and to lay down the detailed procedural rules governing actions intended to safeguard rights derived under Community law. However, such rules as were adopted had to fulfil the requirements of the principles of equivalence and effectiveness. So far as the principle of effectiveness was concerned, each case had to be analysed by reference to the role of the particular provision in the procedure, its progress and its special features, viewed as a whole, before the various national instances. Further, the basic principles of the domestic judicial system, such as protection of the rights of the defence, the principle of legal certainty and the proper conduct of procedure, had to be taken into consideration, where appropriate. In the main proceedings, although the MIB was not a court, the procedure established gave victims the advantages of speed and economy of legal costs, and the procedural arrangements laid down by national law did not render it practically impossible or excessively difficult to exercise the right to compensation conferred on victims by the directive. Therefore, those rules complied with the principle of effectiveness. Further, in the light of the c
d
e
f
g
h
i

- a objective pursued by the directive—which was to provide a simple mechanism for compensating victims—the cumulative effect of the possibilities of review available under the procedure and practical advantages associated with it conferred on victims a level of protection corresponding to that provided for by that directive (see judgment paras 44–46, 53–58, below).
- b (3) On the proper interpretation of art 1(4) of the directive, compensation paid by the authorised body had to take account of the effluxion of time until actual payment of the sums awarded. Although the directive contained no provision concerning interest, compensation for the purposes of the directive was intended, so far as possible, to provide restitution for the victim of an accident, taking account of factors, such as the effluxion of time, which might reduce its value. However, in order to compensate for the loss suffered by
- c victims as a result of the effluxion of time, member states were free to choose between awarding interest or paying compensation in the form of aggregate sums which took account of the effluxion of time (see judgment paras 65–68, 70, 71, below); Grifoni v European Atomic Energy Community Case C-308/87 [1994] ECR I-341 and Marshall v Southampton and South West Hampshire Area Health Authority (No 2) Case C-271/91 [1993] 4 All ER 586 applied.
- d (4) On the proper interpretation of art 1(4) of the directive, compensation paid by the authorised body was not required to include reimbursement of the costs incurred by victims in connection with the processing of their application, save to the extent to which such reimbursement was necessary to safeguard the rights derived by victims from the directive in conformity with
- e the principles of equivalence and effectiveness. The directive contained no provision concerning reimbursement of costs. Further, in the views of most of the member states, reimbursement of costs was a procedural matter. Therefore, in the absence of Community rules governing the matter, it was for the domestic legal system of each member state to lay down the detailed
- f procedural rules governing actions for safeguarding rights which individuals derive from Community law, in conformity with the principles of equivalence and effectiveness (see judgment paras 74–76, 77, below).
- g (5) If examination by the national court of the existing compensation system disclosed a defect in the transposition of the directive and, if that defect had adversely affected the claimant in the main proceedings, it was incumbent on the national court to determine whether the breach of the obligation of
- h transposition was sufficiently serious for the member state to be required to make reparation to the claimant. In that determination, all the factors characterising the situation had to be taken into account, including, in particular, the clarity and precision of the rule infringed, whether the infringement or the damage caused was intentional or involuntary, whether
- i any error of law was excusable or inexcusable, and whether the fact that the position taken by a Community institution had contributed to the adoption or maintenance of national measures or practices contrary to Community law. In principle, those criteria had to be applied by the national courts in accordance with the guidelines laid down by the Court of Justice (see judgment paras 83–88, below); Haim v Kassenzahnärztliche Vereinigung Nordrhein Case C-424/97 [2000] ECR I-5123, Brasserie du Pêcheur SA v Germany, R v Secretary of State for Transport, ex p Factortame Ltd Joined cases C-46/93 and C-48/93 [1996] All ER (EC) 301 and Francovich v Italy Joined cases C-6/90 and C-9/90 [1991] ECR I-5357 followed.

Notes

For awards under the Motor Insurers' Bureau (Compensation of Victims of Untraced Drivers) Agreement, see 25 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn 2003 reissue) para 760.

Cases cited

- Airey v Ireland* (1979) 2 EHRR 305, [1979] ECHR 6289/73, ECt HR. a
- Aprile Srl (in liq) v Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato* (No 2) Case C-228/96 [2000] 1 WLR 126, [1998] ECR I-7141, ECJ.
- Borker* (Reference for a preliminary decision brought by) Case 138/80 [1980] ECR 1975, ECJ.
- Brasserie du Pêcheur SA v Germany, R v Secretary of State for Transport, ex p Factortame Ltd* Joined cases C-46/93 and C-48/93 [1996] All ER (EC) 301, [1996] QB 404, [1996] 2 WLR 506, [1996] ECR I-1029, ECJ. c
- Brinkmann Tabakfabriken GmbH v Skatteministeriet* Case C-319/96 [1998] ECR I-5255, ECJ.
- Broekmeulen v Huisarts Registratie Commissie* Case 246/80 [1981] ECR 2311, ECJ.
- Bryan v UK* (1996) 21 EHRR 342, [1995] ECHR 19178/91, ECt HR. d
- Comet BV v Produktschap voor Siergewassen* Case 45/76 [1976] ECR 2043, ECJ.
- Coote v Granada Hospitality Ltd* Case C-185/97 [1998] All ER (EC) 865, [1998] ECR I-5199, ECJ.
- Dillenkofer v Germany* Joined cases C-178/94, C-179/94, C-188/94, C-189/94 and C-190/94 [1996] All ER (EC) 917, [1997] QB 259, [1997] 2 WLR 253, [1996] ECR I-4845, ECJ. e
- Dorsch Consult Ingenieurgesellschaft mbH v Bundesbaugesellschaft Berlin mbH* Case C-54/96 [1998] All ER (EC) 262, [1997] ECR I-4961, ECJ.
- EC Commission v Belgium* Case 247/85 [1987] ECR 3029, ECJ.
- EC Commission v Germany* Case 29/84 [1985] ECR 1661, ECJ.
- EC Commission v Netherlands* Case C-190/90 [1992] ECR I-3265, ECJ. f
- EC Commission v Netherlands* Case C-339/87 [1990] ECR I-851, ECJ.
- Edilizia Industriale Siderurgica Srl (Edis) v Ministero delle Finanze* Case C-231/96 [1998] ECR I-4951, ECJ.
- European Commission v France* Case C-197/96 [1997] ECR I-1489, ECJ.
- European Commission v France* Case C-354/98 [1999] ECR I-4927, ECJ. g
- European Commission v Germany* Case C-217/97 [1999] ECR I-5087, ECJ.
- European Commission v Germany* Case C-96/95 [1997] ECR I-1653, ECJ.
- European Commission v Greece* Case C-365/93 [1995] ECR I-499, ECJ.
- European Commission v Netherlands* Case C-144/99 [2001] ECR I-3541, ECJ.
- Ferreira v Cia de Seguros Mundial Confianca SA* Case C-348/98 [2000] ECR I-6711, ECJ. h
- Francovich v Italy* Joined cases C-6/90 and C-9/90 [1991] ECR I-5357, ECJ.
- Grifoni v European Atomic Energy Community* Case C-308/87 [1994] ECR I-341, ECJ.
- Haim v Kassenzahnärztliche Vereinigung Nordrhein* Case C-424/97 [2000] ECR I-5123, ECJ. i
- Ireks-Arkady GmbH v Council of Ministers and Commission of the European Communities* Case C-238/78 [1979] ECR 2955, ECJ.
- Johnston v Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary* Case 222/84 [1986] 3 All ER 135, [1987] QB 129, [1986] 3 WLR 1038, [1986] ECR 1651, ECJ.
- Konle v Austria* Case C-302/97 [1999] ECR I-3099, ECJ.

- a* Marleasing SA v La Comercial Internacional de Alimentación SA Case C-106/89 [1990] ECR I-4135, ECJ.
Marshall v Southampton and South West Hampshire Area Health Authority (No 2) Case C-271/91 [1993] 4 All ER 586, [1994] QB 126, [1993] ECR I-4367, ECJ.
Nordsee Deutsche Hochseefischerei GmbH v Reederei Mond Hochseefischerei Nordstern AG & Co KG Case 102/81 [1982] ECR 1095, ECJ.
- b* Peterbroeck Van Campenhout & Cie (SCS) v Belgium Case C-312/93 [1996] All ER (EC) 242, [1995] ECR I-4599, ECJ.
R v HM Treasury, ex p British Telecommunications plc Case C-392/93 [1996] All ER (EC) 411, [1996] QB 615, [1996] 3 WLR 203, [1996] ECR I-1631, ECJ.
R v Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, ex p Hedley Lomas (Ireland) Ltd Case C-5/94 [1996] All ER (EC) 493, [1996] ECR I-2553, ECJ.
- c* R v Secretary of State for Social Security, ex p Sutton Case C-66/95 [1997] All ER (EC) 497, [1997] ECR I-2163, ECJ.
Rechberger v Austria Case C-140/97 [1999] ECR I-3499, ECJ.
Rewe-Zentralfinanz eG v Landwirtschaftskammer für das Saarland Case 33/76 [1976] ECR 1989, ECJ.
- d* Scarth v UK [1999] ECHR 33745/96, ECt HR.
Svenska Staten v Stockholm Lindopark AB, Stockholm Lindopark AB v Svenska Staten Case C-150/99 [2001] STC 103, [2001] ECR I-493, ECJ.
Union Nationale des Entraîneurs et Cadres Techniques Professionnels du Football (Unectef) v Heylens Case 222/86 [1987] ECR 4097, ECJ.
- e* Upjohn Ltd v Licensing Authority Case C-120/97 (2000) 51 BMLR 206, [1999] 1 WLR 927, [1999] ECR I-223, ECJ.
Van Schijndel v Stichting Pensioenfonds voor Fysiotherapeuten Joined cases C-430/93 and C-431/93 [1996] All ER (EC) 259, [1995] ECR I-4705, ECJ.
White v White [2001] UKHL 9, [2001] 2 All ER 43, [2001] 1 WLR 481.
Withers v Delaney Case C-158/01 [2002] ECR I-8301, ECJ.
- f*

Reference

- By order of 17 May 2000, the High Court of Justice of England and Wales, Queen's Bench Division, referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) five questions (set out at judgment para 19, below) on the interpretation of art 1(4) of Second Council Directive (EEC) 84/5 (on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to insurance against civil liability in respect of the use of motor vehicles) (hereinafter the Second Directive). Those questions were raised in proceedings between Samuel Sidney Evans and the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (hereinafter the Secretary of State) and the Motor Insurers' Bureau (hereinafter the MIB) concerning compensation for injuries suffered by Mr Evans in a road traffic accident involving an unidentified vehicle. written observations submitted on behalf of: Samuel Evans by R Plender QC and D Broatch, Barrister; the Motor Insurers' Bureau by D O'Brien QC and F Randolph, Barrister; the United Kingdom government by G Amodeo, acting as agent, P Roth QC and H Davies, Barrister; the Commission of the European Communities by C Tufvesson, C Ladenburger and M Shotter, acting as agents. Oral observations were submitted on behalf of: Samuel Evans, represented by R Plender and D Broatch; of the Motor Insurers' Bureau, represented by D O'Brien and F Randolph; of the United Kingdom government, represented by J E Collins, acting as agent, P Roth and H Davies; and of the Commission,
- g*
- h*
- i*

represented by M Shotter. The language of the case was English. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General. a 24 October 2002. The Advocate General (S Alber) delivered the following opinion<sup>1</sup>.

I—INTRODUCTION b

1. The present reference for a preliminary ruling submitted by the High Court of Justice of England and Wales, Queen's Bench Division, raises questions concerning the interpretation and application of the directives governing compulsory insurance against civil liability in respect of motor vehicles. The question in particular arises as to whether interest and costs are to be included in the compensation for injuries caused by an untraced vehicle which is provided by a body designated by a member state for that purpose. Clarification is also sought as to whether the solution adopted in Great Britain satisfies Community law requirements as to effective legal protection, whether the body responsible for compensation can be regarded as having been properly authorised within the meaning of the relevant directive, and whether possible shortcomings in the transposition of the relevant directive may constitute such a sufficiently serious breach of a member state's obligations as to found a claim for compensation against the defaulting state in accordance with principles of Community law. c
d

II—LEGAL FRAMEWORK e

A—Provisions of Community law

Council Directive (EEC) 72/166 (on the approximation of the laws of member states relating to insurance against civil liability in respect of the use of motor vehicles, and to the enforcement of the obligation to insure against such liability)<sup>2</sup> (the First Directive) f

2. Article 3(1) of the First Directive provides:

'Each Member State shall, subject to Article 4, take all appropriate measures to ensure that civil liability in respect of the use of vehicles normally based in its territory is covered by insurance. The extent of the liability covered and the terms and conditions of the cover shall be determined on the basis of these measures.' g

Council Directive (EEC) 84/5 (on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to insurance against civil liability in respect of the use of motor vehicles)<sup>3</sup> (the Second Directive)

3. Article 1(1) and (4) of the Second Directive provides: h

'1. The insurance referred to in Article 3(1) of Directive 72/166/EEC shall cover compulsorily both damage to property and personal injuries.

2. ...<sup>4</sup>

4. Each Member State shall set up or authorize a body with the task of providing compensation, at least up to the limits of the insurance obligation for damage to property or personal injuries caused by an i

1 Original language: German.

2 OJ English Sp Edn 1972 (II) p 360.

3 OJ 1984 L8 p 17.

4 Article 1(2) sets out the minimum amounts for compensation cover.

a unidentified vehicle or a vehicle for which the insurance obligation provided for in paragraph 1 has not been satisfied. This provision shall be without prejudice to the right of the Member States to regard compensation by that body as subsidiary or non-subsidiary and the right to make provision for the settlement of claims between that body and the person or persons responsible for the accident and other insurers or social security bodies required to compensate the victim in respect of the same accident.

b The victim may in any case apply directly to the body which, on the basis of information provided at its request by the victim, shall be obliged to give him a reasoned reply regarding the payment of any compensation ...

c Member States may limit or exclude the payment of compensation by that body in the event of damage to property by an unidentified vehicle.

They may also authorize, in the case of damage to property caused by an uninsured vehicle an excess of not more than 500 ECU for which the victim may be responsible.

d Furthermore, each Member State shall apply its laws, regulations and administrative provisions to the payment of compensation by this body, without prejudice to any other practice which is more favourable to the victim.'

B—Rules of the member state

e 4. In view of the lack of cover for personal injuries caused by uninsured or untraced drivers, the Motor Insurers' Bureau was established in 1946 in Great Britain by insurers providing compulsory motor vehicle insurance in agreement with the Ministry of Transport. The Motor Insurers' Bureau (the MIB) is a private law entity whose members are private law insurance companies offering motor vehicle insurance.

f 5. The obligation to pay compensation for injuries caused by uninsured or untraced drivers results from agreements concluded between the MIB and the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions<sup>5</sup>. The agreements have been frequently amended or adapted over the course of the years. Reference should be made at this point to the Motor Insurers' Bureau (Compensation of Victims of Uninsured Drivers) Agreement<sup>6</sup> of 21 December 1988 and to the Motor Insurers' Bureau (Compensation of Victims of Untraced Drivers) Agreement of 22 November 1972, in its 1977 amended version, which is the agreement in issue in the present case. This latter agreement will hereinafter be referred to as the Agreement on Untraced Drivers or simply as the Agreement.

g 6. The 1972 Agreement material to the present dispute provides essentially as follows:

h —The Agreement is to apply to any case in which an application is made to the MIB for a payment in respect of the death of or bodily injury to any person caused by or arising out of the use of a motor vehicle on a road in Great Britain where, subject to certain conditions which are not relevant to this case, the applicant for the payment is unable to trace any person responsible for the death or injury (cl 1).

i —On any application in a case to which the Agreement applies, the MIB is to award payment of an amount which is to be assessed in the same way as a court, applying as appropriate the laws in force in Great Britain, would assess the damages which the applicant would have been entitled to recover from the untraced person (cl 3). a

<sup>5</sup> Hereinafter also referred to as 'the Secretary of State for Transport'.

<sup>6</sup> Hereinafter also referred to as 'the Agreement on Uninsured Drivers'.

—The MIB must cause any application for a payment under the Agreement to be investigated and decide whether to make an award (cl 7).

—Where the MIB decides to make an award, it must notify the applicant of the amount it proposes to pay and the way in which that amount has been calculated. Where the applicant decides to accept the award, the MIB must pay to the applicant the amount of the award (c11 9 and 10). b

—The applicant is to have a right of appeal to an arbitrator against any decision of the MIB (cl 11).

—Before lodging an appeal, the applicant may make comments to the MIB on its decision and may supply further evidence relating to the application. The MIB may investigate that new evidence and must inform the applicant of the result of such investigation and of any change in its decision (cl 13). c

—On appeal, the arbitrator is to decide whether the MIB should make an award under the Agreement and, if so, the amount which it should award to the applicant (cl 16). d

—The arbitrator is to be selected from two panels of Queen's Counsel appointed respectively by the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Advocate (cl 18).

—The arbitrator is to decide the appeal on the documents submitted to him, although he may ask the MIB to make any further investigation which he considers desirable, and the applicant may submit comments on the findings of such investigation (cl 17). e

—Each party to the appeal is to bear its own costs (cl 21). The MIB is to pay the arbitrator's fees, except where it appears to the arbitrator that there were no reasonable grounds for the appeal, in which case he may decide that his fee ought to be paid by the applicant (cl 22).

7. The Agreement makes no express provision for payment of interest on the compensation awarded or for reimbursement of costs incurred in the proceedings before the MIB. f

III—FACTS AND PROCEDURE

8. The claimant in the national proceedings, Samuel Sidney Evans (the claimant), was injured in a road traffic accident on 25 December 1991. He was struck by a car while bending down on the roadside into his parked car in order to locate and remove a parcel. The driver of the vehicle which struck him could not be traced. g

9. On 11 June 1992 the claimant applied for compensation from the MIB on foot of the Agreement. The MIB informed the claimant on 11 January 1996 that it had decided to set compensation at £50,000. The claimant appealed to an arbitrator against that decision in accordance with the procedure set out in the Agreement. h

10. On 27 August 1996 the arbitrator gave her decision. She decided that the claimant's damages on a full liability basis should be £58,286. In view of the victim's contributory negligence—presumably being on the roadside when removing items from his vehicle—those damages were to be reduced by 20%, resulting in an award of £46,629. Taking into account certain evidence, specifically video footage subsequently taken by a private detective purporting to show that the claimant's impediment in walking was not so significant, the arbitration decision proceeded on the basis that the claimant had been i a dishonest and for that reason ordered him to pay the arbitrator's fees (reference is made in this connection to cl 22, cited in para 6, above). No interest was payable on the compensation.

11. The MIB paid to the claimant the amount of £46,629 together with £770 for the costs of his legal representation and an ex gratia payment of £150 and value added tax.

b 12. The claimant applied on 16 September 1996 to the Commercial Court for leave to appeal against the arbitration decision. He was granted leave to appeal on 16 December 1996 in regard to the question whether the arbitrator had jurisdiction to award interest. His appeal was dismissed on 29 July 1997. A further appeal brought by the claimant was dismissed by the Court of Appeal on 30 September 1998. The Court of Appeal ([1999] 1 CMLR 1251) stated that what the United Kingdom had done by way of implementation of the Second Directive 'did not bring into existence any entity or relationship which enabled the Directive to be enforced against anybody (save possibly in the Francovich sense against itself)'. On 18 January 1999 the House of Lords refused leave for a further appeal.

c 13. On 25 February 1999 the claimant commenced proceedings against the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, that is to say, the Ministry responsible, on grounds of failure to implement, or defective implementation of, the First and Second Directives. The claimant first of all argues that the United Kingdom has failed to set up or authorise a body—at any rate in a form complying with the principle of legal certainty—with the task of providing compensation in accordance with art 1(4) of the Second Directive. Had that directive been correctly implemented, no court could otherwise have ruled that the MIB was not under an obligation to award compensation in accordance with the First or Second Directives. The claimant further argued that the relevant Agreement between the MIB and the Secretary of State for Transport does not provide for compensation 'at least up to the limits of the insurance obligation'—as is set out in the directive—that it confers no right on victims of untraced drivers to bring a claim against the MIB, and that it grants them no access to judicial bodies.

d 14. The claimant contends that he has suffered loss as a result of the defects in implementation and that those defects constitute a sufficiently grave and manifest breach of Community law to found a right for him to recover damages from the Secretary of State.

e 15. It was against this background that the High Court, by order of 17 May 2000, referred the following questions to the court for a preliminary ruling:

f (1) On the proper interpretation of Council Directive 84/5/EEC of 30 December 1983 on the approximation of the laws of the Member States relating to insurance against civil liability in respect of the use of motor vehicles (the Second Motor Insurance Directive):

g (a) must the arrangements concerning the provision of compensation by the body established or authorised pursuant to Article 1(4) include provision for the payment of interest on the sums found to be payable for the damage to property or personal injuries?

h (b) if the answer to question (a) is yes, from what date and on what basis should such interest be calculated?

i (2) On the proper interpretation of Article 1(4) of the Second Motor Insurance Directive, in circumstances where the compensating body itself has an obligation to investigate the victim's injury and loss (and to incur the costs thereof, including the cost of medical and other reports): a

(a) must the arrangements concerning the provision of compensation by the body include provision for the payment of the costs incurred by a victim in preparing and making his application to that body for compensation? b

(b) if the answer to question (a) is yes, on what basis are those costs to be calculated in a case where that body has made an offer to the victim in excess of the amount that he finally recovers, which offer the victim declined to accept? b

(3) On the proper interpretation of Article 1(4) of the Second Motor Insurance Directive, if the victim's application for compensation is determined by a body that is not a court, must he have a full right to appeal against that determination to a court, on both the facts and the law, rather than an appeal to an independent arbitrator having the following principal characteristics: c

(i) the victim may appeal to the arbitrator on both the facts and the law;

(ii) when giving notice of appeal, the victim may make further representations and adduce further evidence to the compensating body upon which the compensating body may alter its award prior to the appeal; d

(iii) the victim is provided in advance with a copy of all the material to be provided to the arbitrator and is given the opportunity to add any material that he wishes in response;

(iv) the arbitrator makes an award, without an oral hearing, in which he or she decides what award the compensating body ought to make and gives reasons for that decision; e

(v) if the victim is dissatisfied, he is entitled to appeal from the arbitrator to the Courts but he may do so only on the grounds of serious irregularity affecting the arbitration or on a question of law (including whether there was any evidence to support any particular conclusion of the arbitrator or whether any particular conclusion was one to which no arbitrator could reasonably come upon the evidence), and in the case of an appeal on a question of law, permission to appeal must be obtained from the Court which will not be given unless the decision of the arbitrator is obviously wrong and it is just and proper in all the circumstances for the Court to determine the question. f

(4) If the answer to questions (1)(a) and/or (2)(a) and/or (3) is yes, has a Member State duly authorised a body under Article 1(4) of the Second Motor Insurance Directive when an existing body has the task of providing compensation to victims pursuant only to an agreement with the relevant authority of the Member State that does not correspond to the Second Motor Insurance Directive in those respects, and: g

(a) that agreement creates a legal obligation owed to the relevant authority of the Member State to provide compensation to victims which is directly enforceable by the relevant authority and does not give such victims a directly enforceable legal right to claim against that body, but the victim may apply to the Court for an order that the authority should enforce the agreement if the authority were to fail to do so; and h

(b) that body carries out that obligation by accepting and paying claims from victims in accordance with that agreement; and i

a (c) the Member State considered in good faith that the provision of that agreement gave at least as good protection to victims as the requirements of the Second Motor Insurance Directive?

b (5) If the answer to any of questions (1)(a) or (2)(a) or (3) is yes, and/or if the answer to question (4) is no, does a failure to comply with the Second Motor Insurance Directive in that respect constitute a sufficiently serious breach by the Member State to give rise to liability for damages as a matter of Community law if it is established that such damage was caused?

c 16. The claimant, the United Kingdom government, which is also representing the defendant in the main proceedings, the MIB, as intervener in the main proceedings in support of the form of order sought by the defendant, and the Commission of the European Communities took part in the procedure before the court.

IV—ANALYSIS

d 17. Counsel for the claimant pointed out during the oral procedure that, irrespective of the content and order of the questions submitted for preliminary ruling, the claimant's view is that the United Kingdom has failed to implement, or failed correctly to implement, the Second Directive in its national law. Central to the case, it is submitted, is the question whether a member state is under an obligation to pay compensation to a private individual who belongs to the group of persons deriving entitlement under the directive, in the case where the member state has failed to take such steps as would enable those persons to invoke the directive against any other party whomsoever.

e 18. For reasons of clarity, however, the questions submitted for preliminary ruling will be examined according to their given order.

f 1. Payment of interest and reimbursement of costs—the first and second questions

Submissions of the parties

19. The arguments relating to the first and second questions are in large measure parallel, and may for that reason be set out together.

g 20. The claimant takes the view that a textual interpretation of art 1(1) and (4) of the Second Directive in conjunction with art 3(1) of the First Directive shows that, where personal injuries are caused by an untraced driver, the authorised body must provide compensation—at least up to the limits of the insurance obligation—in a similar amount and in accordance with the same conditions as the law of the member state concerned provides in the case of injuries caused by an identified and insured driver. This interpretation is supported by the fact that where the Second Directive intends victims of untraced drivers to be treated differently from victims of uninsured drivers it does so expressly, as in the case of damage to property.

h 21. Moreover, even if the Second Directive had not itself required equal treatment for victims of untraced drivers, on the one hand, and victims of insured or uninsured drivers, on the other hand, that obligation would in any event follow from the principle of equal treatment. In the United Kingdom, however, victims of untraced drivers are not treated on an equal footing with victims of drivers who are insured or insufficiently insured. Unlike the latter, and without objective justification, they do not receive damages that include interest and costs and they do not enjoy the same procedural guarantees, including access to the courts.

22. Citing the court's judgment in Marshall v Southampton and South West Hampshire Area Health Authority (No 2)<sup>7</sup>, in which the court ruled, with regard to discriminatory dismissal, that the award of interest must be regarded as an essential component of compensation, the claimant submits that that principle must also apply to the compensation payable to victims of untraced drivers pursuant to the Second Directive. a

23. The same considerations, he continues, apply equally to the award of costs. This is, moreover, supported by the case law of the European Court of Human Rights, which has held that the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) (the ECHR) is intended to guarantee rights that are practical and effective<sup>8</sup>. b

24. The United Kingdom government takes the view that the relevant provisions of the two directives demonstrate that their purpose is to provide specified minimum guarantees, but that they do not provide for uniformity in the legislation of member states. Neither directive contains any provision relating to the financial components of compensation or provides that the body responsible for paying that compensation is required to pay the same amount as the victim of an insured driver would receive before the courts of the member state. A difference in treatment of the two groups of persons in national law is, it submits, objectively justified by the fact that the body required to provide compensation is not a tortfeasor, still less a tortfeasor wrongfully withholding money that ought to have been paid to the claimant. The final subparagraph of art 1(4) of the Second Directive allows for a difference in treatment. c

25. Citing the court's judgment in R v Secretary of State for Social Security, ex p Sutton<sup>9</sup>, the United Kingdom government argues that there is no general principle of Community law that a requirement to pay a monetary amount by way of compensation due under Community law necessarily entails a requirement to pay interest. The same considerations, it continues, must also apply to the reimbursement of costs. d

26. The MIB essentially takes the same position as the United Kingdom government. The MIB first points out, however, that in English law damages are assessed by the courts at the time of judgment. Section 35A of the Supreme Court Act 1981 broke with common law in giving courts the power, under certain conditions, to award interest on claims for damages. That power, however, can be exercised only in court proceedings. e

27. The Commission argues in the first place that neither the First nor the Second Directive contains any express rule on the payment of interest or reimbursement of costs. Nor do they contain any provision as to whether interest and costs form part of compulsory insurance. f

28. The Commission goes on to examine whether art 1(4) of the Second Directive allows a member state to treat one category of victims less favourably than another. It takes the view in this regard that—subject to express exceptions—the Second Directive does, in the light of its overall objective, impose an obligation to ensure that victims of uninsured or untraced drivers are given the same degree of cover as victims covered by compulsory insurance. g

7 Case C-271/91 [1993] 4 All ER 586, [1993] ECR I-4367 (para 31).

8 See Airey v Ireland (1979) 2 EHRR 305.

9 Case C-66/95 [1997] All ER (EC) 497, [1997] ECR I-2163.

- a 29. The Commission concludes by examining whether a member state's national rules which make no provision for the award of interest to victims of untraced drivers runs counter to the concept of 'adequate compensation' which is the objective of the Second Directive. In that regard, it refers, first, to the court's case law in favour of awarding interest in the contexts of non-contractual liability of the Community<sup>10</sup> and equal treatment of men and women<sup>11</sup>. Second, the Commission refers to the objectives of the Second Directive as set out in the preamble thereto. Article 1(4), it observes, defines the areas in which member states have a discretion to limit compensation, none of which mentions excluding interest. In view of those factors, the Commission tends to the view that the award of interest in accordance with the applicable national rules must be regarded as an essential component of the compensation referred to in art 1(4) of the Second Directive.

Appraisal

- d 30. In order to examine whether interest and costs form part of the amount which a body within the meaning of art 1(4) of the Second Directive must provide in respect of injuries caused by an untraced vehicle<sup>12</sup>, we must initially proceed on the basis of the wording of the First and Second Directives. Neither of those directives makes express reference to interest and costs. Article 1(1) of the Second Directive refers, for the purpose of determining the subject matter of the insurance, to art 3(1) of the First Directive. This latter provision, however, also states merely that each member state must take all appropriate measures to ensure that civil liability in respect of the use of vehicles normally based in its territory is covered by insurance. According to that provision, '[t]he extent of the liability covered and the terms and conditions of the cover shall be determined on the basis of these measures'.

- f 31. With regard to the scope of the claim to compensation against the body within the meaning of art 1(4) of the Second Directive, this latter provision states that compensation must be provided 'at least up to the limits of the insurance obligation'. With regard to the scope of compulsory insurance, the fifth recital in the preamble to the Second Directive states that 'the amounts in respect of which insurance is compulsory must in any event guarantee victims adequate compensation irrespective of the Member State in which the accident occurred'<sup>13</sup>. It is thus necessary to examine whether, in the light of the substance and purpose of the provisions, 'compulsory insurance' covers inclusion of interest and costs. It will in this connection also be necessary to consider whether a claim for compensation may, by its nature, possibly require payment of interest and costs.

- g 32. One must first proceed on the assumption that determination of the scope of the obligation to provide cover on the basis of the First and Second Directives is in principle a matter for the member states<sup>14</sup>. Under the First 10 See Ireks-Arkady GmbH v Council of Ministers and Commission of the European Communities Case C-238/78 [1979] ECR 2955 (para 20) and Grifoni v European Atomic Energy Community Case C-308/87 [1994] ECR I-341 (para 40).

11 See Marshall's case (cited in footnote 7, above) (para 31).

12 In what follows, I shall refer to untraced vehicles as well as to untraced drivers. The differences in terminology are attributable to the fact that the directives refer to vehicles, whereas the Agreements between the MIB and the Secretary of State for Transport make reference to drivers.

13 My emphasis.

14 See Ferreira v Cia de Seguros Mundial Confianca SA Case C-348/98 [2000] ECR I-6711 (para 32). See also the order of 14 October 2002 in Withers v Delaney Case C-158/01 [2002] ECR I-8301 (para 18).

Directive this task was left exclusively to the member states. This is expressed not only in art 3(1) of the First Directive, but also along the same lines in art 3(2), which provides that each member state must, for example, take all appropriate measures to ensure that a contract of insurance covers any loss or injury caused in the territory of the other member states, in accordance with the legal provisions of those states. a

33. The disparities in regard to the extent of the obligation of insurance cover in the member states<sup>15</sup> have resulted in that obligation being compulsorily extended, within the framework of the Second Directive, to cover also damage to property<sup>16</sup>. Minimum amounts for the cover of persons and damage to property were also laid down<sup>17</sup>. The Third Directive<sup>18</sup> goes even further in this direction by imposing minimum requirements in regard to the group of persons to be covered by insurance<sup>19</sup>. b

34. Beyond these more stringent minimum requirements, however, it must be possible to proceed on the basis that it continues to be a matter for the member states to determine the characteristics of a compensation claim. Article 1(4), final subparagraph, of the Second Directive also expressly states, with regard to the body providing compensation, that each member state must apply its laws, regulations and administrative provisions to the payment of compensation by that body, without prejudice to any other practice which is more favourable to the victim. c

35. One might conduct a comparative law study of the rules governing compulsory insurance in force in the member states for the purpose of determining whether the award of interest and costs is normally included in compulsory insurance. Even if this were to indicate that interest and costs are generally included within the scope of compulsory insurance cover, this result need not necessarily apply for all member states. The reference to member states' own laws, regulations and administrative provisions would otherwise serve no purpose. d

36. It is for that reason necessary to address the question whether the nature of the claim for compensation might possibly indicate whether interest and costs have to be awarded. It is in principle a civil law claim to compensation that underlies compulsory insurance cover in respect of motor vehicles. The statutorily prescribed duty to have insurance cover is linked to this civil law claim and serves as the economic safeguard for a well-founded claim to compensation. e

37. A question may arise as to whether the legal nature of a claim changes in the case where the compensation for damage to property or personal injuries that have been suffered is to be provided by a body as defined in art 1(4) of the Second Directive. One can imagine various possibilities as to how a member state complies with its obligation to set up or authorise a body within the meaning of that provision. This could be an administrative body, a public entity or, as in the present case, an entity established under private law. The member f

15 See the third recital in the preamble to the Second Directive. g

16 See the fourth recital in the preamble to, and art 1(1) of, the Second Directive. h

17 See the fifth recital in the preamble to, and art 1(2) of, the Second Directive. i

18 Third Council Directive (EEC) 90/232 (on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to insurance against civil liability in respect of the use of motor vehicles) (OJ 1990 L129 p 33).

19 See art 1 of Directive 90/232.

a state must in any event confer the task on that body. It is thus conceivable that the nature of the claim will depend on the body against which it may be brought.

38. Article 1(4) of the Second Directive, however, expressly states: 'This provision shall be without prejudice to the right of the Member States to regard compensation by that body as subsidiary or non-subsidiary and the right to make provision for the settlement of claims between that body and the person or persons responsible for the accident ...'

39. This wording indicates that the method of proceeding vis-à-vis the body cannot be considered in isolation from the original claim for compensation. This argues in favour of treating any derived claims as also being claims in civil law. This approach is further reinforced by the fact that in the present case the legal context is one of private law. Thus, the agreements between the MIB and the Secretary of State for Transport are private law agreements and the MIB is an entity established under private law. For the purposes of further examination, therefore, we should for the moment proceed on the assumption that the case involves a private law claim for compensation.

40. The court's case law provides some indications as to the degree to which interest constitutes a necessary component in a claim for compensation. Marshall's case<sup>20</sup>, to which the parties refer, concerned 'adequate reparation'<sup>21</sup> for the loss and damage sustained as the result of dismissal which discriminated on grounds of sex, and thus related to a claim for compensation in civil law. The legal system of the member state concerned in that case laid down an upper limit for compensation of that kind. The courts, moreover, did not appear to have the power to award interest on the amounts of compensation<sup>22</sup>. The court ruled in this regard 'that full compensation for the loss and damage sustained as a result of discriminatory dismissal cannot leave out of account factors, such as the effluxion of time, which may in fact reduce its value. The award of interest, in accordance with the applicable national rules, must therefore be regarded as an essential component of compensation for the purposes of restoring real equality of treatment.'<sup>23</sup>

41. The Ireks-Arkady case<sup>24</sup> concerned the extent in principle of entitlement to interest in the context of a claim for compensation resulting from the Community's non-contractual liability under the second paragraph of art 215 of the EEC Treaty (now art 288 EC). In a judgment confirming the duty to provide compensation, the court derived the existence of entitlement to interest from the general principles of law common to the legal systems of the member states<sup>25</sup>.

42. The court reached the same conclusion in Grifoni's case<sup>26</sup>. The event occasioning injury which led to the dispute in that case was an accident. The court ruled: '... compensation for loss is intended so far as possible to provide restitution for the victim of an accident. Accordingly, it is necessary to take

i 20 Cited in footnote 7, above.

21 See Marshall's case (cited in footnote 7, above) (para 30).

22 See Marshall's case (cited in footnote 7, above) (para 6).

23 See Marshall's case (cited in footnote 7, above) (para 31).

24 Cited in footnote 10, above.

25 See the Ireks-Arkady case (cited in footnote 10, above) (para 20 and para 2 of the operative part).

26 Cited in footnote 10, above.

account of inflation since the event occasioning loss.<sup>27</sup> The court recognised a right to interest with effect from the pronouncement of the judgment. a

43. The three cases just considered involved compensation claims resting on a variety of legal bases. Common to the judgments, however, is the fact that the court in principle recognised, under conditions to be determined in more detail, interest as being a characteristic of a claim for compensation.

44. In support, however, of the contention that interest is in fact not a necessary component of a claim for compensation, reference was made in the written procedure to the judgment in Ex p Sutton<sup>28</sup>. That judgment, however, concerned the question whether interest was payable on arrears of social security benefits in the case where failure to pay them timeously was attributable to procedures that discriminated on grounds of sex. The court ruled in this regard: '... amounts paid by way of social security benefit are not compensatory in nature'<sup>29</sup>, with the result that payment of interest cannot be required on the basis either of Article 6 of Directive 76/207 or of Article 6 of Directive 79/7.<sup>30</sup> The court left open the question whether entitlement to interest might follow from a claim under Community law establishing liability on the part of the member state, referring in that regard to national law.<sup>31</sup> b
c
d

45. As the present case, however, essentially involves a claim for compensation and not social security benefits, the Sutton judgment cannot be adduced as an argument for excluding from the outset a claim for interest. Rather, it may be inferred from the case law on compensation claims that has been set out<sup>32</sup> that interest does indeed form part of a claim for compensation.

46. Before applying this principle to the present case, it is first necessary to consider whether the objectives of the directives support this view. e

47. The directives on compulsory insurance cover for motor vehicles lay down minimum standards to protect victims of traffic accidents. The First Directive initially dealt only with the scope of insurance protection. This must be considered in the context of the declared objective of '[liberalising] the rules regarding the movement of persons and motor vehicles travelling between Member States'<sup>33</sup>. f

48. It was not until the Second Directive that victims of untraced vehicles were made the subject of Community law rules. Through the establishment or authorisation of a body having the task of providing compensation 'at least up to the limits of the insurance obligation'<sup>34</sup>, clear reference is being made to the normal obligation to compensate those injured by insured vehicles. The criterion for the scope of compensation to be provided is thus to be the compensation payable in cases of injury occasioned by insured vehicles. In so far as the directive makes exceptions to this rule, these are expressly mentioned and objectively justified. g

49. Only the fourth subparagraph of art 1(4) deals with the regulation of damage or injury caused by untraced vehicles. Member states may, under that provision, limit or exclude payment of compensation by that body in the event h

27 See Grifoni's case (cited in footnote 10, above) (para 40).

28 Cited in footnote 9, above.

29 My emphasis. i

30 See Sutton's case (cited in footnote 9, above) (para 27).

31 See Sutton's case (cited in footnote 9, above) (para 33 and the operative part).

32 See paras 40–42, above.

33 See the fifth recital in the preamble to the First Directive.

34 See art 1(4) of the Second Directive.

a of damage to property. As stated expressly in the preamble<sup>35</sup>, member states are given this possibility in order to counter the 'danger of fraud'.

50. This exception aside, we must proceed on the assumption that victims of untraced vehicles are compensated to the same extent as victims of traced and insured vehicles. The fact that this is a minimum requirement is evident, first of all, from the use of the phrase 'at least up to the limits of the insurance obligation'<sup>36</sup>. Second, the wording of the final subparagraph of art 1(4) of the Second Directive—which states 'without prejudice to any other practice which is more favourable to the victim'—suggests that minimum protection must be afforded by the directive to victims of untraced vehicles.

51. In order to be able to answer the question concerning award of interest and reimbursement of costs for the case in hand, the issue is thus how one proceeds in cases of damage or injury caused by insured vehicles. If interest and costs are paid as a matter of course in such cases, victims of accidents caused by untraced vehicles must also be entitled to receive such payments.

52. The United Kingdom government has submitted that there are objective reasons for the disparities in the treatment of victims of insured vehicles, on the one hand, and those of untraced vehicles, on the other. Against this, one might argue that, even though the procedure for obtaining compensation may in principle be different, the scope of compensation still may not be below that accorded to victims of properly insured vehicles.

53. The United Kingdom government's invocation of the final subparagraph of art 1(4) of the Second Directive, which states that 'Furthermore, each Member State shall apply its laws, regulations and administrative provisions to the payment of compensation by this body', leads to no other conclusion. That provision does, it is true, refer to the laws, regulations and administrative provisions of the member states. That said, however, the principles developed by the court in its established case law must be taken into account when giving effect to Community law, in casu the minimum protection afforded to victims of untraced motor vehicles.

54. This involves the principles of equivalence and effectiveness. These principles, recognised as such only in the more recent case law of the court<sup>37</sup>, are based on established case law stretching back far into the past<sup>38</sup>. Those principles state that proceedings to ensure the legal protection of rights which individuals derive from Community law must not be less favourable than the rules governing similar domestic actions and must not render virtually impossible or excessively difficult the exercise of rights conferred by Community law<sup>39</sup>.

55. If interest and costs are awarded in cases involving compulsory insurance before national courts in cases in which traffic accidents have been caused by insured vehicles, that must, in accordance with the principles just mentioned, 35 See the sixth recital in the preamble to the Second Directive.

36 See art 1(4) of the Second Directive; my emphasis.

37 See, for example, Edilizia Industriale Siderurgica Srl (Edis) v Ministero delle Finanze Case C-231/96 [1998] ECR I-4951 (para 34), Aprile Srl (in liq) v Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato (No 2) Case C-228/96 [2000] 1 WLR 126, [1998] ECR I-7141 (para 18), Upjohn Ltd v Licensing Authority Case C-120/97 (2000) 51 BMLR 206, [1999] ECR I-223 (para 32).

38 See, for example, Rewe-Zentralfinanz eG v Landwirtschaftskammer für das Saarland Case 33/76 [1976] ECR 1989 (para 5) and Comet BV v Produktschap voor Siergewassen Case 45/76 [1976] ECR 2043 (paras 12–16).

39 See Peterbroeck Van Campenhout & Cie (SCS) v Belgium Case C-312/93 [1996] All ER (EC) 242, [1995] ECR I-4599 (para 12) and the case law there cited.

also apply in compensation proceedings brought by victims of untraced vehicles. This requirement follows from the Second Directive in conjunction with the principles governing the application of Community law. a

56. This result cannot be altered by the fact that the MIB was in existence well before the Second Directive was adopted and that the agreement between the MIB and the Secretary of State for Transport relating to untraced drivers already existed some considerable time before the Second Directive entered into force. Article 1(4) of the Second Directive makes express reference to authorisation of a body, thus raising a presumption that such bodies and associated regulatory provisions may already exist in some member states. This, however, does not release the legislative authorities of the member states from their duty to provide the minimum standard for compensation rules required by the directive. In so far as victims of untraced vehicles are in a worse position than victims of properly insured vehicles, the problem might be one of incorrect transposition of the directive, an issue to which I shall be returning. b

57. As an interim conclusion with regard to the first and second questions, it may be stated that interest and costs are a necessary component of compensation claims brought by victims of untraced vehicles if and to the extent to which such interest and costs form part of claims for compensation brought by victims of properly insured and identified vehicles. This finding holds good in regard to both the substance and the payment details. c

58. The United Kingdom government and the MIB argue that under the system of domestic law interest and costs do not really form part of a claim for compensation but that the courts have been statutorily empowered to award interest. d

59. In this connection, an economic approach is called for in the comparison of the scope of compensation in respect of damage or injury caused by untraced vehicles, on the one hand, and damage or injury caused by properly insured vehicles, on the other. If, in respect of the same damage or injury, a lower amount is in principle payable depending on the person who has caused that damage or injury, that cannot, when considered against the background of the requirements of Community law, be justified by arguments based on the domestic legal system. e

60. The objection put forward by the United Kingdom government and the MIB to the effect that interest can be awarded by courts alone implies further that no interest is in principle awarded in respect of periods prior to the delivery of a judgment. f

61. The crucial point in the calculation of interest on a compensation claim is essentially the point in time taken as the reference point. This may be the event occasioning the damage or injury, but it may also be the delivery of a judgment, if, for example, the extent of damage, account being taken of the effluxion of time<sup>40</sup>, is defined in the judgment. It is also in this sense that one may presumably construe the above<sup>41</sup> judgments in the Ireks-Arkady case<sup>42</sup> and Grifoni's case<sup>43</sup>. The procedures normally obtaining in the member state concerned may in principle be applied provided that the outcome is not less favourable for legal positions that are based on Community law. g

40 See Marshall's case (cited in footnote 7, above) (para 31).

41 See paras 41 and 42.

42 Cited in footnote 10, above.

43 Cited in footnote 10, above. h a 62. If this is applied to the present case, however, a problem will arise if interest is awarded only by courts but access to courts is rendered unduly difficult. The procedure might then in itself pose a problem in Community law terms. I shall return to this problematic area in what follows.

b 63. In cl 3 of the agreement applying in the present proceedings (see para 6, above), it is stated, however, that compensation to be paid by the MIB is to be assessed in the same way as a court would assess damages. The objection that interest can, if at all, be awarded only by a court may not therefore preclude a calculation of compensation which is in line with Community law.

c 64. For the sake of completeness, it should also be pointed out that, in the case of the payment of compensation under the agreement concerning uninsured drivers interest and costs may also be brought into the calculation. The fact that it is not the competent insurance company but rather a collective body which is liable for payment can therefore not serve as objective justification for a different calculation of compensation under the agreement in regard to untraced drivers.

d (2) The arbitration procedure—third question

Submissions of the parties

e 65. The claimant submits that the arbitration procedure provided for by the Agreement on Untraced Drivers satisfies neither the requirements of effective judicial control, as developed by the court in its judgment in Johnston v Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary<sup>44</sup>, nor those under art 6 of the ECHR<sup>45</sup> relating to the right to a 'fair trial'<sup>46</sup>. There is no hearing and an appeal against the arbitrator's decision is possible only on grounds of serious irregularity affecting the arbitration or on a question of law, subject, in the latter case, to the condition that leave to appeal is granted.

f 66. The difference in treatment in procedural terms, the claimant argues, also constitutes an infringement of the principle of equal treatment, which requires that victims of untraced drivers be afforded the same judicial protection in the United Kingdom as is afforded to victims of insured or uninsured drivers. The fact that the victim of an untraced driver has no driver to sue cannot constitute objective justification for discriminatory treatment. Moreover, the sole purpose of such discriminatory treatment in respect of victims of untraced drivers is to save costs.

g 67. The United Kingdom government and the MIB submit first of all that art 1(4) of the Second Directive prescribes only minimal procedural requirements. The victim must refer directly to the body responsible. The directive otherwise refers to the laws, regulations and administrative provisions of the member states.

h 68. With regard to the principle of effective judicial protection, the United Kingdom government argues that the legal procedures available to victims of untraced drivers, far from rendering the legal protection of such victims impossible or excessively difficult to enforce, provide them with multiple levels

i
<sup>44</sup> Case 222/84 [1986] 3 All ER 135, [1986] ECR 1651 (paras 18, 19).

<sup>45</sup> European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, signed in Rome on 4 November 1950 (the ECHR).

<sup>46</sup> See the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights (the Court of Human Rights) of 22 July 1999 in Scarth v UK [1999] ECHR 33745/96.

of protection. The fact that there is no hearing before the arbitrator did not prevent the claimant from setting out his case in full or from responding to the allegations of contributory negligence. a

69. As regards the principle of equal treatment, victims of untraced drivers are in several respects better placed than victims of uninsured drivers. The procedure adopted is liable to result in a speedier and less costly resolution than court proceedings. b

70. Both the United Kingdom government and the MIB express doubts, in regard to art 6 of the ECHR, as to whether the main proceedings involve 'civil rights and obligations'. In any event, according to the case law of the Court of Human Rights<sup>47</sup>, the proceedings must be considered a whole, including the role of any appellate courts. Even if the procedure before the MIB did not comply in full with the requirements of art 6 of the ECHR, that before the arbitrator does in any event comply with those requirements. The arbitrator's independence and impartiality are guaranteed and he exercises unlimited jurisdiction subject to supervision by the High Court. In view of the fact that no hearing takes place before the arbitrator, counsel for the United Kingdom government did, none the less, express some doubt during the oral procedure as to whether the arbitration procedure is compatible with art 6 of the ECHR. c

71. The Commission takes the view that art 1(4) of the Second Directive confers a right to compensation on victims of injuries caused by untraced drivers and that member states must therefore guarantee effective judicial protection of that right. The Commission goes on to consider whether the arbitration procedure satisfies the requirements of art 6 of the ECHR. On the basis of the information provided in the order for reference, and subject to the need for further clarification, it takes the view that the criteria developed by the Court of Human Rights point to some shortcomings in the arbitration procedure. These shortcomings relate in particular to the status of the arbitrator, in regard to his independence, the lack of any hearing and the very limited scope of the right of appeal against the arbitrator's award. d

Appraisal

72. By its third question, the High Court is seeking to ascertain whether the procedure to be followed under the agreement for obtaining compensation satisfies the requirements of Community law with regard to effective legal protection. Examination in this connection, however, is not confined to the procedure before the MIB, as set out in the agreement, for setting in motion the arbitration procedure, but also relates to the associated possibility of challenging the arbitration award, within certain limits, before ordinary courts, as demonstrated by part V of the third question in the reference. e

73. In order to address these issues, it is first necessary to examine the position under Community law, the vindication of which calls for legal protection. The starting point here is art 1(4) of the Second Directive, which should be read in conjunction with the sixth recital in the preamble to that Directive. The material passages are worded as follows: f

'Each Member State shall set up or authorize a body with the task of providing compensation ... for damage to property or personal injuries caused by an unidentified vehicle or a vehicle for which the insurance obligation ... has not been satisfied ...' g

47 See Bryan v UK (1996) 21 EHRR 342. h

- a The victim may in any case apply directly to the body which ... shall be obliged to give him a reasoned reply regarding the payment of any compensation.'

The sixth recital provides:

- b '... it is necessary to make provision for a body to guarantee that the victim will not remain without compensation where the vehicle which caused the accident is uninsured or unidentified ... it is important ... that the victim of such an accident should be able to apply directly to that body as a first point of contact ...'

- c 74. Apart from the possibility given to member states to impose a subsidiary status on the activity of this body<sup>48</sup>, a victim has a right to compensation at least up to the limits of the insurance obligation. This is a clearly designated legal position which Community law confers on those persons coming within the directive's definition.

- d 75. In order to give effect to this entitlement, effective legal protection must be guaranteed. While the directive does not expressly refer to a requirement of legal protection for this entitlement, this none the less follows from the general principles governing the application of Community law.

- e 76. The court has already on numerous occasions had the opportunity to set out its views on the principle of effective legal protection as a general legal principle in Community law. It was thus called on in Johnston's case<sup>49</sup> and Coote v Granada Hospitality Ltd<sup>50</sup> to address these issues against the background of the application of art 6 of the directive on equal treatment for men and women with regard to employment<sup>51</sup>. As the court ruled on this point in Johnston's case, the 'requirement of judicial control stipulated by that article reflects a general principle of law which underlies the constitutional traditions common to the member states. That principle is also laid down in arts 6 and 13 of the [ECHR]. As ... the court has recognised in its decisions, the principles on which that Convention is based must be taken into consideration in Community law'.<sup>52</sup>

- f 77. The court further stated in Johnston's case: 'It is for the member states to ensure effective judicial control as regards compliance with the applicable provisions of Community law and of national legislation intended to give effect to the rights for which the Directive provides.'<sup>53</sup>

- g 78. These fundamental considerations are in no way limited to the specific context of the Equal Treatment Directive but extend also to other areas of law, as the general formulation of the findings shows. In the context of the fundamental Community law on access to employment, the court, in Union

h

48 See the second sentence of art 1(4).

49 Cited in footnote 44, above.

50 Case C-185/97 [1998] All ER (EC) 865, [1998] ECR I-5199.

i 51 Council Directive (EEC) 76/207 (on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions) (OJ 1976 L39 p 40) (the Equal Treatment Directive).

52 See Johnston's case (cited in footnote 44, above) (para 18) and Coote's case (cited in footnote 50, above) (para 21).

53 See Johnston's case (cited in footnote 44, above) (para 19) and Coote's case (cited in footnote 50, above) (para 22).

Nationale des Entraîneurs et Cadres Techniques Professionnels du Football (Unectef) v Heylens<sup>54</sup>, referred, for example, to the statements of principle made in Johnston's case. a

79. Reference may be made to art 6 of the ECHR with regard to the substantive requirements of the principle of effective legal protection. The first sentence of art 6(1) provides: 'In the determination of his civil rights and obligations ... everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law.' b

80. Reference should also be made to art 47 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights<sup>55</sup>, which, admittedly, does not yet have any binding legal effect. It can, however, be used as a standard of comparison, at least in so far as it addresses generally recognised principles of law. According to its art 51, the Charter is also to apply to member states when implementing Union law. The first and second paragraphs of art 47 of the Charter provide as follows: c

'Everyone whose rights and freedoms guaranteed by the law of the Union are violated has the right to an effective remedy before a tribunal in compliance with the conditions laid down in this Article. d

Everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal previously established by law ...' e

81. Thus, the principle of effective legal protection laid down in Community law, on the one hand, contains the requirements set out in the provisions just cited and, on the other, imposes on courts and tribunals of the member states a duty to co-operate in guaranteeing that legal protection<sup>56</sup>. f

82. In order now to consider in detail whether the procedure enabling victims of untraced vehicles to obtain compensation satisfies the requirements of Community law, it is first necessary to examine the procedural requirements laid down by the Directive and also any further requirements resulting from the principle of effective legal protection. g

83. The second subparagraph of art 1(4) of the Second Directive must be treated as a minimum procedural requirement, stating as it does that the victim may in any case apply directly to the body, which must give him a reasoned reply regarding the payment of any compensation. These minimum conditions are satisfied inasmuch as an injured person may, under the agreement, directly have recourse to the MIB<sup>57</sup>, which must examine the application<sup>58</sup> and make a determination<sup>59</sup>. The United Kingdom government takes the view that no more extensive procedural requirements can be derived from the directive. h

84. As already indicated above, the directive also gives an injured person a substantive right, vindication of which by the courts also follows from Community law. It is thus necessary to examine whether the factors pointing to effective legal protection are present. Article 6 of the ECHR, already i

<sup>54</sup> Case 222/86 [1987] ECR 4097 (para 14).

<sup>55</sup> OJ 2000 C364 p 1.

<sup>56</sup> See the Peterbroeck case (cited in footnote 39, above) (para 12).

<sup>57</sup> Clause 1 states: '... this Agreement applies in any case in which an application is made to the MIB for a payment in respect of the death of or bodily injury to any person caused by or arising out of the use of a motor vehicle on a road in Great Britain ...' See also para 6, above.

<sup>58</sup> Clause 7 provides: 'MIB shall cause any application made to them for a payment under this Agreement to be investigated ...' See also para 6, above.

<sup>59</sup> Clause 9 provides: 'MIB shall notify their decision to the applicant ...' See also para 6, above.

a incorporated into Community law, and art 47 of the Fundamental Rights Charter, which cover in large measure the same substantive ground, may serve as a guideline for this purpose.

b 85. For the purpose of casting doubt on this method of proceeding, however, the United Kingdom government has pointed out that it is already questionable whether the rights of a victim are 'civil rights' within the meaning of art 6 of the ECHR. In the examination of the nature of the claim, for the purpose of drawing any conclusions as to the right to interest<sup>60</sup>, the civil law context of the claim for compensation was considered. On this basis, one ought here to be able to proceed on the basis of a claim in civil law. However, even if the claim is, for whatever reason, a claim for compensation under public law, this could not provide justification if the person injured remains deprived of legal protection in its enforcement. Moreover, no comparable restriction on civil law claims can be inferred from art 47 of the Fundamental Rights Charter either. It is thus sufficient if what is in issue is a right 'guaranteed by the law of the Union'. A claim for compensation under art 1(4) of the Second Directive must unquestionably be treated as being such a right.

d 86. A feature common to art 6 of the ECHR and art 47 of the Fundamental Rights Charter is that legal protection must be guaranteed by an independent and impartial court or tribunal established by law and also operating publicly in accordance with fair procedure.

e 87. The right of objection before the MIB, which initially concerns only a review of the proposed decision in the light of any further evidence adduced by the victim, does not meet the requirements of judicial control as thus defined. The first step in the objection procedure is comparable to administrative appeal proceedings. Neither the complete independence nor the impartiality of the body providing compensation can be assumed. The MIB takes a decision which—in so far as the victim accepts it—it must allow to be enforced against itself and which places it under obligations. However, the introduction of the right of objection under the agreement, which, as already pointed out<sup>61</sup>, is of a private law nature, cannot be classified as 'established by law'.

f 88. This would, however, have no negative implications if an avenue of legal redress against such a decision were available. In this it is necessary to agree with the United Kingdom government that the possibilities of legal protection must be considered from an overall perspective. As a first step, the focus must therefore be turned to the arbitration procedure, but consideration must not merely stop there.

g 89. First of all, the question arises as to whether the arbitration procedure provided for in the agreement is a judicial procedure. On the basis of the court's case law regarding the definition of the constituent factors that identify a court or tribunal for the purposes of art 177 of the EC Treaty (now art 234 EC), five identifying criteria may be mentioned. These are establishment on a statutory basis as a permanent body, mandatory jurisdiction, adversarial procedure and the application of legal rules<sup>62</sup>.

h 90. If we proceed on the basis that the arbitration procedure is laid down in the agreement between the MIB and the Secretary of State for Transport, the establishment of a tribunal on a statutory basis is already questionable. On the other hand, a tribunal need not necessarily be linked to the judicial organisation of the member state concerned<sup>63</sup>. However, if the arbitrator operates within the framework of the Arbitration Acts<sup>64</sup>, that might argue in favour of the tribunal having a legal basis.

60 See para 36 et seq. above.

61 See para 39, above.

62 See Broekmeulen v Huisarts Registratie Commissie Case 246/80 [1981] ECR 2311.

91. Under the agreement between the MIB and the Secretary of State for Transport, an arbitrator is appointed for arbitration proceedings on an ad hoc basis. It is therefore extremely problematic to consider this as a 'permanent body' unless one is to treat the existence of lists of potential arbitrators among the Queen's Counsel as a permanent body, recourse to the lists or invocation of the tribunal alone being dependent on practical requirements.

92. In contrast, the further characteristic of mandatory jurisdiction is satisfied—assuming that jurisdiction is accepted as such—given that—so far as one can conclude from all of the submissions in the present case—it is not possible to choose any other manner of challenging a decision of the MIB by way of judicial proceedings<sup>65</sup>.

93. On the other hand, it seems extremely doubtful whether arbitration proceedings can be described as adversarial. Both parties—the MIB and the person injured—can, it is true, set out their respective views in the knowledge of the other's submissions. In the course of the present proceedings before the court, it became clear that the claimant was accused of dishonest conduct when he brought his appeal and that he had no opportunity to refute that allegation. This amounts to a procedural defect which is problematic in several respects.

94. Under the rules of procedural law governing civil proceedings, to which applies the principle that the parties determine the facts and evidence forming the basis for a decision (Beibringungsgrundsatz), a tribunal may not base its decision on any circumstances not raised by the parties in the proceedings and on which the opposing party has been unable to state its views. Even if one wished to attribute—conditionally—a public law character to the arbitration procedure as a continuation of the quasi-administrative procedure before the MIB, the claimant's rights of defence<sup>66</sup> will have been infringed. Even in proceedings to which the principle of judicial inquiry<sup>67</sup> applies, the rights of defence must be guaranteed in such a way that a party can set out its views on circumstances and matters of which it stands accused.

95. With regard, finally, to the fifth criterion, 'the application of legal rules', this will be satisfied if the tribunal decides in accordance with law and statute but not if it reaches its decisions on the basis of fairness. For a final decision on whether this fifth criterion is satisfied, it will be necessary to address this question again at a later stage. The decision on costs in the arbitration decision against the claimant, on the grounds of his alleged dishonesty—see in this regard cl 22 of the agreement, cited in para 6, above—without the claimant having had any opportunity to address that issue, suggests that considerations of fairness may be made to form the basis of the decision.

63 See, for example, with regard to the judicial nature of the Conseil des Avocats, Reference for a preliminary decision brought by Borker Case 138/80 [1980] ECR 1975.

64 See in this context paras 111 and 114 of the reference for a preliminary ruling.

65 See Dorsch Consult Ingenieurgesellschaft mbH v Bundesbaugesellschaft Berlin mbH Case C-54/96 [1998] All ER (EC) 262, [1997] ECR I-4961 (paras 28, 29).

66 On protection of the rights of defence as a criterion to be taken into account, see Joined Cases C-430/93 and C-431/93 van Schijndel and van Veen [1995] ECR I-4705 (para 19).

67 Generally in public law disputes and criminal proceedings.

a 96. As an interim conclusion, it may thus be held that the arbitration tribunal does not satisfy in full the relatively strict criteria which art 177 of the EC Treaty imposes on a court or tribunal.

b 97. With regard, now, to the characteristics of impartiality and independence following from art 6 of the ECHR in conjunction with art 47 of the Fundamental Rights Charter, one must, it seems, proceed, according to the submissions of the parties to the present proceedings, on the basis that the Queen's Counsel featuring on the lists described provide every guarantee as to their independence. That notwithstanding, the question still arises as to whether, in view of their procedural situation and their proximity to the MIB, they also provide the same guarantee as to their impartiality. The arbitrator can require from the MIB any more extensive investigation which is considered appropriate. There is accordingly what may be described as a form of negotiating level between the arbitrator and the MIB. Once the arbitrator has taken his arbitration decision, this is in the first instance forwarded to the MIB alone, which is then responsible for its further transmission to the victim.

c 98. Before the arbitrator, moreover, there is no public hearing within the meaning of art 6 of the ECHR in conjunction with art 47 of the Fundamental Rights Charter inasmuch as the arbitrator acts on the basis of the documents before him (see cl 17, cited in para 6, above). The procedural co-operation between the arbitrator and the MIB cannot be regarded as constituting a public hearing. The victim is not involved in these negotiations in the way that adversarial procedure requires. The principle of orality in judicial proceedings is to this extent related to the principle that proceedings should be conducted in public. Finally, the manner in which the decision is notified cannot be regarded as being a public pronouncement for the purposes of art 6 of the ECHR. The public nature of the proceedings does not therefore appear to be adequately guaranteed.

d 99. The arbitration procedure under the agreement must for those reasons be brought into question in several respects.

e 100. In its judgment in Nordsee Deutsche Hochseefischerei GmbH v Reederei Mond Hochseefischerei Nordstern AG & Co KG<sup>68</sup>, the court has already once been called on to set out its views on the judicial nature of a private arbitration tribunal in regard to art 177 of the EC Treaty. The court ruled in that case that attention must be paid to the particularities of the individual arbitration proceedings. The court there concluded that the arbitration tribunal lacked judicial capacity on the grounds, first, that, when the contract was entered into, the parties were free to leave potential disputes to be resolved by the ordinary courts<sup>69</sup>, and, second, that the public authorities were not involved in the decision to opt for arbitration and were not called on to intervene automatically in the proceedings before the arbitrator<sup>70</sup>.

f 101. If one considers the arbitration proceedings in the present case against this background, it will be noticed that the public authorities, in the form of the Secretary of State for Transport, were fully involved in the decision to choose the avenue of arbitration proceedings. On the other hand, anyone who may have been injured is obliged to seek legal protection within the framework of an agreement in the establishment of which he played no role and which was negotiated between parties entirely separate from him and over which he had no influence. a

68 Case 102/81 [1982] ECR 1095.

69 See the Nordsee case (cited in footnote 68, above) (para 11).

70 See the Nordsee case (cited in footnote 68, above) (para 12).

102. In the light of all of the doubts just outlined as to the establishment and procedure of the arbitration tribunal, the crucial question is therefore what form the further legal protection of the injured party might take.

103. As point (v) of the third question referred suggests, and as is confirmed by the parties' concordant submissions in this regard, a victim can appeal to the ordinary courts against the arbitration decision. However, there is no unrestricted appeal procedure, access to the courts and the scope of review being subject to several limiting conditions. b

104. As outlined by the High Court, the situation is as follows. The arbitration decision may be challenged on grounds of serious irregularities adversely affecting it or on issues of law, which include that as to whether a specific finding of the arbitrator was supported by evidence or whether, on the basis of the available evidence, an arbitrator could not reasonably have reached a particular conclusion. An appeal on questions of law requires judicial leave, which will be granted only if the arbitration decision is obviously wrong and it appears just and proper in the circumstances to have the matter judicially determined. c

105. These restrictive conditions governing access to the courts have features of a pure review as to legal issues or plausibility. Judicial review and the granting of leave to appeal are matters frequently reserved to the higher courts in appeal proceedings. Examination of an appeal submitted as to whether the arbitration decision is obviously wrong and whether it would, in all the circumstances, be just and proper to obtain a judicial decision would have a further restrictive effect. Access to the ordinary courts is rendered considerably more difficult for a person injured by an untraced vehicle. This is extremely problematic in the light of the requirements of effective legal protection. d

106. If one takes account of the fact that this stage of the proceedings actually concerns first instance proceedings before an ordinary court, this will not meet the requirements of effective legal protection. It must be possible for the injured person to secure, at least before one court, full judicial protection with regard to issues of fact and law. e

107. A comparison of this avenue of legal redress with the legal protection guaranteed to victims of insured or uninsured drivers of traced vehicles—for whom the ordinary avenues of legal redress remain open—shows that the legal protection available for victims of untraced drivers remains far behind the latter. While the possibilities of legal protection for both groups of persons need not, from the perspective of Community law, be absolutely identical, the legal protection must none the less be qualitatively equivalent. In the context of the present case, this means that a guarantee of recourse to the ordinary courts must be provided. f

108. In view of the fact that the case involves a civil-law dispute concerning compensation, in which the injured party and the insurance body stand opposed, I consider a stage for the determination of facts to be indispensable. Nor does the judgment in the Upjohn case<sup>71</sup> run counter to this finding. In that case the court held that judicial competence for a full review of facts was not indispensable. The facts of that case, however, were entirely different. The authority responsible in the Upjohn case for granting or revoking authorisation g a for medicinal products was required to carry out complex assessments in the medico-pharmacological field<sup>72</sup>. This called for a certain discretionary scope, particularly in view of the fact that an applicant could, by means of a fresh application, secure a reappraisal of the decision taken by the administrative authority<sup>73</sup>.

<sup>71</sup> Cited in footnote 37, above. h

b 109. In justification of the existing rules, the United Kingdom government and the MIB have pointed out that these injury cases are disposed of under those rules in what is generally a more rapid and cost-effective manner.

c 110. The event giving rise to injury, which resulted in the present proceedings, occurred on 25 December 1991. Almost five years later, on 27 August 1996, the arbitrator issued her decision. Up to that point there had not yet been any mention of bringing the matter before an ordinary court.

c 111. Even if the procedure under the agreement might have been quicker and more cost-effective than compulsory insurance proceedings before ordinary courts, this still does not amount to sufficient justification for depriving injured parties of effective legal protection in the form of a determination of the facts by an ordinary court.

d 112. Finally, it will be a matter for the High Court to assess the shortcomings in the legal protection and to draw the legal consequences therefrom. In this it will have to take account of the fact that the absence of judicial review, covering issues of fact and law, of an arbitrator's findings in a claim resulting from the Second Directive fails to satisfy the Community law requirements as to effective legal protection.

e (3) Correct implementation of the directive—fourth question

Submissions of the parties

f 113. The claimant argues that the Second Directive has not been correctly implemented where the member state fails to impose on the authorised body an obligation to provide compensation to victims of untraced drivers to the same degree as applies with regard to compulsory insurance under the First Directive. The Second Directive has not been implemented in the United Kingdom with the binding force necessary to satisfy the principle of legal certainty. Apart from the fact that the compensation provided for by the Agreement is not in all respects the same as that provided for by the Second Directive, victims have to rely on an agreement to which they are not a party and to rely on the simple practice of the MIB of failing to take before the courts the point that the Agreement confers no rights on victims which can be enforced against it.

g 114. The United Kingdom government and the MIB take the view that there is no need to reply to the fourth question. They point out, however, that it is for the member state concerned to choose the forms and methods for implementing a directive. Where the national provisions already in force comply with the directive they do not require further amendment. That is what happened in the United Kingdom with regard to implementation of the Second Directive: the Agreement meets the requirements of precision, clarity and transparency and thus satisfies the principle of legal certainty.

i 115. In its written observations, the Commission expresses its opinion that the MIB is an authorised body within the meaning of art 1(4) of the Second Directive, as it has been entrusted by the authorities of the member state with the role provided for in the Second Directive and not only has the capacity, but is also obliged, to compensate victims. Victims can also apply directly to that body, which must provide them with a reasoned reply. Further, a legal procedure is provided for in the event that a victim is not satisfied with the compensation offered. a

72 See the Upjohn case (cited in footnote 37, above) (para 33).

73 See the Upjohn case (cited in footnote 37, above) (para 40).

116. During the oral procedure, however, the Commission's agent expressed some misgivings based on the case of White v White<sup>74</sup>, cited by the parties, and the judgment of the Court of Appeal dismissing the claimant's appeal<sup>75</sup>. To the extent to which the member state's legal system classifies the MIB as an exclusively private body and treats the agreement between it and the Secretary of State as being purely private in nature, with the result that there is no obligation whatever to apply the criteria laid down in the Second Directive, the MIB is not in fact properly authorised within the meaning of art 1(4) of the Second Directive. b
c

Appraisal

117. By its fourth question, the High Court is seeking to ascertain whether the United Kingdom has complied with its obligation under art 1(4) of the Second Directive to authorise a body with responsibility for providing compensation in respect of damage or injuries caused by an untraced or uninsured motor vehicle. In issue is whether there is such compliance in the case where, pursuant to an agreement with the competent authority, a pre-existing body is required to assume responsibility for such damage or injuries but victims have no directly enforceable claim in law against that body. The High Court also asks whether the determinant factor in answering that question is the fact that the member state considered in good faith that that agreement provided protection for victims that was at least as effective as that provided by the Second Directive. d
e

118. The MIB's establishment dates back to 1946 and the first generation of agreements on compensation for victims of uninsured or untraced drivers originates from that period. There was thus provision in the United Kingdom, long before the Second Directive was adopted, for compensation for the victims of traffic accidents where those responsible were uninsured or could not be traced. f

119. According to the documents on the case file, a consultation process was initiated by the United Kingdom government, following adoption of the Second Directive on 30 December 1983, into the issue of whether separate implementing measures were required to transpose the directive. This examination concluded that the existing protection for victims was fully adequate and that more extensive transposition measures were therefore not required in that regard. This appraisal was apparently shared by the Commission, as it raised no objections in regard to transposition of the Second Directive. In view of the fact that—as the parties to the present proceedings have confirmed unanimously—the MIB has always in practice consistently satisfied its obligations under the two agreements dealing with uninsured and untraced drivers, there were also no grounds for doubts as to whether the Second Directive had been correctly transposed. g
h
i

<sup>74</sup> Judgment of the House of Lords of 1 March 2001 [2001] UKHL 9, [2001] 2 All ER 43, [2001] 1 WLR 481.

<sup>75</sup> See para 12, above.

a 120. The view that no additional entities had to be set up in order to implement the Second Directive also found support in the wording of art 1(4) of the Second Directive, which expressly refers to the possibility of authorising an already existing body. This explains why no formal legal measure was adopted in the United Kingdom to transpose the Second Directive, even though the period for transposition expired on 31 December 1987, pursuant to art 5(1) of the Second Directive, and the Commission has also not expressed any criticism of this fact in almost 15 years.

b 121. However, the fact that there must still be a problem regarding transposition of the Second Directive is evidenced not only by the present case but also by the House of Lords judgment of 1 March 2001 in White v White<sup>76</sup>, which has been mentioned on several occasions in these proceedings and which concerned the parallel agreement concerning uninsured drivers. c The House of Lords ruled that it was not in a position, as required under the court's Marleasing case law<sup>77</sup>, to construe the agreement in such a way as to give effect to the substance of the directive (see para 127, below). The House of Lords justified this view on the ground that the agreement in issue was a d contract under private law, even though one of the contracting parties was a state body. The contracting parties were therefore bound only by that to which they had agreed. The House of Lords held that the Marleasing principles had for that reason to be left out of account, although it had expressly stated at another point in its judgment that the 1988 MIB Agreement had been concluded with a view to implementing the directive<sup>78</sup>.

e 122. The Court of Appeal judgment, by which an appeal brought by the claimant was dismissed at a procedural stage preceding the present proceedings, is also instructive in the present context. The Court of Appeal held that what the United Kingdom had done by way of implementation of the Directive did not bring into existence 'any entity or relationship' which enabled the directive to be enforced against anybody (save possibly in the Francovich f sense against the United Kingdom itself)<sup>79</sup>.

123. The claimant accordingly takes the view in the present proceedings that the United Kingdom has not implemented the Second Directive.

g 124. The duties devolving on member states in the implementation of a directive have been laid down in settled case law. The main features may be recapitulated at this point. With regard to the third paragraph of art 189 of the EC Treaty (now the third paragraph of art 249 EC), the court laid down the following basic principles:

h 'It follows from that provision that the implementation of a directive does not necessarily require legislative action in each Member State. In particular, the existence of general principles of constitutional or administrative law may render implementation by specific legislation superfluous, provided however that those principles guarantee that the national authorities will in fact apply the directive fully and that, where the directive is intended to create rights for individuals, the legal position arising from those principles is sufficiently precise and clear and the persons concerned are made fully aware of their rights and, where i

76 Cited in footnote 74, above.

77 Marleasing SA v La Comercial Internacional de Alimentación SA Case C-106/89 [1990] ECR I-4135.

78 'The MIB-Agreement was entered into with the specific intention of giving effect to the Directive.'

79 See in this connection Francovich v Italy Joined cases C-6/90 and C-9/90 [1991] ECR I-5357.

appropriate, afforded the possibility of relying on them before the national courts. That last condition is of particular importance where the directive in question is intended to accord rights to nationals of other Member States because those nationals are not normally aware of such principles.<sup>80</sup> a

125. This case law has been confirmed in numerous judgments<sup>81</sup>. However, the court was also obliged, in a separate context, to point out that '[i]n order to secure the full implementation of directives in law and not only in fact, Member States must establish a specific legal framework in the area in question'<sup>82</sup>. b

126. In regard to the requirement of legal certainty, the court has held: 'Accordingly, the provisions of a directive must be implemented with unquestionable binding force and with the specificity, precision and clarity required in order to satisfy the requirement of legal certainty, under which, in the case of a directive intended to confer rights on individuals, persons concerned must be enabled to ascertain the full extent of their rights ...'<sup>83</sup> The court has used similar terms to reiterate this view in subsequent judgments<sup>84</sup>. c

127. In its judgment in the Marleasing case<sup>85</sup>, the court confirmed that the obligation on member states to secure the objective laid down in a directive is binding on 'all the authorities of Member States including, for matters within their jurisdiction, the courts. It follows that, in applying national law, whether the provisions in question were adopted before or after the directive, the national court called upon to interpret it is required to do so, as far as possible, in the light of the wording and the purpose of the directive in order to achieve the result pursued by the latter and thereby comply with the third paragraph of Article 189 of the [EEC] Treaty'.<sup>86</sup> d

128. As has already been indicated in the discussion of the third question, the purpose of the Second Directive is to enable persons injured by uninsured or untraced motor vehicles to bring a claim against a body in the member state concerned. In so far as art 249 EC leaves it to national bodies to choose the form and the means for achieving the directive's binding objective, an agreement between a public authority and a private law entity forming the basis of the rights of victims is not per se objectionable. Those rights must, however, be identifiable and pursuable with the requisite clarity and certainty. e

129. During the oral procedure counsel for the claimant pointed out the substantive discrepancies between the Second Directive and the agreement, not all of which, however, are the subject of the present proceedings. Fundamental importance does, none the less, attach to the questions relating to the injured person's claim and its enforceability. f

130. Thus, as the relationship between an injured person and the MIB has been described by all parties, injured persons have in fact no claim against the MIB. True, the MIB does not appear to refuse compensation despite g

<sup>80</sup> See EC Commission v Germany Case 29/84 [1985] ECR 1661 (para 23). See also, along the same lines, European Commission v Germany Case C-96/95 [1997] ECR I-1653 (para 35).

<sup>81</sup> See EC Commission v Belgium Case 247/85 [1987] ECR 3029 (para 9); see also, along the same lines, EC Commission v Netherlands Case C-190/90 [1992] ECR I-3265 (para 17) and European Commission v Germany Case C-217/97 [1999] ECR I-5087 (paras 31, 32). i

<sup>82</sup> See EC Commission v Netherlands Case C-339/87 [1990] ECR I-851 (para 25); my emphasis.

<sup>83</sup> See European Commission v France Case C-197/96 [1997] ECR I-1489 (para 15).

<sup>84</sup> See European Commission v France Case C-354/98 [1999] ECR I-4927 (para 11).

<sup>85</sup> Cited in footnote 77, above.

<sup>86</sup> See the Marleasing case (cited in footnote 77, above) (para 8).

a the absence of any contractual relationship in law with the injured person in view of the fact that it is obligated to provide compensation on foot of the agreement with the Secretary of State for Transport. However, should the injured person consider that he is adversely affected, he must, if necessary, institute judicial proceedings against the Secretary of State to force the latter to insist on compliance with the agreement.

b 131. This approach is fraught with so many imponderables that it fails to satisfy the requirements of legal certainty outlined above. This finding is reinforced by the problems associated with legal protection discussed in connection with the third question.

c 132. The situation, however, becomes totally unacceptable against the background of the attitude of the national courts of the member states. It would have been at least necessary for the national courts to carry out, at any rate with regard to the substantive rights of injured persons within the meaning of the Marleasing case law, an interpretation of the legal positions resulting from the agreements between the MIB and the Secretary of State for Transport in the light of the Second Directive, particularly in view of the fact that the House of Lords proceeded on the basis that the 1988 Agreement concerning uninsured drivers had been concluded with the intention of giving effect to the Second Directive.

d 133. As the British courts find that they are unable, in view of the structure of the legal relations, to proceed in such a manner, it becomes clear that the Second Directive was not implemented in national law in the United Kingdom with the requisite precision and clarity. The requirements of legal certainty have therefore not been satisfied.

e 134. The High Court, finally, also wished to know whether, for the purpose of answering the question, any significance attaches to the fact that the member state believed in good faith that the Directive had been correctly transposed. Determining whether a directive has been transposed in a member state's national law is in principle a matter of objective examination. The good faith, or bad faith, of a member state is an irrelevant factor in a determination as to whether the requirements posited by Community law have or have not been adequately met by transposition. In view, however, of any potential claim for compensation, this question may well assume significance.

f 135. The answer to the fourth question must therefore be that there is no proper implementation of the Second Directive in a member state's national law so long as an injured person does not have an enforceable claim against the body on which the authorities of the member state have conferred responsibility for compensating victims of untraced (or uninsured) motor vehicles.

g

h (4) Liability of the member state to pay damages—fifth question

Submissions of the parties

i 136. According to the claimant, the conditions necessary to establish a claim for damages against the United Kingdom for failure to implement the Second Directive are satisfied. The result prescribed by the directive entails the grant of rights to individuals, namely victims of untraced or uninsured drivers, a class to which the claimant clearly belongs. The content of that right is identifiable from the provisions of the directive and concerns compensation from an authorised body. It is not necessary for the Court of Justice to examine whether a causal nexus has been established; that is a matter for the national court of the member state. Finally, the breach is sufficiently serious because the United Kingdom has failed to adopt any measures to implement the directive. a

137. The United Kingdom government argues that the alleged breaches in regard to interest and costs raise a number of questions. Even if the court should not wish to go along with its argument, the breach of Community law is not sufficiently serious for the United Kingdom to incur liability for damages. Similarly, it was reasonable for the United Kingdom to assume that the procedures in place satisfied the requirements of effective judicial control. Finally, even if one were to assume that the body was not approved in such a manner as to satisfy the requirements of the directive, that did not in any event cause the claimant any loss. b

138. The MIB takes the view that the reply to the fifth question is a matter for the defendant in the main proceedings. c

139. In the opinion of the Commission, it is for the national court to decide whether there has been a sufficiently serious breach of Community law in this case. It points out, however, that the Second Directive makes no mention of interest and costs and that there is no case law on those points. The Commission states, furthermore, that it has not previously raised this issue in regard to the implementation of the Second Directive and that the question whether the arbitration procedure is compatible with the dictates of effective legal protection requires additional clarification. d

Appraisal

140. By its fifth question, the High Court is seeking to determine whether the defects in implementing the Second Directive constitute a sufficiently serious breach of Community law as to lead to a claim for damages against the member state concerned. e

141. As will be evident from the foregoing submissions, numerous misgivings arise with regard to the transposition of the Second Directive and the practical application of the measures defined as constituting implementation. First, the scope of the compensation must be measured against the amounts of compensation regularly payable in the context of compulsory insurance, with the result that it is extremely probable that interest and costs have been improperly excluded from the calculation of compensation on the basis of the agreement. Further, the avenue of legal redress available to an injured person does not satisfy in every respect the requirements of effective legal protection. Finally, defects may be identified in the authorisation of the MIB as the body under art 1(4) of the Second Directive in so far as injured persons have no direct right of claim against that body such as would also entitle them to institute judicial proceedings. f

142. It may therefore be assumed that these shortcomings constitute a breach of Community law with regard to the implementation of a directive. It is, however, questionable whether this breach can lead to a claim for damages against the member state. g

143. The court's case law on Community law-based compensation claims against a member state dates back to the Francovich judgment<sup>87</sup>. (The proceedings in that case resulted from the failure by the Italian authorities to implement timeously in national law the directive on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to the protection of employees in the event h a of the insolvency of their employer.)<sup>88</sup> The court there set out as follows the basic principles underlying state liability:

<sup>87</sup> Cited in footnote 79, above (para 41). i

'The full effectiveness of Community rules would be impaired and the protection of the rights which they grant would be weakened if individuals were unable to obtain redress when their rights are infringed by a breach of Community law for which a Member State can be held responsible.

b The possibility of obtaining redress from the Member State is particularly indispensable where, as in this case, the full effectiveness of Community rules is subject to prior action on the part of the State and where, consequently, in the absence of such action, individuals cannot enforce before the national courts the rights conferred upon them by Community law.<sup>89</sup>

144. The conditions governing a right to reparation depend in this regard 'on the nature of the breach of Community law giving rise to the loss and damage'<sup>90</sup>.

d 145. Where there has been a breach of the third paragraph of art 189 of the EEC Treaty, which was the basis on which the court proceeded in Francovich, three prior conditions must be satisfied before there can be a right to reparation:

e 'The first of those conditions is that the result prescribed by the directive should entail the grant of rights to individuals. The second condition is that it should be possible to identify the content of those rights on the basis of the provisions of the directive. Finally, the third condition is the existence of a causal link between the breach of the State's obligation and the loss and damage suffered by the injured parties.'<sup>91</sup>

f 146. The court has since defined these principles in greater detail in a number of cases<sup>92</sup>. In the judgment in Brasserie du Pêcheur<sup>93</sup>, the first issue facing the court was to determine whether a claim seeking to establish state liability could also arise through a breach of primary law by the national legislature<sup>94</sup>. The court in principle answered that question affirmatively<sup>95</sup>. That case also provided the court with its first opportunity to rule that the breach must be sufficiently serious.

88 Council Directive (EEC) 80/987 (OJ 1980 L283 p 23).

89 See paras 33 and 34 of the judgment in Francovich (cited in footnote 79, above).

90 See para 38 of Francovich (cited in footnote 79, above).

91 See para 40 of Francovich (cited in footnote 79, above).

h 92 See Brasserie du Pêcheur SA v Germany, R v Secretary of State for Transport, ex p Factortame Ltd Joined cases C-46/93 and C-48/93 [1996] All ER (EC) 301, [1996] ECR I-1029, R v HM Treasury, ex p British Telecommunications plc Case C-392/93 [1996] All ER (EC) 411, [1996] ECR I-1631, R v Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, ex p Hedley Lomas (Ireland) Ltd Case C-5/94 [1996] All ER (EC) 493, [1996] ECR I-2553, Dillenkofer v Germany Joined cases C-178/94, C-179/94, C-188/94, C-189/94 and C-190/94 [1996] All ER (EC) 917, [1996] ECR I-4845, Brinkmann Tabakfabriken GmbH v Skatteministeriet Case C-319/96 [1998] ECR I-5255, Konle v Austria Case C-302/97 [1999] ECR I-3099, Rechberger v Austria Case C-140/97 [1999] ECR I-3499, Haim v Kassenzahnärztliche Vereinigung Nordrhein Case C-424/97 [2000] ECR I-5123 and Svenska Statens v Stockholm Lindopark AB, Stockholm Lindopark AB v Svenska Statens Case C-150/99 [2001] STC 103, [2001] ECR I-493.

93 Cited in footnote 92, above.

94 In issue was the breach of arts 30 and 52 of the EEC Treaty. See paras 23 and 36 of the judgment in Brasserie du Pêcheur (cited in footnote 92, above).

95 See Brasserie du Pêcheur (cited in footnote 92, above) (paras 40, 41).

147. With regard to the criterion of 'a sufficiently serious breach', the court stated that 'the member state ... concerned [must have] manifestly and gravely disregarded the limits on its discretion'.<sup>96</sup> 'The factors which the competent court may take into consideration include the clarity and precision of the rule breached, the measure of discretion left by that rule to the national or Community authorities, whether the infringement and the damage caused was intentional or involuntary, whether any error of law was excusable or inexcusable, the fact that the position taken by a Community institution may have contributed towards the omission, and the adoption or retention of national measures or practices contrary to Community law.'<sup>97</sup>

148. Responding to the question whether fault is a constituent factor in a claim seeking to establish liability, the court stated that this is not required as such but that 'certain objective and subjective factors connected with the concept of fault under a national legal system may well be relevant for the purpose of determining whether or not a given breach of Community law is serious'.<sup>98</sup>

149. In its judgment in the British Telecommunications case<sup>99</sup>, the court also applied the comparatively narrower conditions laid down in Brasserie du Pêcheur to a case involving the inadequate transposition of a directive as the event giving rise to damage.

150. In its judgment in Ex p Hedley Lomas<sup>100</sup>, however, the court made it clear that even the mere infringement of Community law may be sufficient to establish the existence of a sufficiently serious breach where 'at the time when it committed the infringement, the member state in question was not called upon to make any legislative choices and had only considerably reduced, or even no, discretion'.<sup>101</sup>

151. In Dillenkofer's case<sup>102</sup>, a case in which, as in Francovich, there had been a failure to adopt measures for the transposition of a directive within the prescribed period, for which reason the claimant considers that these judgments have a bearing on the present case, the court explained that 'the condition that there should be a sufficiently serious breach, although not expressly mentioned in Francovich, was nevertheless evident from the circumstances of that case'.<sup>103</sup>

152. To that extent it must be regarded as settled that a sufficiently serious breach is a prerequisite in every case of a potential claim for damages against a member state.

153. Basing itself on the statements concerning a considerably reduced, or even an absence of any, discretion in its judgment in Ex p Hedley Lomas, the court stated as follows in Dillenkofer's case: 'So where, as in Francovich, a member state fails, in breach of the third paragraph of art 189 of the Treaty, to take any of the measures necessary to achieve the result prescribed by a directive

96 See Brasserie du Pêcheur (cited in footnote 92, above) (para 55).

97 See Brasserie du Pêcheur (cited in footnote 92, above) (para 56).

98 See Brasserie du Pêcheur (cited in footnote 92, above) (para 78).

99 Cited in footnote 92, above (para 40).

100 Cited in footnote 92, above.

101 See Ex p Hedley Lomas (cited in footnote 92, above) (para 28). See also the subsequent judgment in the Stockholm Lindöpark case (cited in footnote 92, above) (para 40).

102 Cited in footnote 92, above.

103 Dillenkofer's case (cited in footnote 92, above) (para 23).

a within the period it lays down, that member state manifestly and gravely disregards the limits on its discretion.<sup>104</sup>

154. In order to reply to the fifth question, it is thus necessary to determine whether the breaches of Community law indicated constitute, whether individually or in their totality, a sufficiently serious breach. On the basis of the Francovich and Dillenkofer judgments, one might, along with the claimant, take b the view that the inactivity on the United Kingdom's part amounts to a manifest and grave disregard by that member state of the limits placed on the exercise of its discretion<sup>105</sup>.
c
d
e
f
g
h
i
Regarding being had, however, to the fact that the member state was able to have recourse to an existing infrastructure which at least in part was expressly in accordance with the directive, this view of the matter does appear to be unsatisfactory. The question thus arises as to the extent to which the legislature of the member state was obliged to take steps to achieve the purpose prescribed by the directive<sup>106</sup>.

155. There was clearly no further need for the establishment of a body within the meaning of art 1(4) of the Second Directive. That directive does, however, confer on an individual victim a right to compensation against that d body, as has already been set out above<sup>107</sup>. In order to found and enforce a claim it is not sufficient that a potential victim can somehow or other bring the matter before the body. The directive is precise and clear in regard to this position in law. As the agreements concluded between the MIB and the Secretary of State for Transport do not confer a legal position with those attributes on a victim, the national legislature ought to have taken appropriate e measures. Action on its part was necessary to establish a judicially enforceable claim in favour of the victim at least up to the limits of the insurance obligation. Whether this ought to have been achieved by legislation or by a substantive adjustment of the agreement is a decision ultimately falling within the discretion of the member state. To that extent the directive confers a degree of organisational discretion on the member state. That f notwithstanding, the member state ought to have laid down in mandatory terms, with regard to both substantive and procedural law, the obligation as to results deriving from the directive in regard to the victim's legal position.

156. As there was already a functioning infrastructure in place, the problem initially remained concealed, and this was also the reason why the Commission took no steps to challenge the lack of action on the part of the United
g Kingdom in regard to the directive. Those facts do not, however, mean that that inactivity did not amount to a breach of the duty devolving on the member state to adopt the necessary measures under the third paragraph of art 249 EC.

157. Appraisal of the questions whether damage has been suffered by the h claimant—and, if so, to what degree—and whether any such damage was causally linked to the breach of duty is a matter for the national court. By virtue of the fact that the United Kingdom has failed to ensure that persons injured by untraced vehicles have an enforceable claim, at least up to the limits of the insurance obligation, against the body defined in art 1(4) of the Second Directive, that member state has committed a sufficiently serious breach of
i

104 Dillenkofer's case (cited in footnote 92, above) (para 26; my emphasis).

105 Dillenkofer's case (cited in footnote 92, above) (para 26).

106 Dillenkofer's case (cited in footnote 92, above) (paras 26, 47).

107 See para 74 et seq, above.

Community law within the meaning of the court's case law on claims for compensation brought against member states. a

V—CONCLUSION

158. In the light of the foregoing considerations, I propose that the Court of Justice reply as follows to the questions submitted for preliminary ruling: b

(1) Interest and costs are a necessary component of compensation claims brought by victims of untraced vehicles if and to the extent to which interest and costs form part of claims for compensation brought by victims of properly insured and identified vehicles. This finding holds good in regard to both the substance and the payment details.

(2) In the circumstances outlined in the third question, a victim must, on grounds of effective legal protection, have the right to appeal to an ordinary court on questions of fact and law. c

(3) Regard being had to the rights of victims, the Second Directive has not been transposed in the national law of the member state with the precision and clarity necessary to satisfy the requirement of legal certainty. d

(4) By virtue of the fact that it has failed to ensure that persons injured by untraced vehicles have an enforceable claim, at least up to the limits of the insurance obligation, against the body defined in art 1(4) of the Second Directive, the United Kingdom has committed a sufficiently serious breach of Community law.

4 December 2003. The COURT OF JUSTICE (Fifth Chamber) delivered the following judgment. e

1. By order of 17 May 2000, received at the Court of Justice of the European Communities on 13 February 2001, the High Court of Justice of England and Wales, Queen's Bench Division, referred to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) five questions on the interpretation of art 1(4) of Second Council Directive (EEC) 84/5 (on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to insurance against civil liability in respect of the use of motor vehicles) (OJ 1984 L8 p 17), hereinafter the Second Directive). f

2. Those questions were raised in proceedings between Samuel Evans and the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (hereinafter the Secretary of State) and the Motor Insurers' Bureau (hereinafter the MIB) concerning compensation for injuries suffered by Mr Evans in a road traffic accident involving an unidentified vehicle. g

LEGAL BACKGROUND

Community legislation

3. Article 3(1) of Council Directive (EEC) 72/166 (on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to insurance against civil liability in respect of the use of motor vehicles, and to the enforcement of the obligation to insure against such liability) (OJ English Sp Edn 1972 (II) p 360, hereinafter the First Directive), provides: h

'1. Each Member State shall, subject to Article 4, take all appropriate measures to ensure that civil liability in respect of the use of vehicles normally based in its territory is covered by insurance. The extent of the liability covered and the terms and conditions of the cover shall be determined on the basis of these measures.'

i

a 4. Article 1 of the Second Directive is worded as follows:

1. The insurance referred to in Article 3(1) of Directive 72/166/EEC shall cover compulsorily both damage to property and personal injuries.

b 2. Without prejudice to any higher guarantees which Member States may lay down, each Member State shall require that the amounts for which such insurance is compulsory are at least:

—in the case of personal injury, 350 000 ECU where there is only one victim; where more than one victim is involved in a single claim, this amount shall be multiplied by the number of victims, —in the case of damage to property 100 000 ECU per claim, whatever the number of victims.

c Member States may, in place of the above minimum amounts, provide for a minimum amount of 500 000 ECU for personal injury where more than one victim is involved in a single claim or, in the case of personal injury and damage to property, a minimum overall amount of 600 000 ECU per claim whatever the number of victims or the nature of the damage ...

d 4. Each Member State shall set up or authorize a body with the task of providing compensation, at least up to the limits of the insurance obligation for damage to property or personal injuries caused by an unidentified vehicle or a vehicle for which the insurance obligation provided for in paragraph 1 has not been satisfied. This provision shall be without prejudice to the right of the Member States to regard compensation by that body as subsidiary or non-subsidiary and the right to make provision for the settlement of claims between that body and the person or persons responsible for the accident and other insurers or social security bodies required to compensate the victim in respect of the same accident.

e The victim may in any case apply directly to the body which, on the basis of information provided at its request by the victim, shall be obliged to give him a reasoned reply regarding the payment of any compensation.

f However, Member States may exclude the payment of compensation by that body in respect of persons who voluntarily entered the vehicle which caused the damage or injury when the body can prove that they knew it was uninsured.

g Member States may limit or exclude the payment of compensation by that body in the event of damage to property by an unidentified vehicle.

They may also authorize, in the case of damage to property caused by an uninsured vehicle an excess of not more than 500 ECU for which the victim may be responsible.

h Furthermore, each Member State shall apply its laws, regulations and administrative provisions to the payment of compensation by this body, without prejudice to any other practice which is more favourable to the victim.'

i

National legislation

5. In the United Kingdom, art 1(4) of the Second Directive was implemented by means of a number of agreements between the Secretary of State and the MIB.

6. The MIB is a private law entity of which all insurance companies which offer motor vehicle insurance in the United Kingdom are members. Its main purpose is to pay compensation to victims of accidents caused by uninsured or untraced drivers. a

7. The compensation scheme, which was set up before the United Kingdom acceded to the Community, is based on two series of agreements between the Secretary of State and the MIB: the Motor Insurers' Bureau (Compensation of Victims of Uninsured Drivers) Agreement and the Motor Insurers' Bureau (Compensation of Victims of Untraced Drivers) Agreement (hereinafter the Agreement). b

8. The provisions of the Agreement relevant to this case are as follows:

—The Agreement is to apply to any case in which an application is made to the MIB for a payment in respect of the death of or bodily injury to any person caused by or arising out of the use of a motor vehicle on a road in Great Britain where, subject to certain conditions which are not relevant to this case, the applicant for the payment is unable to trace any person responsible for the death or injury (cl 1). c

—On any application in a case to which the Agreement applies, the MIB is to award payment of an amount which is to be assessed in the same way as a court, applying as appropriate the laws in force, would assess the damages which the applicant would have been entitled to recover from the untraced person (cl 3). d

—The MIB must cause any application for a payment under the Agreement to be investigated and decide whether to make an award (cl 7). e

—The MIB is required to give the applicant a reasoned reply regarding the payment of any compensation. Where the MIB decides to make an award, it must notify the applicant of the amount it proposes to pay and the way in which that amount has been calculated. Where the applicant decides to accept the award, the MIB must pay to the applicant the amount of the award (ccl 9 and 10). f

—The applicant is to have a right of appeal to an arbitrator against any decision of the MIB (cl 11).

—Before lodging an appeal, the applicant may make comments to the MIB on its decision and may supply further evidence relating to the application. The MIB may investigate that new evidence and must inform the applicant of the result of such investigation and of any change in its decision (cl 13). g

—On appeal, the arbitrator is to decide whether the MIB should make an award under the Agreement and, if so, the amount which it should award to the applicant (cl 16).

—The arbitrator is to be selected from two panels of Queen's Counsel appointed respectively by the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Advocate (cl 18). h

—The arbitrator is to decide the appeal on the documents submitted to him, although he may ask the MIB to make any further investigation which he considers desirable, and the applicant may submit comments on the findings of such investigation (cl 17).

—Each party to the appeal is to bear its own costs (cl 21). The MIB is to pay the arbitrator's fees, except where it appears to the arbitrator that there were no reasonable grounds for the appeal, in which case he may decide that his fee ought to be paid by the applicant (cl 22). i

9. The Agreement makes no express provision for payment of interest on the compensation awarded or for reimbursement of costs incurred in the proceedings before the MIB.

- a THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTIONS REFERRED TO THE COURT
10. On 25 December 1991, Mr Evans was struck by a vehicle which was never traced, causing him physical injury.
11. On 11 June 1992, Mr Evans submitted a request for compensation under the Agreement.
- b 12. On 11 January 1996, the MIB informed Mr Evans that it had decided to make an award of £50 000.
13. Mr Evans appealed against that decision.
14. On 27 August 1996 the arbitrator made her award. She considered that Mr Evans' damages on a full liability basis would have been £58,286 but that that figure should be reduced by 20% by reason of his contributory negligence, resulting in an award of £46,629. Taking into account certain evidence, the arbitrator also took the view that Mr Evans had been dishonest and therefore ordered him to pay the fees of the arbitration. She did not award him interest on the damages.
- c 15. The MIB paid Mr Evans the sum of £46,629, together with his representative's costs of £770 and an ex gratia payment of £150, plus VAT.
- d 16. In December 1996, Mr Evans was granted leave to appeal to the High Court against the arbitrator's refusal to award him interest. His appeal was dismissed. In September 1998, the Court of Appeal (England and Wales) (Civil Division) dismissed a further appeal by Mr Evans ([1999] 1 CMLR 1251). In January 1999, the House of Lords refused his application for leave to appeal.
- e 17. On 25 February 1999, Mr Evans commenced proceedings against the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, who was responsible for the implementation of the First and Second Directives by the United Kingdom. Mr Evans submitted, in essence, that the United Kingdom had failed to implement the Second Directive or had done so inadequately in the following respects:
- f —the Agreement makes no provision for payment of interest on the damages awarded;
- the Agreement also fails to make provision for payment of the costs incurred by victims in proceedings for compensation;
- victims' access to court is insufficient in that they have a full right of appeal against the determination of the MIB only to an arbitrator and not to a court;
- g —the United Kingdom has not duly authorised a body to provide compensation for victims of untraced drivers, as required by the Second Directive, since the Agreement does not create rights which such victims can enforce directly against the MIB.
- h 18. Mr Evans maintains that those defects in the transposition of the Second Directive adversely affected him and constitute a sufficiently grave and manifest breach of Community law to found a right to recover damages from the Secretary of State.
19. It was in those circumstances that the High Court of Justice stayed proceedings and referred the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:
- i (1) On the proper interpretation of Council Directive 84/5/EEC of 30 December 1983 on the approximation of the laws of the Member States relating to insurance against civil liability in respect of the use of motor vehicles (the Second Motor Insurance Directive):
- (a) must the arrangements concerning the provision of compensation by the body established or authorised pursuant to Article 1(4) include provision for the payment of interest on the sums found to be payable for the damage to property or personal injuries? a

(b) if the answer to question (a) is yes, from what date and on what basis should such interest be calculated?

(2) On the proper interpretation of Article 1(4) of the Second Motor Insurance Directive, in circumstances where the compensating body itself has an obligation to investigate the victim's injury and loss (and to incur the costs thereof, including the cost of medical and other reports): b

(a) must the arrangements concerning the provision of compensation by the body include provision for the payment of the costs incurred by a victim in preparing and making his application to that body for compensation? c

(b) if the answer to question (a) is yes, on what basis are those costs to be calculated in a case where that body has made an offer to the victim in excess of the amount that he finally recovers, which offer the victim declined to accept? c

(3) On the proper interpretation of Article 1(4) of the Second Motor Insurance Directive, if the victim's application for compensation is determined by a body that is not a court, must he have a full right to appeal against that determination to a court, on both the facts and the law, rather than an appeal to an independent arbitrator having the following principal characteristics: d

(i) the victim may appeal to the arbitrator on both the facts and the law; e
(ii) when giving notice of appeal, the victim may make further representations and adduce further evidence to the compensating body upon which the compensating body may alter its award prior to the appeal;
(iii) the victim is provided in advance with a copy of all the material to be provided to the arbitrator and is given the opportunity to add any material that he wishes in response;

(iv) the arbitrator makes an award, without an oral hearing, in which he or she decides what award the compensating body ought to make and gives reasons for that decision; f

(v) if the victim is dissatisfied, he is entitled to appeal from the arbitrator to the Courts but he may do so only on the grounds of serious irregularity affecting the arbitration or on a question of law (including whether there was any evidence to support any particular conclusion of the arbitrator or whether any particular conclusion was one to which no arbitrator could reasonably come upon the evidence), and in the case of an appeal on a question of law, permission to appeal must be obtained from the Court which will not be given unless the decision of the arbitrator is obviously wrong and it is just and proper in all the circumstances for the Court to determine the question. g

(4) If the answer to questions (1)(a) and/or (2)(a) and/or (3) is yes, has a Member State duly authorised a body under Article 1(4) of the Second Motor Insurance Directive when an existing body has the task of providing compensation to victims pursuant only to an agreement with the relevant authority of the Member State that does not correspond to the Second Motor Insurance Directive in those respects, and: h

(a) that agreement creates a legal obligation owed to the relevant authority of the Member State to provide compensation to victims which is directly enforceable by the relevant authority and does not give such victims a directly enforceable legal right to claim against that body, but the i

- a* victim may apply to the Court for an order that the authority should enforce the agreement if the authority were to fail to do so; and
- (b) that body carries out that obligation by accepting and paying claims from victims in accordance with that agreement; and
- (c) the Member State considered in good faith that the provision of that agreement gave at least as good protection to victims as the requirements of the Second Motor Insurance Directive?
- b*
- (5) If the answer to any of questions (1)(a) or (2)(a) or (3) is yes, and/or if the answer to question (4) is no, does a failure to comply with the Second Motor Insurance Directive in that respect constitute a sufficiently serious breach by the Member State to give rise to liability for damages as a matter of Community law if it is established that such damage was caused?
- c*

THE QUESTIONS REFERRED TO THE COURT

20. The questions referred to the court, which it is appropriate to consider together, raise a number of problems concerning the nature of the body which the member states are required to establish in order to implement the Second Directive (fourth question), the remedies which must be available to victims of damage or injury caused by unidentified vehicles or vehicles for which the insurance obligation has not been satisfied (hereinafter insufficiently insured vehicles) (third and fourth questions), the need to provide for interest to be payable on sums paid to victims by the above-mentioned body (first question), the need to provide for reimbursement of costs incurred by victims pursuing claims for compensation (second question) and the possible liability of the member state concerned for failure to transpose the Second Directive correctly (fifth question).
- d*
- e*

Preliminary observations

- f* 21. It is appropriate, first, to consider the nature of the system established by the Second Directive for the benefit of victims of damage or injury caused by unidentified or insufficiently insured vehicles.

22. In contrast to victims of damage or injury caused by an identified vehicle, victims injured by an unidentified vehicle are normally unable to enforce their claims in legal proceedings for compensation because of the impossibility of identifying the person against whom proceedings should be brought.
- g*

23. In the case of an insufficiently insured vehicle, even if the victim is able to identify the person against whom legal proceedings should be brought, such proceedings are often liable to be fruitless because the defendant does not have the requisite financial resources to comply with the judgment given against him, or even to pay the costs incurred in the proceedings.
- h*

24. It is against that background that the first subparagraph of art 1(4) of the Second Directive provides that each member state is to set up or authorise a body with the task of providing compensation, at least up to the limits of the insurance obligation for damage to property or personal injuries caused by an unidentified or insufficiently insured vehicle.

- i* 25. The insurance obligation laid down in art 3(1) of the First Directive covers civil liability in respect of the use of vehicles, at least on the basis of the minimum amounts of cover set by the Community legislature.

26. As regards the extent of the insurance obligation, the fifth recital in the preamble to the Second Directive indicates that the amounts of compulsory insurance cover must in any event guarantee victims adequate compensation.

27. It is thus clear that the Community legislature's intention was to entitle victims of damage or injury caused by unidentified or insufficiently insured vehicles to protection equivalent to, and as effective as, that available to persons injured by identified and insured vehicles. a

28. It must nevertheless be emphasised that, to meet the requirements of the Second Directive, the body responsible for awarding compensation does not necessarily have to be placed, as far as civil liability is concerned, on the same footing as a defendant such as the driver of an identified and sufficiently insured vehicle. b

The nature of the body referred to in art 1(4) of the Second Directive

Observations submitted to the court c

29. According to Mr Evans, the Second Directive has not been implemented in the United Kingdom with the binding force necessary to satisfy the principle of legal certainty. Apart from the fact that the compensation provided for by the Agreement is not the same in all respects as that provided for by that directive, victims have to rely on an agreement to which they are not parties and on the MIB's practice of failing to take before the courts the point that the Agreement confers no rights on victims which can be enforced against it. d

30. The MIB and the United Kingdom government point out that it is for the member states to choose the form of the measures to be adopted for implementing a directive and that, where national provisions already in force comply with those of the directive, they do not need to be amended. In their view, the existing system enables victims of damage or injury caused by unidentified vehicles to make application to the MIB directly. e

31. In the Commission's view, the MIB appears to be an authorised body within the meaning of art 1(4) of the Second Directive since it has been entrusted by the public authorities with the role provided for in the Second Directive; it not only has the capacity to pay, but is obliged to pay, compensation to victims; victims have the right to apply directly to that body; and the body is obliged to provide a reasoned reply. At the hearing, however, it expressed doubts as to the possibility of interpreting and applying the Agreement in such a way as to ensure that victims enjoy all the rights conferred on them by the Second Directive. f

Findings of the court g

32. The first subparagraph of art 4(1) of the Second Directive contains no provision concerning the legal status of the body or the detailed arrangements for its authorisation. It expressly allows the member states to regard compensation by the body as subsidiary and enables them to make provision for the settlement of claims between that body and those responsible for the accident and for relations with other insurers or social security bodies required to compensate the victim in respect of the same accident. h

33. The second subparagraph of art 1(4) makes it clear, however, that a victim of damage or injury caused by an unidentified or insufficiently insured vehicle must be able to apply directly to the authorised body responsible for paying compensation to him. i

34. The fact that the source of the obligation of the body in question lies in an agreement concluded between it and a public authority is immaterial, provided that that agreement is interpreted and applied as obliging that body to provide victims with the compensation guaranteed to them by the Second

- a Directive and as enabling victims to address themselves directly to the body responsible for providing such compensation.

35. As to whether it is sufficient, for the purposes of transposing the Second Directive, to rely on an existing body, it must be borne in mind that, whilst legislative action on the part of each member state is not necessarily required in order to implement a directive, it is essential for national law to guarantee that the national authorities will effectively apply the directive in full, that the legal position under national law should be sufficiently precise and clear and that individuals are made fully aware of all their rights and, where appropriate, may rely on them before the national courts (see European Commission v Greece Case C-365/93 [1995] ECR I-499 (para 9) and European Commission v Netherlands Case C-144/99 [2001] ECR I-3541 (para 17)).

c 36. As the court has already made clear, the last-mentioned condition is of particular importance where the directive in question is intended to accord rights to nationals of other member states (see Commission v Greece, cited above (para 9) and Commission v Netherlands, cited above (para 18)). That is the position in relation to the Second Directive, which is intended in particular, according to the fifth recital in its preamble, to guarantee victims adequate protection, irrespective of the member state in which the accident occurred.

d 37. In those circumstances, it must be held that a body may be regarded as authorised by a member state within the meaning of art 1(4) of the Second Directive where its obligation to provide compensation to victims of damage or injury caused by unidentified or insufficiently insured vehicles derives from an agreement concluded between that body and a public authority of the member state, provided that the agreement is interpreted and applied as obliging the body to provide victims with the compensation guaranteed to them by the Second Directive and provided that victims may apply directly to that body.

f
The remedies available to victims

Observations submitted to the court

38. Mr Evans submits that the arbitration procedure under the Agreement does not comply with the requirements of the principle of effective judicial control, as developed in the case law of the Court of Justice (see Johnston v Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary Case 222/84 [1986] 3 All ER 135, [1986] ECR 1651 (paras 18, 19)), or those of the right to a fair trial under art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) (hereinafter the ECHR). The victim is not granted an oral hearing and can appeal against the arbitrator's award only on the ground of serious irregularity affecting the arbitration or on a question of law, and in the latter case leave to appeal must be obtained.

h 39. Those procedural rules also constitute, in his view, a breach of the principle of equal treatment, which requires that the member states afford to victims of damage or injury caused by unidentified vehicles the same judicial protection as that enjoyed by victims injured by vehicles which have been identified, and, in the United Kingdom, the latter are entitled to bring proceedings directly before a court.

i 40. The MIB and the United Kingdom government submit, as a preliminary point, that art 1(4) of the Second Directive prescribes only minimum procedural requirements, namely that a victim of damage or injury caused by an unidentified vehicle must be able to apply directly to the body responsible for awarding compensation. For the rest, the Second Directive refers to the legal systems of the member states. a

41. The United Kingdom government observes that the procedures adopted for dealing with an application for compensation submitted by victims of damage or injury caused by an unidentified vehicle, far from rendering impossible or excessively difficult the exercise of the rights accruing to victims under the directive, offer them multiple levels of protection. A victim of damage or injury caused by an unidentified vehicle is, in certain respects, in a more favourable situation than a victim injured by an identified but uninsured vehicle, since the procedure available often makes it possible to settle the dispute in a speedier and less costly manner than by recourse to court proceedings. b
c

42. The MIB and the United Kingdom government also contend that, according to the case law of the European Court of Human Rights, the question whether a procedure meets the requirements of art 6 of the ECHR must be considered as a whole, including the role of any appellate court (see Bryan v UK (1996) 21 EHRR 342). d

43. In the Commission's view, it is for the member states to ensure effective judicial control of the rights which the Second Directive is intended to confer on the victims of unidentified vehicles. It considers the procedure established in the United Kingdom and concludes that application of the criteria developed by the European Court of Human Rights might disclose the existence of shortcomings in the system in force, particularly as regards the status of the arbitrator, the lack of any hearing to establish the facts and the limitations imposed on the right to appeal against the arbitration award. e

Findings of the court

44. The second subparagraph of art 1(4) of the Second Directive confines itself to laying down minimum procedural requirements by providing that victims of damage or injury caused by unidentified or insufficiently insured vehicles must be able to apply directly to the body responsible for providing them with compensation (see paras 32–34, above) and that that body is required to give a reasoned reply concerning the action taken by it. According to the information available to the court, cl 9 of the Agreement meets the latter obligation. f
g

45. It is settled case law that in the absence of Community rules governing the matter it is for the domestic legal system of each member state to designate the courts and tribunals having jurisdiction and to lay down the detailed procedural rules governing actions for safeguarding rights which individuals derive from Community law, provided, however, that such rules are not less favourable than those governing similar domestic actions (the principle of equivalence) and do not render virtually impossible or excessively difficult the exercise of rights conferred by Community law (the principle of effectiveness) (see, in particular, Upjohn Ltd v Licensing Authority Case C-120/97 (2000) 51 BMLR 206, [1999] ECR I-223 (para 32)). h

46. As regards application of the principle of effectiveness, each case which raises the question whether a national procedural provision renders application of Community law impossible or excessively difficult must be analysed by reference to the role of that provision in the procedure, its progress and its special features, viewed as a whole, before the various national instances. In the light of that analysis, the basic principles of the domestic judicial system, such i a as protection of the rights of the defence, the principle of legal certainty and the proper conduct of procedure, must, where appropriate, be taken into consideration (see Van Schijndel v Stichting Pensioenfonds voor Fysiotherapeuten Joined cases C-430/93 and C-431/93 [1996] All ER (EC) 259, [1995] ECR I-4705 (para 19)).

b 47. According to the observations submitted to the court, the procedure established by the Agreement comprises several phases.

48. It is to be observed at the outset that, although the MIB is not a court, it is nevertheless required to determine the amount of the compensation which it is to pay under the same conditions as those under which a court would, pursuant to the provisions in force in the United Kingdom, determine the amount of damages which a victim would be entitled to obtain from a person identified as responsible.

c 49. Among the various arrangements for review provided for by the Agreement, the victim may, first, apply for re-examination of the decision taken by the MIB. However, that application must be submitted to the MIB, which itself decides whether it is appropriate to amend its own decision.

d 50. Second, the victim has a right of appeal to an arbitrator. According to the information before the court, the arbitrator is appointed under conditions which ensure that he is independent and that he makes his award after making his own assessment of the information in the file. The file must contain, among other things, all the documents lodged by the victim and all comments made by the victim in connection with both the application for compensation and, if appropriate, the application for review. The arbitrator may call on the MIB to undertake additional investigations, on which the victim is entitled to submit his comments.

e 51. Third, under the general rules on arbitration laid down by the Arbitration Acts, the victim may, in certain cases, appeal against the award to the High Court of Justice. That right of appeal is automatically available to a victim who alleges a serious irregularity affecting the arbitration. That right is also available to the victim, albeit subject to leave being granted by the High Court, if he alleges infringement of a rule of law, which may include the question whether there was any evidence to support any particular conclusion of the arbitrator or whether any particular conclusion was one to which no arbitrator could reasonably have come upon the evidence considered.

f 52. Fourth, a victim may, subject to obtaining leave from the competent court, subsequently appeal to the Court of Appeal and then to the House of Lords.

g 53. As the United Kingdom government observes, the procedure thus established by the Agreement gives the victim the advantages of speed and economy of legal costs. The United Kingdom government claimed, without being contradicted, that the bulk of the costs incurred in relation to applications for compensation and gathering of relevant evidence are borne by the MIB, which makes contact with all the witnesses to the accident to obtain statements from them and endeavours to obtain all necessary medical or other expert evidence.

h 54. In the light of all the foregoing considerations, it must be held that the procedural arrangements laid down by the national law in question do not render it practically impossible or excessively difficult to exercise the right to compensation conferred on victims of damage or injury caused by unidentified or insufficiently insured vehicles by the Second Directive and thus comply with the principle of effectiveness referred to in paras 45 and 46, above.

55. In view of the objective pursued by the Second Directive which, as stated in paras 21–28, above, is to provide a simple mechanism for compensating victims, it further appears that the cumulative effect of the possibilities of review available under the procedure established in the United Kingdom and also the practical advantages associated with that procedure confer on victims of damage or injury caused by unidentified or insufficiently insured vehicles a level of protection corresponding to that provided for by that directive. a

56. Nevertheless it is important to stress that the procedure established must guarantee that, both in dealings with the MIB and before the arbitrator, victims are made aware of any matter that might be used against them and have an opportunity to submit their comments thereon. b

57. It is for the national court to determine whether those conditions have been fulfilled in this case. c

58. Subject to that reservation, it must be held that procedural arrangements such as those adopted in the United Kingdom are sufficient to provide the protection to which victims of damage or injury caused by unidentified or insufficiently insured vehicles are entitled under the Second Directive. d

Payment of interest on sums paid by way of compensation

Observations of the court

59. According to Mr Evans, a textual interpretation of art 1(1) and (4) and art 3(1) of the Second Directive shows that that directive requires victims of damage or injury caused by an unidentified vehicle and victims of damage or injury caused by identified and insured vehicles are treated in the same way. Moreover, even if the Second Directive did not impose that rule, that obligation would stem from the general principle of equal treatment. However, that requirement is not fulfilled in the United Kingdom. In contrast to victims of identified and insured vehicles, victims of untraced vehicles do not obtain compensation that includes interest. e

60. Referring to the judgment in Marshall v Southampton and South West Hampshire Area Health Authority (No 2) Case C-271/91 [1993] 4 All ER 586, [1993] ECR I-4367 (para 31), in which the court held, with regard to discriminatory dismissal, that the award of interest must be regarded as an essential component of compensation, Mr Evans considers that that principle must apply to the compensation to be paid under the Second Directive to victims of damage or injury caused by unidentified vehicles. f

61. The MIB states, as a preliminary point, that, in English law, damages and interest are assessed by the courts at the time of judgment, taking into account any fluctuations in monetary value up to that point. Section 35A of the Supreme Court Act 1981 admittedly gave the courts the power, under certain conditions, to award interest on damages, but that power can be exercised only in court proceedings. g

62. The MIB and the United Kingdom government submit that the aim of the two directives at issue is to provide specified minimum guarantees, but that they do not provide for uniformity in the legislation of the member states. Neither directive contains any provision relating to the financial components of the compensation or requires equal treatment as between victims of identified vehicles and victims of unidentified vehicles. h

63. The MIB and the United Kingdom government also claim that there is no general principle of Community law that a requirement to pay a monetary amount by way of compensation due under Community law necessarily entails a requirement to pay interest. i

- a 64. The Commission refers to the absence, in both the First and Second Directives, of any express provision obliging the member states to require the body responsible for paying compensation to victims of damage or injury caused by unidentified vehicles to pay interest to them. However, on the basis of a purposive interpretation of that directive and having regard to the case law of the court relating to non-contractual liability of the Community (b Ireks-Arkady GmbH v Council of Ministers and Commission of the European Communities Case C-238/78 [1979] ECR 2955 (para 20) and Grifoni v EAEC Case C-308/87 [1994] ECR I-341 (para 40)) and relating to equal treatment for men and women (Marshall's case, cited above (para 31)), it inclines towards the view that the award of interest, under the applicable national rules, must be regarded as an essential component of the compensation referred to in art 1(4) c of the Second Directive.

Findings of the court

- d 65. First, it must be observed that the Second Directive contains no provision concerning interest on sums awarded by way of compensation for damage or injury caused by unidentified or insufficiently insured vehicles.

66. Under art 1(4) of the Second Directive, the body responsible for paying compensation for such damage or injuries must do so at least up to the limits of the insurance obligation, so as to guarantee victims adequate compensation.

- e 67. However, compensation for loss is intended so far as possible to provide restitution for the victim of an accident (see Grifoni's case, cited above (para 40)).

68. Accordingly, compensation for loss cannot leave out of account factors, such as the effluxion of time, which may in fact reduce its value (see, to that effect, Marshall's case, cited above (para 31)).

- f 69. In the absence of Community rules it is for the member states to decide on the rules to be applied to areas covered by the Second Directive and in particular the question of the effluxion of time and definition of the period to be taken into account to guarantee the victims of damage or injury caused by unidentified or insufficiently insured vehicles the adequate compensation which that directive seeks to provide.

- g 70. In that connection, the member states are free, in order to compensate for the loss suffered by victims as a result of the effluxion of time, to choose between awarding interest or paying compensation in the form of aggregate sums which take account of the effluxion of time.

- h 71. Accordingly, art 1(4) of the Second Directive is to be interpreted as meaning that the compensation awarded for damage or injuries caused by an unidentified or insufficiently insured vehicle, paid by the body authorised for that purpose, must take account of the effluxion of time until actual payment of the sums awarded in order to guarantee adequate compensation for the victims. It is incumbent on the member states to lay down the rules to be applied for that purpose.

Reimbursement of costs incurred in connection with the application for compensation

- i Observations submitted to the court

72. Mr Evans submits that payment of the costs incurred in relation to an application for compensation constitutes an essential component of the right to compensation. He also relies on the case law of the European Court of Human Rights, according to which the ECHR is intended to guarantee rights that are practical and effective (see Airey v Ireland (1979) 2 EHRR 305).

73. The other parties which have submitted observations repeat mutatis mutandis the considerations set out in connection with the first question regarding the award of interest as a component of the right to compensation (see paras 60–63 of this judgment). a

Findings of the court

74. First, it is to be observed that the Second Directive contains no provision concerning reimbursement of costs incurred by the victims of damage or injury caused by unidentified or insufficiently insured vehicles in connection with their application to the body responsible for awarding compensation. b

75. The view of most of the member states is that the question of reimbursement of costs incurred in connection with the procedure for obtaining compensation is a procedural matter. c

76. As pointed out in para 45 of this judgment, in the absence of Community rules governing the matter, it is for the domestic legal system of each member state to lay down the detailed procedural rules governing actions for safeguarding rights which individuals derive from Community law, in conformity with the principles of equivalence and effectiveness. d

77. It is incumbent on the national court to verify whether, under the procedural arrangements adopted in the United Kingdom, those principles are complied with. In particular, it should assess whether, in view of the less advantageous position in which victims find themselves vis-à-vis the MIB and the conditions under which such victims are able to submit their comments on matters that may be used against them, it appears reasonable, or indeed necessary, for them to be given legal assistance. e

78. In those circumstances, art 1(4) of the Second Directive is to be interpreted as meaning that compensation awarded for damage or injury caused by an unidentified or insufficiently insured vehicle, paid by the body authorised for that purpose, is not required to include reimbursement of the costs incurred by victims in connection with the processing of their application for compensation except to the extent to which such reimbursement is necessary to safeguard the rights derived by victims from the Second Directive in conformity with the principles of equivalence and effectiveness. It is for the national court to consider whether that is the case under the procedural arrangements adopted in the member state concerned. f g

Possible liability on the part of the member state concerned

Observations submitted to the court

79. Mr Evans submits that the conditions necessary to establish a claim for damages against the United Kingdom for failure to implement the Second Directive are satisfied. The result prescribed by the directive manifestly entails the grant of a right to individuals, the victims of untraced or uninsured vehicles, a class to which the claimant clearly belongs. The extent of that right, namely entitlement to compensation from an authorised body, can be identified from the provisions of the directive. It is not necessary for the court to consider the question of causality, this being a matter for the national court. Finally, the breach is sufficiently serious because the United Kingdom has failed to adopt any measure whatsoever to implement the directive. h i

80. For the United Kingdom government, the first two alleged breaches, resulting from the absence of provisions concerning the award of interest and of provisions concerning reimbursement of expenses in connection with

- a applications for compensation, at the very least raise certain questions. Also, it was reasonable for the United Kingdom to consider that the procedure established satisfied the requirement of effective judicial control. Finally, the alleged breach, consisting in failure properly to authorise the body responsible for compensating victims of damage or injury caused by unidentified vehicles, even if proved, would not in any event have caused Mr Evans to suffer any loss.
- b 81. The Commission considers that it is for the national court to establish whether in this case there has been a sufficiently serious breach of Community law. In that connection, it emphasises, however, that there is no mention of interest and costs, as such, relating to the application for compensation in the Second Directive, that there is no case law on those points and that the Commission has never previously raised them in relation to transposition of the Second Directive. It adds that the issue of the compatibility of the system established in the United Kingdom with the right of access to the courts calls for further clarification.
- c

Findings of the court

- d 82. First, as the court has repeatedly held, the principle of liability on the part of a member state for damage caused to individuals as a result of breaches of Community law for which the State is responsible is inherent in the system of the Treaty (see, in particular, Francovich v Italy Joined cases C-6/90 and C-9/90 [1991] ECR I-5357 (para 35), Brasserie du Pêcheur SA v Germany, R v Secretary of State for Transport, ex p Factortame Ltd Joined cases C-46/93 and C-48/93 [1996] All ER (EC) 301, [1996] ECR I-1029 (para 31) and Haim v Kassenzahnärztliche Vereinigung Nordrhein Case C-424/97 [2000] ECR I-5123 (para 26)).
- e 83. As to the conditions to be satisfied for a member state to be required to make reparation for loss and damage caused to individuals as a result of breaches of Community law for which the state is responsible, the court has held that these are threefold: the rule of law infringed must be intended to confer rights on individuals; the breach must be sufficiently serious; and there must be a direct causal link between the breach of the obligation incumbent on the state and the loss or damage sustained by the injured parties (Haim's case, cited above (para 36)).
- f 84. If in light of the examination to be undertaken by the national court in accordance with the guidance given by the court, the compensation system set up in the United Kingdom is found to be subject to one or more defects of transposition, then it will be incumbent on the national court to determine whether or not those defects have adversely affected Mr Evans.
- g 85. If they have, it will then be necessary to determine whether the non-fulfilment of the United Kingdom's obligation to transpose the Second Directive is sufficiently serious.
- h 86. In that connection, all the factors which characterise the situation must be taken into account. Those factors include, in particular, the clarity and precision of the rule infringed, whether the infringement or the damage caused was intentional or involuntary, whether any error of law was excusable or inexcusable, and the fact that the position taken by a Community institution may have contributed towards the adoption or maintenance of national measures or practices contrary to Community law (see Haim's case, cited above (para 43)).
- i 87. Those criteria must in principle be applied by the national courts in accordance with the guidelines laid down by the court (see, in particular, Brasserie du Pêcheur, cited above (paras 55–58)).

88. Accordingly, it is incumbent on the national court, if examination of the existing compensation system discloses a defect in transposition of the Second Directive and if that defect has adversely affected Mr Evans, to determine whether the breach of that obligation of transposition is sufficiently serious. a

COSTS

89. The costs incurred by the United Kingdom government and by the Commission, which have submitted observations to the court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. b

On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Fifth Chamber), in answer to the questions referred to it by the High Court of Justice of England and Wales, Queen's Bench Division, by order of 17 May 2000, hereby rules: c

(1) Article 1(4) of Second Council Directive (EEC) 84/5 (on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to insurance against civil liability in respect of the use of motor vehicles is to be interpreted as meaning that: d

—A body may be regarded as authorised by a member state within the meaning of that provision where its obligation to provide compensation to victims of damage or injury caused by unidentified or insufficiently insured vehicles derives from an agreement concluded between that body and a public authority of the member state, provided that the agreement is interpreted and applied as obliging the body to provide victims with the compensation guaranteed to them by Directive 84/5 and provided that victims may apply directly to that body. e —Procedural arrangements such as those adopted in the United Kingdom are sufficient to provide the protection to which victims of damage or injury caused by unidentified or insufficiently insured vehicles are entitled under Directive 84/5. f

—The compensation awarded for damage or injuries caused by an unidentified or insufficiently insured vehicle, paid by the body authorised for that purpose, must take account of the effluxion of time until actual payment of the sums awarded in order to guarantee adequate compensation for the victims. It is incumbent on the member states to lay down the rules to be applied for that purpose. g

—The compensation awarded for damage or injury caused by an unidentified or insufficiently insured vehicle, paid by the body authorised for that purpose, is not required to include reimbursement of the costs incurred by victims in connection with the processing of their application for compensation except to the extent to which such reimbursement is necessary to safeguard the rights derived by victims from Directive 84/5 in conformity with the principles of equivalence and effectiveness. It is for the national court to consider whether that is the case under the procedural arrangements adopted in the member state concerned. h

(2) It is incumbent on the national court, if examination of the existing compensation system discloses a defect in transposition of Directive 84/5 and if that defect has adversely affected Mr Evans, to determine whether the breach of that obligation of transposition is sufficiently serious. i

a

Verein für Konsumenteninformation
v European Commission (supported by Bank für Arbeit und Wirtschaft
b AG and others, intervening) (Case T-2/03)

c

COURT OF FIRST INSTANCE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (FIRST CHAMBER, EXTENDED COMPOSITION)
JUDGES VESTERDORF (PRESIDENT), JAEGER, MENGOZZI, MARTINS RIBEIRO AND LABUCKA
28 SEPTEMBER 2004, 13 APRIL 2005

d

European Community – Community institutions – Access to information – Public access to Commission documents – Applicant seeking access to administrative file relating to previous decision – Commission refusing access on grounds effort involved in examination of documents disproportionate – Applicant seeking annulment of decision to refuse access – Whether Commission’s refusal infringing Community legislation in respect of rights of access to documents – Parliament and Council Regulation (EC) e 1049/2001 – Commission Decision D (2002) 330472.

f

Verein für Konsumenteninformation (VKI) was a consumer organisation constituted under Austrian law. In order to facilitate its task of safeguarding the interests of consumers, VKI had the right to bring proceedings before the Austrian civil courts in order to assert certain financial claims of consumers assigned to it. By Decision (EC) 2004/138 (relating to a proceedings under art 81 of the EC Treaty), the Commission found that eight Austrian banks had participated, over a number of years, in a cartel known as the ‘Lombard Club’ covering almost the whole of Austria (the Lombard Club decision). The Commission imposed fines on those banks, including in particular Bank für Arbeit und Wirtschaft AG (BAWAG), Österreichische Volksbanken AG (ÖVAG)
g and Niederösterreichische Landesbank-Hypothekenbank AG (NÖ-Hypobank).
The VKI was conducting several sets of proceedings against BAWAG before the Austrian courts, on the basis that BAWAG had charged its customers too much interest over a number of years. VKI requested authorisation from the Commission to consult the administrative file relating to the Lombard Club h decision. In support of its request, VKI stated, inter alia, that in order to secure damages for the consumers on whose behalf it was acting, it had to be able to put forward specific claims regarding both the illegality of BAWAG’s conduct under competition law and the effects of that conduct. To that end, consultation of the Lombard Club file would have been a significant, or even indispensable, help to it. The Commission, basing its decision on Parliament i and Council Regulation (EC) 1049/2001 (regarding access to European Parliament, Council and Commission documents), rejected VKI’s request in its entirety, and in due course adopted Decision D (2002) 330472 (relating to a request for access to the administrative file in Case COMP/36.571/D-1, Austrian banks—‘Lombard Club’) (the contested decision), which confirmed the rejection. VKI brought an action before the Court of First Instance of the European Communities seeking annulment of the contested decision and an order for the production and examination of the file in question with a view to determining whether its claims were well founded. VKI submitted, inter alia, that it was incompatible with the right of access to documents and, in particular, with Regulation 1049/2001 to refuse access to the whole of an administrative file without having first actually examined each of the documents contained in the file. VKI further maintained that the Commission should, at the very least, have granted it partial access to the file. The Commission submitted that examination of the various documents and parts of documents had not taken place since the effort involved in such an operation would have been disproportionate.

Held – Where an institution received a request for access under Regulation 1049/2001 it was required, in principle, to carry out a concrete, individual assessment of the documents referred to in the request. The principle of proportionality required measures adopted by Community institutions not to exceed the limits of what was appropriate and necessary in order to attain the objectives pursued; when there is a choice between several appropriate measures recourse had to be had to the least onerous, and the disadvantages caused had not to be disproportionate to the aims pursued. Refusal by an institution to examine concretely and individually the documents covered by a request for access constituted, in principle, a manifest breach of the principle of proportionality. It had to be noted, however, that where a request related to a very large number of documents, the institution's right to seek a 'fair solution' together with the applicant, pursuant to art 6(3) of Regulation 1049/2001, reflected the possibility of account being taken, albeit in a particularly limited way, of the need, where appropriate, to reconcile the interests of the applicant with those of good administration. An institution had therefore to retain the right, in particular cases where concrete, individual examination of the documents would entail an unreasonable amount of administrative work, to balance the interest in public access to the documents against the burden of work so caused, in order to safeguard, in those particular cases, the interests of good administration. It was only in exceptional cases and only where the administrative burden entailed by a concrete, individual examination of the documents proved to be particularly heavy, thereby exceeding the limits of what might reasonably be required, that a derogation from that obligation to examine the documents might be permissible. In the instant case, there were a number of factors which suggested that concrete, individual examination of all the documents in the Lombard Club file might represent a very large amount of work. However, it was not apparent from the reasons for the contested decision that the Commission had assessed, in a concrete, specific and detailed manner, on the one hand, the other conceivable options for limiting its workload and, on the other, the reasons which could allow it to avoid carrying out any examination rather than adopting, where appropriate, a measure less restrictive of the applicant's right of access. In particular, it was not apparent from the contested decision that, as regards the identification of the documents contained in a file arranged in chronological order, that the Commission had specifically examined the option of asking the banks involved in the Lombard Club file to provide it with the dates of the documents submitted by them, which might possibly have enabled it to find some of them more easily in its file. In addition, although the Commission had stated in its defence that drawing up a table of contents would have been a

- a* disproportionate task, the examination of that option had not been mentioned at all in the contested decision and therefore could not be considered to have been specifically examined. Finally, it was likewise not apparent from the contested decision that the Commission had evaluated the amount of work involved in identifying, then examining, individually and concretely, the few documents most likely to satisfy immediately and, where appropriate, partially
- b* in the first instance the applicant's interests. The outright refusal by the Commission to grant VKI access was therefore vitiated by an error of law. The contested decision would, accordingly, be annulled (see judgment paras 74, 99–102, 112, 122, 130–131, below).

c Notes

For public access to Community documents, see 8(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2003 reissue) para 470.

Cases cited

- d* Associazione Italiana Tecnico Economica del Cemento (AITEC) v European Commission Joined cases T-447–449/93 [1995] ECR II-1971, CFI.
- British American Tobacco International (Investments) v European Commission* Case T-111/00 [2001] ECR II-2997, CFI.
- British Steel plc v European Commission* Case T-243/94 [1997] ECR II-1887, CFI.
- Chemie Linz GmbH v European Commission* Case C-245/92 P [1999] ECR I-4643, ECJ.
- e* De Gezamenlijke Steenkolenmijnen in Limburg v ECSC High Authority Case 30/59 [1961] ECR 1, ECJ.
- Denavit Nederland BV v European Commission* Case T-20/99 [2000] ECR II-3011, CFI.
- France v Monsanto Co* Case C-248/99 P [2002] ECR I-1, ECJ.
- f* Hautala v EU Council Case T-14/98 [1999] ECR II-2489, CFI; affid Case C-353/99 P [2002] 1 WLR 1930, [2001] ECR I-9565, ECJ.
- Interporc Im-und Export GmbH v European Commission* Case T-124/96 [1998] ECR II-231, CFI.
- Johnston v Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary* Case 222/84 [1986] 3 All ER 135, [1987] QB 129, [1986] 3 WLR 1038, [1986] ECR 1651, ECJ.
- g* JT's Corp Ltd v European Commission Case T-123/99 [2000] ECR II-3269, CFI.
- Kuijer v EU Council* Case T-188/98 [2000] ECR II-1959, CFI.
- Kuijer v EU Council* Case T-211/00 [2003] All ER (EC) 276, [2002] ECR II-485, CFI.
- La Cinq SA v EC Commission* Case T-44/90 [1992] ECR II-1, CFI.
- h* Métropole Télévision SA v European Commission Joined cases T-528/93, T-542/93, T-543/93 and T-546/93 [1996] ECR II-649, CFI.
- R v Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, ex p National Farmers' Union* Case C-157/96 [1998] ECR I-2211, ECJ.
- Royal Philips Electronics NV v European Commission* Case T-119/02 [2003] ECR II-1433, CFI.
- i* Siderurgica Aristrain Madrid SL v European Commission Case C-196/99 P [2003] ECR I-11049, ECJ.
- Tideland Signal Ltd v European Commission* Case T-211/02 [2002] ECR II-3781, CFI.
- Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v European Commission* Joined cases T-228/99 and T-233/99 [2003] ECR II-435, CFI.

WWF UK (Sweden intervening) v European Commission (France intervening) Case T-105/95 [1997] All ER (EC) 300, [1997] ECR II-313, CFI.

Application

By application lodged at the Registry of the Court of First Instance on 7 January 2003, Verein für Konsumenteninformation (VKI), established in Vienna, Austria, brought an action for the annulment of Commission Decision D (2002) 330472 relating to a request for access to the administrative file in Case COMP/36.571/D-1, Austrian banks—'Lombard Club' (the contested decision). By order of 1 August 2003, the applications of Bank für Arbeit und Wirtschaft AG (BAWAG), established in Vienna, with an address for service in Luxembourg, Österreichische Volksbanken AG (ÖVAG), established in Vienna, and Niederösterreichische Landesbank-Hypothekenbank AG (NÖ-Hypobank), established in Sankt Pölten, Austria to intervene were allowed. VKI was represented by A Klauser, lawyer. The Commission of the European Communities was represented by S Rating and P Aalto, acting as agents, with an address for service in Luxembourg. BAWAG was represented by H-J Niemeyer, lawyer, with an address for service in Luxembourg. ÖVAG and NÖ-Hypobank were represented by R Roniger, A Ablasser and W Hemetsberger, lawyers. The language of the case was German. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

13 April 2005. THE COURT OF FIRST INSTANCE (First Chamber, Extended Composition) delivered the following judgment.

LEGAL FRAMEWORK

1. European Parliament and Council Regulation (EC) 1049/2001 (regarding public access to European Parliament, Council and Commission documents) (OJ 2001 L145 p 43) defines the principles, conditions and limits governing the right of access to documents of those institutions, provided for in art 255 EC (formerly art 191a of the EC Treaty). That regulation has been applicable since 3 December 2001.

2. Commission Decision (EC, ECSC, Euratom) 2001/937 (amending its rules of procedure) (OJ 2001 L345 p 94) repealed Commission Decision (ECSC, EC, Euratom) 94/90 (on public access to Commission documents) (OJ 1994 L46 p 58), which ensured that effect was given, as regards the Commission of the European Communities, to the code of conduct on public access to Council and Commission documents (OJ 1993 L340 p 41; the code of conduct).

3. Article 2 of Regulation 1049/2001 provides:

'1. Any citizen of the Union, and any natural or legal person residing or having its registered office in a Member State, has a right of access to documents of the institutions, subject to the principles, conditions and limits defined in this Regulation ...

3. This Regulation shall apply to all documents held by an institution, that is to say, documents drawn up or received by it and in its possession, in all areas of activity of the European Union ...'

4. Article 3 of Regulation 1049/2001 lays down certain definitions as follows:

'For the purpose of this Regulation:

(a) "document" shall mean any content whatever its medium (written on paper or stored in electronic form or as a sound, visual or audiovisual

- a recording) concerning a matter relating to the policies, activities and decisions falling within the institution's sphere of responsibility;
- (b) "third party" shall mean any natural or legal person, or any entity outside the institution concerned, including the Member States, other Community or non-Community institutions and bodies and third countries.'
- b 5. Article 4 of Regulation 1049/2001, relating to the exceptions to the abovementioned right of access, states:
1. The institutions shall refuse access to a document where disclosure would undermine the protection of ...
- c (b) privacy and the integrity of the individual, in particular in accordance with Community legislation regarding the protection of personal data.
2. The institutions shall refuse access to a document where disclosure would undermine the protection of:
- commercial interests of a natural or legal person, including intellectual property,
- d —court proceedings and legal advice,
- the purpose of inspections, investigations and audits, unless there is an overriding public interest in disclosure.
3. Access to a document, drawn up by an institution for internal use or received by an institution, which relates to a matter where the decision has not been taken by the institution, shall be refused if disclosure of the document would seriously undermine the institution's decision-making process, unless there is an overriding public interest in disclosure.
- e Access to a document containing opinions for internal use as part of deliberations and preliminary consultations within the institution concerned shall be refused even after the decision has been taken if disclosure of the document would seriously undermine the institution's decision-making process, unless there is an overriding public interest in disclosure.
- f 4. As regards third-party documents, the institution shall consult the third party with a view to assessing whether an exception in paragraph 1 or 2 is applicable, unless it is clear that the document shall or shall not be disclosed ...
- g 6. If only parts of the requested document are covered by any of the exceptions, the remaining parts of the document shall be released ...'

BACKGROUND TO THE DISPUTE

- h 6. The Verein für Konsumenteninformation (the VKI or the applicant) is a consumer organisation constituted under Austrian law. In order to facilitate its task of safeguarding the interests of consumers, Austrian law confers on the VKI the right to bring proceedings before the Austrian civil courts in order to assert certain financial claims of consumers, which the latter have previously assigned to it.
- i 7. By Decision (EC) 2004/138 (relating to a proceeding under art 81 of the EC Treaty (now art 77 EC) (in Case COMP/36.571/D-1: Austrian banks—'Lombard Club')) (OJ 2004 L56 p 1), the Commission found that eight Austrian banks had participated, over a number of years, in a cartel known as the 'Lombard Club' covering almost the whole of Austria (the Lombard Club decision). In the Commission's view, the banks referred to had, within that cartel, inter alia, fixed jointly the interest rates for certain investments and loans. The Commission therefore imposed fines totalling €124.26m on those banks, which included in particular the Bank für Arbeit und Wirtschaft AG (BAWAG), the Österreichische Volksbanken-AG (ÖVAG) and the Niederösterreichische Landesbank-Hypothekenbank AG (NÖ-Hypobank).

8. The VKI is currently conducting several sets of proceedings against BAWAG before the Austrian courts. In those proceedings, the VKI claims that, on account of an incorrect adjustment of the interest rates applicable to variable interest loans granted by BAWAG, the latter charged its customers too much interest over a number of years.

9. By letter of 14 June 2002, the applicant requested authorisation from the Commission to consult the administrative file relating to the Lombard Club decision. In support of its request, the VKI stated inter alia that, in order to secure damages for the consumers on whose behalf it was acting, it had to be able to put forward specific claims regarding both the illegality of BAWAG's conduct under competition law and the effects of that conduct. To that end, consultation of the Lombard Club file would have been a significant, or even indispensable, help to it.

10. By letter of 3 July 2002, the Commission asked the VKI to clarify its request and, in particular, its legal basis. In reply to that letter, the VKI stated, by letter of 8 July 2002, that its request was based inter alia on art 255(1) and (2) EC, on Regulation 1049/2001, on the provisions implementing that regulation and on art 42 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union (OJ 2000 C364 p 1; the Charter of Fundamental Rights), as well as on arts 5 and 10 EC (formerly arts 3b and 5 of the EC Treaty).

11. On 24 July 2002, at a meeting with the Commission's staff, the representatives of the VKI raised the possibility that the applicant could give an undertaking in writing to use the information obtained solely for the purpose of asserting consumers' claims in the national proceedings against BAWAG.

12. By letter of 12 August 2002, the VKI supplemented its request by confirming that it was prepared to give the undertaking mentioned at the meeting on 24 July 2002.

13. By letter of 12 September 2002, the Commission, basing its decision on Regulation 1049/2001, rejected the VKI's request in its entirety.

14. On 26 September 2002, the VKI made a confirmatory request as referred to in art 7(2) of Regulation 1049/2001, in which it stated, inter alia, while maintaining its request, that it was not interested primarily in the Commission's internal documents.

15. On 14 October 2002, the Commission acknowledged receipt of that confirmatory request and informed the applicant that, owing to the number of documents requested, the time limit for replying which was applicable to the processing of its request was extended by 15 working days.

16. On 18 December 2002, the Commission adopted Decision D (2002) 330472 (relating to a request for access to the administrative file in Case COMP/36.571/D-1, Austrian banks—'Lombard Club') (the contested decision). The contested decision confirms the rejection of 12 September 2002.

17. In the contested decision, the Commission divided, in the first place, the documents in the Lombard Club file, except for the internal documents, into 11 separate categories. Excluding internal documents, that file contains more than 47,000 pages.

18. In the second place, the Commission detailed the reasons on which it based its view that each of the categories previously identified was covered by one or more of the exceptions provided for by Regulation 1049/2001.

- a 19. In the third place, the Commission took the view that, in cases where the application of certain exceptions would necessitate a balancing of the conflicting interests, the VKI had not referred to an overriding public interest in the access requested.
- b 20. In the fourth place, the Commission listed the reasons why partial access was not possible in this case. In the Commission's view, a detailed examination of each document, which was necessary for any partial consultation, would have represented an excessive and disproportionate amount of work for it.
- c 21. In the fifth place, the Commission took the view that no consultation of third parties in order to consider possible access to the documents of which they were the authors was necessary in this case since, pursuant to art 4(4) of Regulation 1049/2001, it was clear that those documents did not have to be disclosed.
22. The Commission concluded in the contested decision that the applicant's request for access had to be rejected in its entirety.

PROCEDURE BEFORE THE COURT OF FIRST INSTANCE

- d 23. By application lodged at the Registry of the Court of First Instance on 7 January 2003, the VKI brought an action for annulment of the contested decision. By separate document lodged on the same day, it applied to have that action adjudicated on under an expedited procedure in accordance with art 76a of the Rules of Procedure of the Court of First Instance.
- e 24. By separate document lodged on 8 January 2003, the VKI applied for legal aid.
25. On 20 January 2003, the Commission lodged its observations on the application for an expedited procedure.
- f 26. The First Chamber of the Court of First Instance, to which the case was assigned by decision of 20 January 2003, rejected the application for an expedited procedure by a decision of 28 January 2003, which was notified to the applicant on the following day.
27. On 18 February 2003, the Commission lodged its observations on the application for legal aid.
28. On 10 March 2003, the Commission lodged its defence.
29. The applicant's application for legal aid was rejected by order of the President of the Court of 14 March 2003.
- g 30. By letter of 1 April 2003, the applicant waived its right to lodge a reply.
31. On 15 April 2003, BAWAG lodged an application to intervene in support of the form of order sought by the Commission. The Kingdom of Sweden and the Republic of Finland applied, on 16 and 25 April respectively, to intervene in support of the form of order sought by the VKI. Finally, on 29 April 2003,
- h ÖVAG and NÖ-Hypobank jointly applied to intervene in support of the form of order sought by the Commission.
32. By order of the President of the First Chamber of the Court of First Instance of 1 August 2003, the Republic of Finland and the Kingdom of Sweden were granted leave to intervene in support of the form of order sought by the applicant. In the same order, BAWAG, on the one hand, and ÖVAG and NÖ-Hypobank, on the other, were granted leave to intervene in support of the form of order sought by the Commission.
- i 33. Those applications having been made within the period prescribed in art 115(1) of the Rules of Procedure, the interveners received, pursuant to art 116(2) of the Rules of Procedure, a copy of every document served on the parties.

34. The Republic of Finland and the Kingdom of Sweden lodged, on 10 and 12 September 2003 respectively, applications to withdraw their interventions. a

35. On 26 September 2003, BAWAG, on the one hand, and ÖVAG and NÖ-Hypobank, on the other, lodged their statements in intervention.

36. Since the VKI and the Commission did not lodge any observations on the applications to withdraw lodged by the Republic of Finland and the Kingdom of Sweden, the President of the First Chamber, by order of 6 November 2003, removed from the file of this case the interventions of those interveners and ordered the VKI and the Commission to bear their own costs in respect of those interventions. b

37. On 14 November 2003, the applicant lodged its written observations on the statements in intervention, whereas those of the Commission were lodged on 11 November 2003. c

38. Pursuant to art 14 of the Rules of Procedure and acting on a proposal from the First Chamber, the court decided, after the parties had been heard in accordance with art 51 of those rules, to refer the case to a Chamber with an extended composition.

39. Upon hearing the Report of the Judge-Rapporteur, the court (First Chamber, Extended Composition) decided to open the oral procedure and, as a measure of organisation of procedure provided for in art 64 of the Rules of Procedure, put certain questions in writing to the Commission and the interveners. d

40. On 6 July 2004, the Commission and the interveners replied in writing to the court's questions. e

41. The parties presented oral argument and their replies to the court's questions at the hearing on 28 September 2004.

FORMS OF ORDER SOUGHT BY THE PARTIES

42. The applicant claims that the court should:

—annul the contested decision; f

—order the production of, and examine, the file in question with a view to determining whether the claims of the VKI are well founded;

—order the Commission to pay the costs.

43. The Commission contends that the court should:

—dismiss the action;

—order the applicant to pay the costs. g

44. BAWAG, in support of the Commission, submits that the court should:

—dismiss the action;

—order the applicant to pay the costs, including those incurred by the intervener.

45. Finally, ÖVAG and NÖ-Hypobank, in support of the Commission, submit that the court should: h

—dismiss the action;

—order the applicant to pay the costs.

LAW

The framework of the dispute and the admissibility of certain arguments put forward by the interveners i

46. It is not disputed that the Commission adopted the contested decision under Regulation 1049/2001.

47. The VKI's action is based, essentially, on six pleas. By its first plea, the VKI submits that it is incompatible with the right of access to documents and, in

- a particular, with Regulation 1049/2001 to refuse access to the whole of an administrative file without having first actually examined each of the documents contained in the file. In its second plea, the VKI claims that the Commission applied or interpreted incorrectly several of the exceptions provided for in art 4(1) and (2) of Regulation 1049/2001. In its third plea, the VKI argues that the Commission concluded unlawfully that the balance of the conflicting interests was not in favour of disclosure of the administrative file referred to by its request. In its fourth plea, the VKI maintains that the Commission should, at the very least, have granted it partial access to the file. By its fifth plea, the VKI claims that the failure to consult the banks which were the authors of certain documents constitutes an infringement of art 4(4) of Regulation 1049/2001. Finally, in its sixth plea, the applicant complains that the Commission infringed art 255 EC, art 42 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights and arts 5 and 10 EC.

48. In their statements in intervention, BAWAG, on the one hand, and ÖVAG and NÖ-Hypobank, on the other, put forward a number of arguments (the additional arguments) intended to show, in the first place, that Regulation 1049/2001 applies only to documents produced during the Community legislative process, in the second place, that the right of access to documents concerning competition cases was, at the material time, governed only by Council Regulation 17/62 (first regulation implementing arts [81 EC] and [82 EC] of the Treaty) (OJ English Sp Edn 1959–1962 p 87), in the third place, that an association with public law status does not enjoy the right of access provided for by Regulation 1049/2001, in the fourth place, that the VKI's request for access was unlawful under Regulation 1049/2001, in the fifth place, that Regulation 1049/2001 is contrary to art 255 EC in that it allows access to documents originating from third parties and, in the sixth place, that that regulation can apply only to documents which came into the possession of the institutions after it became applicable, that is, from 3 December 2001.

- f 49. The additional arguments thus seek to demonstrate, firstly, that Regulation 1049/2001 was not applicable in this case, or, secondly, that it was applied incorrectly by the Commission, or, thirdly, that it constitutes an unlawful legal basis for the contested decision.

- g 50. Consequently, if one or more of the additional arguments were to be accepted by the court, that would permit a finding that the contested decision is unlawful. However, it should be pointed out that the interveners were granted leave to intervene in this case in support of the form of order sought by the Commission and that, moreover, the latter contends that the action for annulment should be dismissed.

- h 51. When questioned in writing and at the hearing about the compatibility of the additional arguments with the form of order supported by the interveners, the latter replied in essence that, according to case law, an intervener is entitled to advance arguments which differ from or even conflict with those of the party which he supports (see De Gezamenlijke Steenkolenmijnen in Limburg v ECSC High Authority Case 30/59 [1961] ECR 1 at 17, 18 and Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v European Commission Joined cases T-228/99 and T-233/99 [2003] ECR II-435 (para 145)).

- i 52. However, under the fourth paragraph of art 40 of the Statute of the Court of Justice, which applies to the Court of First Instance by virtue of art 53 of that statute, an application to intervene must be limited to supporting the form of order sought by one of the parties. In addition, under art 116(3) of the Rules of Procedure, the intervener must accept the case as it finds it at the time of its intervention. Although those provisions do not preclude an intervener from using arguments different from those used by the party it is supporting, that is nevertheless on the condition that they do not alter the framework of the dispute and that the intervention is still intended to support the form of order sought by that party (see, to that effect, Chemie Linz GmbH v European Commission Case C-245/92 P [1999] ECR I-4643 (para 32), France v Monsanto Co Case C-248/99 P [2002] ECR I-1 (para 56) and Royal Philips Electronics NV v European Commission Case T-119/02 [2003] ECR II-1433 (paras 203, 212)).

53. In this case, since, on the one hand, assuming that they are well founded, the additional arguments would permit a finding that the contested decision is unlawful and since, on the other hand, the form of order sought by the Commission is the dismissal of the action for annulment and is not supported by arguments seeking a declaration that the contested decision is unlawful, it is clear that consideration of the additional arguments would have the effect of altering the framework of the dispute as defined in the application and the defence (see, to that effect, Associazione Italiana Tecnico Economica del Cemento (AITEC) v European Commission Joined cases T-447-449/93 [1995] ECR II-1971 (para 122) and British Steel plc v European Commission Case T-243/94 [1997] ECR II-1887 (paras 72, 73)).

54. Moreover, the interveners' claim that the additional arguments support, in essence, the form of order sought by the Commission, namely, refusal of the access to documents requested by the applicant, must be rejected. Firstly, in this case, the Commission has certainly not contended that the requested access to the documents at issue should be refused regardless of the reasons for the contested decision, but only that the action for annulment should be dismissed. Secondly, it is not for the court, when reviewing the lawfulness of a measure, to assume the role of the Commission and determine whether access to the contested documents is to be refused for reasons other than those mentioned in the contested decision.

55. The additional arguments must therefore be rejected as inadmissible.

The first plea, alleging failure to carry out a concrete examination of the documents referred to in the request for access, and the fourth plea, alleging infringement of the right to partial access

56. The first and fourth pleas put forward by the applicant must be examined first and together.

Arguments of the parties

—The first plea, alleging failure to carry out a concrete examination of the documents referred to in the request for access

57. In its first plea, the VKI claims that, in the contested decision, the Commission, contrary to Regulation 1049/2001, exempted the whole of the Lombard Club file from the right of access without carrying out a concrete examination of each of the documents contained in that file. However, only actual circumstances applying to specific documents can justify an exception to the right of access to those documents.

58. In reply to the applicant's first plea, the Commission contends that, in this case, it is not necessary to determine whether it refused access to all the documents referred to in the request for access, but only whether it gave a proper statement of reasons for its refusal in respect of all those documents.

a However, the Commission certainly did not, in this case, exclude the whole of the Lombard Club file from the right of access but, on the contrary, explained why the reasons for refusal listed in art 4 of Regulation 1049/2002 precluded disclosure of the documents in that file.

b 59. The Commission adds that it is not contrary to Community law to refuse access to various categories of documents without examining each of the documents in those categories where, as in this case, the reasons for the Commission's refusal are stated in respect of each category. The court has expressly held that the Commission is entitled to subdivide a file into categories, to which it may then refuse access altogether, provided that it mentions the reasons for its refusal (see WWF UK (Sweden intervening) v European Commission (France intervening) Case T-105/95 [1997] All ER (EC) 300, [1997] ECR II-313 (para 64)).

c 60. Finally, the Commission points out that examination of the various documents and parts of documents within those categories did not take place since the effort involved in such an operation would have been disproportionate.

d —The fourth plea, alleging infringement of the right to partial access

e 61. The VKI submits that total refusal of access to the file would have been justified only if all the documents in it were covered by at least one of the exceptions in art 4 of Regulation 1049/2001. Since that condition was not satisfied in this case, the applicant should at least have been entitled to partial access. The Commission's 'commendable' concern to limit its workload cannot have the consequence of destroying the chances of compensation for the damage suffered by consumers as the result of a cartel.

f 62. The Commission challenges the validity of those arguments. It acknowledges that the case law of the Court of Justice and the Court of First Instance recognises the existence of a right of partial access to documents. The Commission none the less points out that such access may be refused where it involves a disproportionate effort for the institution concerned.

g 63. The effort required for a file of more than 47,000 pages is bound to be disproportionate. That is at the very least the case where, on the one hand, the number of documents likely to be made available in each relevant category is very small and, on the other hand, those documents are manifestly of no use. h Since the documents in the file are arranged in chronological order, any partial access would involve reviewing it in its entirety. Moreover, the task of drawing up a table of contents for the whole file would, having regard to the application of the exceptions in art 4 of Regulation 1049/2001, be just as disproportionate as partial access. The Commission concedes that the disproportionate nature of the effort involved does not in itself constitute a reason for refusal. However, where it is clear from an analysis of strictly-defined categories of documents that access must be refused, no additional examination of each document within the relevant category is justified.

i 64. Both BAWAG and ÖVAG and NÖ-Hypobank essentially support the arguments of the Commission. They point out that where an applicant has expressly indicated its interest in its request for access, it is disproportionate to require the institution to which that request is made to grant partial access to documents which do not serve the purpose of the request.

Findings of the court

65. It is common ground that the Commission did not carry out a concrete, individual examination of the documents comprising the Lombard Club file.

At the hearing, the Commission confirmed that, in response to the applicant's confirmatory request, it had divided the Lombard Club file, excluding the internal documents, into 11 separate categories of documents, although without examining each of the documents. It is also clear from the contested decision that, after defining those categories, the Commission considered that 'one or more exceptions provided for in art 4 of Regulation 1049/2001 appl[ied] to each category of document, without there being any overriding public interest in disclosure'. The Commission then stated that 'for reasons of proportionality, it [did] not appear either necessary or expedient to undertake an examination of the documents beyond the abovementioned categories'. The Commission further stated, 'as a subsidiary consideration', that publication of the Lombard Club decision was sufficient to 'safeguard' the interests of the applicant.

66. In the light of those considerations, it must therefore be determined whether the Commission was obliged, in principle, to carry out a concrete, individual examination of the documents referred to in the request for access, then, if so, to examine to what extent that obligation to examine could be qualified by certain exceptions based, inter alia, on the amount of work entailed by it.

—The obligation to carry out a concrete, individual examination

67. Article 2 of Regulation 1049/2001 defines the principle of the right of access to documents of the institutions. Article 4 of Regulation 1049/2001 sets out a number of exceptions to the right of access. Finally, arts 6 to 8 of Regulation 1049/2001 lay down certain procedures according to which a request for access must be processed.

68. The effect of those provisions is that the institution to which a request for access is made under Regulation 1049/2001 is obliged to examine and reply to that request and, in particular, to determine whether any of the exceptions referred to in art 4 of the regulation is applicable to the documents in question.

69. According to settled case law, the examination required for the purpose of processing a request for access to documents must be specific in nature. On the one hand, the mere fact that a document concerns an interest protected by an exception cannot justify application of that exception (see, to that effect, Denkavit Nederland BV v European Commission Case T-20/99 [2000] ECR II-3011 (para 45)). Such application may, in principle, be justified only if the institution has previously assessed, firstly, whether access to the document would specifically and actually undermine the protected interest and, secondly, in the circumstances referred to in art 4(2) and (3) of Regulation 1049/2001, there is no overriding public interest in disclosure. On the other hand, the risk of a protected interest being undermined must be reasonably foreseeable and not purely hypothetical (see, to that effect, Kuijter v EU Council Case T-211/00 [2003] All ER (EC) 276, [2002] ECR II-485 (para 56), 'Kuijter II'). Consequently, the examination which the institution must undertake in order to apply an exception must be carried out in a concrete manner and must be apparent from the reasons for the decision (see, to that effect, Kuijter v EU Council Case T-188/98 [2000] ECR II-1959 (para 38), 'Kuijter I' and Hautala v EU Council Case T-14/98 [1999] ECR II-2489 (para 67)).

70. That concrete examination must, moreover, be carried out in respect of each document referred to in the request for access. It is apparent from Regulation 1049/2001 that all the exceptions mentioned in art 4(1) to (3) are specified as being applicable to 'a document'.

a 71. The need for such a concrete, individual examination, as opposed to an abstract, general examination, is also confirmed by the case law concerning the application of the code of conduct.

b 72. On the one hand, the code of conduct, the principles of which were in part reproduced in art 4 of Regulation 1049/2001, contained a first category of exceptions requiring the institution to refuse access to a document where disclosure 'could undermine' the interests protected by those exceptions. The court has consistently held that the use of the conditional form 'could' means that before deciding on a request for access to documents the Commission must consider, 'for each document requested', whether, in the light of the information in its possession, disclosure is in fact likely to undermine one of the interests protected by the exceptions (see Interporc Im-und Export GmbH v European Commission Case T-124/96 [1998] ECR II-231 (para 52) and JT's Corp Ltd v European Commission Case T-123/99 [2000] ECR II-3269 (para 64)). In view of the fact that the conditional form is maintained in art 4(1) to (3) of Regulation 1049/2001, the case law developed in connection with the code of conduct is capable of being applied to Regulation 1049/2001. It must therefore be held that an institution is obliged to assess in a concrete and individual manner whether exceptions to the right of access apply to each of the documents referred to in a request.

e 73. On the other hand, as the Commission rightly points out, the court has in fact held, in essence, in its judgment in the WWF UK case, cited in para 59, above (para 64), that an institution is required to indicate, at the very least by reference to categories of documents, the reasons for which it considers that the documents detailed in the request received by it are related to a category of information covered by an exception. Nevertheless, regardless of whether the paragraph relied on by the Commission lays down only a rule that reasons must be stated, a concrete, individual examination is in any event necessary where, even if it is clear that a request for access refers to documents covered by an exception, only such an examination can enable the institution to assess the possibility of granting the applicant partial access under art 4(6) of Regulation 1049/2001. In the context of applying the code of conduct, the court has moreover already rejected as insufficient an assessment of documents by reference to categories rather than on the basis of the actual information contained in those documents, since the examination required of an institution must enable it to assess specifically whether an exception invoked actually applies to all the information contained in those documents (see the JT's Corp case, cited in para 72, above (para 46)).

g 74. It must therefore be concluded that where an institution receives a request for access under Regulation 1049/2001 it is required, in principle, to carry out a concrete, individual assessment of the content of the documents referred to in the request.

i 75. However, that approach, to be adopted in principle, does not mean that such an examination is required in all circumstances. Since the purpose of the concrete, individual examination which the institution must in principle undertake in response to a request for access made under Regulation 1049/2001 is to enable the institution in question to assess, on the one hand, the extent to which an exception to the right of access is applicable and, on the other, the possibility of partial access, such an examination may not be necessary where, due to the particular circumstances of the individual case, it is obvious that access must be refused or, on the contrary, granted. Such could be the case, inter alia, if certain documents were either, first, manifestly covered in their entirety by an exception to the right of access or, conversely, manifestly accessible in their entirety, or, finally, had already been the subject of a concrete, individual assessment by the Commission in similar circumstances. a

76. In this case, it is common ground that the Commission based the contested decision on a general analysis by reference to categories of documents of the Lombard Club file. It is also established that the Commission did not carry out a concrete, individual examination of the documents referred to in the request for access in order to assess whether the exceptions relied on applied or whether partial access could be granted. b

77. It must therefore be examined whether the applicant's request related to documents in respect of which, by reason of the circumstances of the case, it was not necessary to carry out such a concrete, individual examination. c

78. In that regard, the Commission took the view, in the contested decision, that the documents referred to in the applicant's request were covered by four separate exceptions to the right of access.

79. The first of the exceptions relied on by the Commission concerns the protection of the purpose of inspections, referred to in the third indent of art 4(2) of Regulation 1049/2001. In the contested decision, the Commission justified the application of that exception on the basis, in essence, of two factors. d

80. Firstly, according to the Commission, the Lombard Club decision is the subject matter of a number of actions for annulment before the Court of First Instance which are still pending and on which the latter has therefore not yet ruled. Consequently, access by third parties to those documents could affect the new assessment it might be called upon to make if its decision were annulled and might lead the applicants to raise certain pleas in those actions. e

81. Secondly, according to the Commission, a large number of the documents in the file were provided by the undertakings penalised in the Lombard Club decision, either on the basis of the Commission Notice on the non-imposition or reduction of fines in cartel cases (OJ 1996 C207 p 4), which was applicable at the material time, or in connection with requests for information or investigations under arts 11 and 14 of Regulation 17/62. Consequently, allowing third parties access to those documents would deter undertakings from co-operating with the Commission and would be detrimental to inspections and investigations in future cases. The same reasoning applies to documents drawn up by third parties. f
g

82. The court is of the view, however, that the Commission was not entitled to reach such a general conclusion applicable to the whole of the Lombard Club file without having first carried out a concrete, individual examination of the documents comprising it.

83. Firstly, it is not clear from the contested decision that the Commission specifically ascertained that each document referred to in the request was in fact included in one of the 11 categories identified. On the contrary, the reasons for the contested decision, which were confirmed by the Commission at the hearing, indicate that the manner in which the Commission carried out that division was, at least in part, abstract. The Commission seems to have acted more on the basis of what it imagined the content of the documents in the Lombard Club file to be than on the basis of an actual examination. That division into categories therefore remains approximate, both from the point of view of its exhaustiveness and from the point of view of its accuracy. h
i

84. Secondly, the considerations set out by the Commission in the contested decision, as moreover in its defence, remain vague and general. In the absence a of an individual examination, that is to say, document by document, they do not demonstrate with sufficient certainty and detail that the Commission's argument, even if well founded in principle, applies to all the documents in the Lombard Club file. The fears expressed by the Commission remain mere assertions and are, consequently, utterly hypothetical.

b 85. There is nothing to show that all the documents referred to in the request are clearly covered by the exception relied on. In point 1 of the contested decision, the Commission itself notes that 'the exception provided for in the third indent of Article 4(2) applies in large part to certain documents, or even in full to all the categories'.

c 86. It is true that, in the table which it attached to its defence, the Commission stated that, in its view, the exception relied on applied to all the documents referred to in the file. However, as is clear from the considerations set out in the preceding paragraph, that table contradicts the reasons for the contested decision.

d 87. Finally, and in any event, it is not apparent from the reasons given for the contested decision that each of the documents comprising the Lombard Club file, taken individually, is covered in its entirety by the exception referred to in the third indent of art 4(2) of Regulation 1049/2001. It is not clear that disclosure of any information contained in them would undermine the purposes of the Commission's inspections and investigations.

e 88. The absence of any concrete, individual examination of the documents referred to by the applicant's request is therefore not justified in the case of the documents allegedly covered by the first exception relied on by the Commission.

f 89. The same finding must apply with regard to the documents covered, according to the contested decision, by the second, third and fourth exceptions. Those exceptions relate to the protection of commercial interests (see the first indent of art 4(2) of Regulation 1049/2001), the protection of court proceedings (see the second indent of art 4(2)) and the protection of privacy and the integrity of the individual (see art 4(1)(b)). It is clear from points 2, 3, 10, 12 and 13 of the contested decision that, in the Commission's view, those exceptions concern only some of the documents referred to in the request. In particular, in point 13 of the contested decision, the Commission states that 'it is possible that a large proportion of the documents drawn up by the banks concerned or by third parties also contain information the disclosure of which could affect privacy and the integrity of the individual'.

g 90. It is therefore apparent from the contested decision that the exceptions relied on by the Commission do not necessarily apply to the whole of the Lombard Club file and that, even in the case of the documents to which they may apply, they may concern only certain passages in those documents.

h 91. Finally, the interveners rely on the exception in art 4(3) of Regulation 1049/2001. They maintain that the Lombard Club decision has been the subject matter of several actions for annulment and that it is therefore not yet a decision 'taken' within the meaning of art 4(3), which justifies a total refusal of access. However, since that exception was not relied on by the Commission in the contested decision, it is not for the court to assume the role of that institution and determine whether that exception is actually applicable to the documents referred to by the request.

i

92. Consequently, the Commission was bound, in principle, to carry out a concrete, individual examination of each of the documents referred to in the request in order to determine whether any exceptions applied or whether partial access was possible. a

93. Nevertheless, since, in this case, the Commission did not carry out such an examination, it must be determined whether it is permissible for an institution to justify a total refusal of access by reason of the very large amount of work which, according to that institution, is entailed by such an examination. b

—Application of an exception related to the amount of work involved in carrying out a concrete, individual examination

94. Under art 6(3) of Regulation 1049/2001, '[i]n the event of an application relating to a very long document or to a very large number of documents, the institution concerned may confer with the applicant informally, with a view to finding a fair solution'. c

95. In this case, it is apparent from the file that the applicant and the Commission met on 24 July 2002, but that that meeting and the contacts which followed it did not lead to a solution. d

96. Regulation 1049/2001 does not contain any provision expressly permitting the institution, in the absence of a fair solution reached together with the applicant, to limit the scope of the examination which it is normally required to carry out in response to a request for access.

97. In the introductory part of the contested decision, the Commission nevertheless, in essence, justifies the failure to carry out a concrete, individual examination of the documents in question by application of the principle of proportionality. The Commission states inter alia that 'for reasons of proportionality, it does not appear either necessary or expedient to undertake an examination of the documents beyond the [above-mentioned] categories'. The Commission also relies on application of the principle of proportionality in points 10, 13 and 24 of the contested decision. e
f

98. It must therefore be examined whether it is in fact permissible, on the basis of the principle of proportionality, to refrain from applying the principle of a concrete, individual examination of the documents referred to in a request for access under Regulation 1049/2001.

99. According to consistent case law, the principle of proportionality requires measures adopted by Community institutions not to exceed the limits of what is appropriate and necessary in order to attain the objectives pursued; when there is a choice between several appropriate measures recourse must be had to the least onerous, and the disadvantages caused must not be disproportionate to the aims pursued (see R v Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, ex p National Farmers' Union Case C-157/96 [1998] ECR I-2211 (para 60) and Tideland Signal Ltd v European Commission Case T-211/02 [2002] ECR II-3781 (para 39)). The principle of proportionality also requires that derogations remain within the limits of what is appropriate and necessary for achieving the aim in view (see Johnston v Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary Case 222/84 [1986] 3 All ER 135, [1986] ECR 1651 (para 38) and Hautala's case, cited in para 69, above (para 85)). g
h
i

100. Consequently, the refusal by an institution to examine concretely and individually the documents covered by a request for access constitutes, in principle, a manifest breach of the principle of proportionality. A concrete, individual examination of the documents in question enables the institution to a achieve the aim pursued by the exceptions referred to in art 4(1) to (3) of Regulation 1049/2001 and results, moreover, in identification of the only documents covered, in whole or in part, by those exceptions. It therefore constitutes, for the purposes of the applicant's right of access, a measure less onerous than a complete refusal to examine the documents.

b 101. It should however be borne in mind that it is possible for an applicant to make a request for access, under Regulation 1049/2001, relating to a manifestly unreasonable number of documents, perhaps for trivial reasons, thus imposing a volume of work for processing of his request which could very substantially paralyse the proper working of the institution. It should also be noted that, where a request relates to a very large number of documents, the institution's right to seek a 'fair solution' together with the applicant, pursuant to art 6(3) of Regulation 1049/2001, reflects the possibility of account being taken, albeit in a particularly limited way, of the need, where appropriate, to reconcile the interests of the applicant with those of good administration.

c 102. An institution must therefore retain the right, in particular cases where concrete, individual examination of the documents would entail an unreasonable amount of administrative work, to balance the interest in public access to the documents against the burden of work so caused, in order to safeguard, in those particular cases, the interests of good administration (see, by analogy, Hautala's case, cited in para 69, above (para 86)).

d 103. However, that possibility remains applicable only in exceptional cases.

e 104. Firstly, concrete, individual examination of the documents referred to in a request for access under Regulation 1049/2001 is one of the elementary duties of an institution in response to such a request.

f 105. Secondly, public access to documents of the institutions is an approach to be adopted in principle, whereas the power to refuse access is the exception (see, by analogy with the principle laid down for application of the code of conduct, Kuijjer II (para 55)).

g 106. Thirdly, exceptions to the principle of access to documents must be interpreted strictly (see, by analogy with the code of conduct, British American Tobacco International (Investments) v European Commission Case T-111/00 [2001] ECR II-2997 (para 40)). That case law justifies a fortiori the need to construe particularly strictly any limitations placed on the diligence which must normally be displayed by an institution in deciding to apply an exception, since such limitations increase, from the time the request is received, the risk that the right of access may be compromised.

h 107. Fourthly, there are many circumstances in which for the Commission to have discretion not to carry out a concrete, individual examination when such an examination is necessary would run counter to the principle of good administration, which is one of the guarantees afforded by the Community legal order in administrative procedures and to which the duty of the competent institution to examine carefully and impartially all the relevant aspects in the individual case is linked (see La Cinq SA v EC Commission Case T-44/90 [1992] ECR II-1 (para 86) and Métropole Télévision SA v European Commission Joined cases T-528/93, T-542/93, T-543/93 and T-546/93 [1996] ECR II-649 (para 93)).

i 108. Fifthly, it is not, in principle, appropriate that account should be taken of the amount of work entailed by the exercise of the applicant's right of access and its interest in order to vary the scope of that right.

109. With regard to the applicant's interest, under art 6(1) of Regulation 1049/2001 he is not required to justify his request and therefore he does not normally have to demonstrate any interest. a

110. As regards the amount of work entailed in processing a request for access, Regulation 1049/2001 expressly envisages the possibility that a request for access may relate to a very large number of documents, since arts 7(3) and 8(2) provide that the time limits for processing initial requests and confirmatory requests may be extended in exceptional cases such as, for example, in the event of an application relating to a very long document or to a very large number of documents. b

111. Sixthly, the amount of work entailed in considering a request for access depends not only on the number of documents referred to in the request and their volume, but also on their nature. Consequently, the need to undertake a concrete, individual examination of very numerous documents does not, on its own, provide any indication of the amount of work entailed in processing a request for access, since that amount of work also depends on the required depth of that examination. c

112. Accordingly, it is only in exceptional cases and only where the administrative burden entailed by a concrete, individual examination of the documents proves to be particularly heavy, thereby exceeding the limits of what may reasonably be required, that a derogation from that obligation to examine the documents may be permissible (see, by analogy, Kuiper II (para 57)). d

113. In addition, in so far as the right of access to documents held by the institutions constitutes an approach to be adopted in principle, it is with the institution relying on an exception related to the unreasonableness of the task entailed by the request that the burden of proof of the scale of that task rests. e

114. Finally, where the institution has adduced proof of the unreasonableness of the administrative burden entailed by a concrete, individual examination of the documents referred to in the request, it is obliged to try to consult with the applicant in order, on the one hand, to ascertain or to ask him to specify his interest in obtaining the documents in question and, on the other, to consider specifically whether and how it may adopt a measure less onerous than a concrete, individual examination of the documents. Since the right of access to documents is the principle, the institution nevertheless remains obliged, against that background, to prefer the option which, whilst not itself constituting a task which exceeds the limits of what may reasonably be required, remains the most favourable to the applicant's right of access. f

115. It follows that the institution may avoid carrying out a concrete, individual examination only after it has genuinely investigated all other conceivable options and explained in detail in its decision the reasons for which those various options also involve an unreasonable amount of work. g

116. It must therefore be examined, in this case, whether the Commission was in a situation where concrete, individual examination of the documents referred to in the request for access imposed on it a burden exceeding the limits of what might reasonably be required, so that, taking into account the applicant's interest, it could specifically consider other options for processing the request, with a view, where appropriate, to adopting a measure less onerous in terms of its workload. h

117. With regard, first, to whether a concrete, individual examination of each of the documents referred to in the request was unreasonable, it should be i

a noted that the contested decision does not mention the precise number of documents in the Lombard Club file, but merely the number of pages which it contains. A mere reference to a number of pages is not sufficient, as such, for the purpose of assessing the amount of work entailed by a concrete, individual examination. Nevertheless, in the light, on the one hand, of the categories identified by the Commission in the contested decision and, on the other, of the nature of the file in question, it is clearly apparent from the papers in the case that the documents referred to are very numerous.

118. In addition, consultation of a file of more than 47,000 pages comprising many documents such as those belonging to the categories identified by the Commission is likely to be an extremely large task.

c 119. Firstly, it is clear that the documents in the Lombard Club file are filed in chronological order. In that regard, at the hearing, the Commission stated that, in view of the date of the contested decision, the documents referred to in the applicant's request had not yet been recorded in the register provided for by art 11 of Regulation 1049/2001, the coverage of which, according to art 8(1) of the Commission Decision of 5 December 2001 amending its rules of procedure, is to be extended gradually.

d 120. Secondly, in the light of the main categories identified by the Commission and of the reasons for the contested decision, it can be accepted that the documents referred to by the applicant's request contain a great deal of information which must be subjected to a concrete analysis in the light of the exceptions to the right of access and, in particular, information which could undermine the protection of the commercial interests of the banks involved in the Lombard Club file.

e 121. Thirdly, in the light of the main categories identified by the Commission, it can also be accepted that the Lombard Club file consists of a large number of documents originating from third parties. Consequently, the volume of work involved in examining concretely and individually the documents contained in that file could be increased by the need, where appropriate, to consult those third parties in accordance with art 4(4) of Regulation 1049/2001.

f 122. In this case, therefore, there are a number of factors which suggest that concrete, individual examination of all the documents in the Lombard Club file might represent a very large amount of work. Nevertheless, without there being any need to take a definitive view as to whether those factors demonstrate sufficiently in law that the amount of work involved exceeded the limits of what might reasonably be required of the Commission, it must be pointed out that the contested decision, which refuses altogether to grant the applicant any access, could in any event be lawful only if the Commission had previously explained specifically the reasons for which the alternatives to a concrete, individual examination of each of the documents referred to also represented an unreasonable amount of work.

g 123. In this case, the applicant informed the Commission, on 14 June 2002, that the purpose of its request was to enable it to produce certain evidence in proceedings brought against BAWAG before the Austrian courts.

h 124. It is also clear that, on 24 July 2002, at a meeting with the Commission's staff, the representatives of the VKI mentioned the possibility that the applicant could give an undertaking in writing to use the information obtained solely for the purpose of asserting consumers' claims.

i 125. In addition, in its confirmatory request of 26 September 2002, the applicant stated that it was not interested primarily in the Commission's internal documents, which prompted the latter to exclude those documents from the scope of its analysis in the contested decision. a

126. Notwithstanding those considerations, it is not apparent from the reasons for the contested decision that the Commission considered specifically and exhaustively the various options available to it in order to take steps which would not impose an unreasonable amount of work on it but would, on the other hand, increase the chances that the applicant might receive, at least in respect of part of its request, access to the documents concerned. b

127. Thus, in the contested decision, the Commission stated 'as a subsidiary consideration' that publication of the Lombard Club decision was sufficient to 'safeguard' the interests of the applicant.

128. In addition, in point 24 of the contested decision, the Commission refused, in the following terms, to grant partial access to the documents included in the Lombard Club file: c

'We have undertaken in this case, for the purpose of deciding on your request, a categorisation of all the documents in the file and, in the case of some, a sub-categorisation. The alternative would be to examine each document, after consulting third parties where appropriate. In this specific instance, the file consists of more than 47 000 pages, not counting the internal documents. On the basis that an examination by reference to categories indicates that the documents in the file are—with the exception of a few documents already published—very largely subject to the exceptions provided for by the regulation, a separate examination of each document would impose on the Commission an inappropriate and disproportionate amount of work. That is particularly so because the other parts of the documents, or some of them, which could possibly be disclosed, would very probably serve neither the interests [of the] VKI in proving the unlawfulness of the conduct of the banks concerned in civil proceedings, nor other public interests.'

d
e
f

129. It is therefore clear that the Commission took into account the applicant's interest as a very subsidiary consideration in comparing the likely effects of two types of practice, namely, in the first place, an individual examination of the documents included in the Lombard Club file and, in the second place, an examination limited to the categories established among those same documents on the basis of their nature. g

130. However, it is not apparent from the reasons for the contested decision that the Commission assessed, in a concrete, specific and detailed manner, on the one hand, the other conceivable options for limiting its workload and, on the other, the reasons which could allow it to avoid carrying out any examination rather than adopting, where appropriate, a measure less restrictive of the applicant's right of access. In particular, it is not apparent from the contested decision that, as regards the identification of documents contained in a file arranged in chronological order, the Commission specifically examined the option of asking the banks involved in the Lombard Club file to provide it with the dates of the documents submitted by them, which might possibly have enabled it to find some of them more easily in its file. In addition, although the Commission stated in its defence that drawing up a table of contents would have been a disproportionate task, the examination of that option is not mentioned at all in the contested decision and therefore cannot be considered to have been specifically examined. Finally, it is likewise not apparent from the contested decision that the Commission evaluated the h
i

a amount of work involved in identifying, then examining, individually and concretely, the few documents most likely to satisfy immediately and, where appropriate, partially in the first instance the applicant's interests.

131. The outright refusal by the Commission to grant the applicant access is therefore vitiated by an error of law. The first and fourth pleas must therefore be upheld. Consequently, without there being any need to rule on the other pleas put forward by the applicant, the contested decision must be annulled.

b THE REQUEST FOR PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS

132. It is for the Community judicature to decide, in the light of the circumstances of the case and in accordance with the provisions of the Rules of Procedure on measures of inquiry, whether it is necessary for a document to be produced (see Siderurgica Aristrain Madrid SL v European Commission Case C-196/99 P [2003] ECR I-11049 (para 67)).

c 133. Since the first and fourth pleas of the applicant must be upheld without there being any need to examine the documents in question, there is certainly no need in this case to order the production requested.

d COSTS

134. Under art 87(2) of the Rules of Procedure, the unsuccessful party is to be ordered to pay the costs if they have been applied for in the successful party's pleadings. Since the Commission has been unsuccessful, it must be ordered to pay the costs borne by the VKI, in accordance with the form of order sought by the latter.

e 135. Under the third subparagraph of art 87(4) of the Rules of Procedure, the court may order an intervener to bear its own costs. In this case, the interveners are to bear their own costs.

f On those grounds, the Court of First Instance (First Chamber, Extended Composition) hereby:

(1) Annuls Decision D (2002) 330472 (relating to a request for access to the administrative file in Case COMP/36.571/D-1, Austrian banks—'Lombard Club');

(2) Orders the Commission to pay the costs;

(3) Orders the interveners to bear their own costs.

g

easyCar (UK) Limited v Office of Fair Trading <sup>a</sup>

(Case C-336/03)

COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (FIRST CHAMBER) <sup>b</sup>

JUDGES JANN (PRESIDENT OF THE CHAMBER), LENAERTS, CUNHA RODRIGUES, SCHIEMANN AND ILEŠIĆ (RAPPORTEUR)

ADVOCATE GENERAL STIX-HACKL

29 SEPTEMBER, 11 NOVEMBER 2004, 10 MARCH 2005 <sup>c</sup>

European Community – Consumer protection – Contracts negotiated away from business premises – Right of withdrawal and reimbursement for consumers – Exemptions – Contracts for provision of transport services – Car hire contracts – Whether car hire services amounting to transport services – European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 97/7, arts 3(2), 6(1), (2). <sup>d</sup>

A self-drive car hire undertaking offered cars for hire via the Internet, under terms and conditions which did not permit the customer to obtain a refund of sums paid on cancellation of the contract. In the main proceedings, whereas the undertaking sought a declaration from the national court that the rights of consumers in distance contracts to withdraw and to receive a refund of sums paid, as provided for under arts 6(1) and (2) of European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 97/7 (on the protection of consumers in respect of distance contracts)—which were transposed into English law by regs 10 and 14 of the Consumer Protection (Distance Selling) Regulations 2000, SI 2000/2334—did not apply to its rental agreements, the Office of Fair Trading sought an injunction to restrain the undertaking from infringing the national regulations. The issues between the parties concerned whether contracts for car hire services were ‘contracts for the provision of... transport... services’ within the meaning of the exemption to art 6 of the directive, as provided for by art 3(2). Accordingly, the national court decided to stay the proceedings and refer under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) a question in that regard to the Court of Justice of the European Communities. <sup>e</sup>

Held – Properly interpreted, ‘contracts for the provision of... transport... services’ in art 3(2) of the directive included contracts for the provision of car hire services. As a derogation from the Community rules for the protection of consumers, the scope of the concept of ‘transport services’ was to be interpreted strictly. Further, since it was not defined by the directive, it was to be interpreted by consideration of its usual meaning in everyday language, taking into account the context in which it had occurred and the purpose of the rules of which they were part. The legislature had used the term in a broad sense, intending to define the exemption, not according to the type of contract, but in such a way that all contracts for the provision of services in relevant sectors came within the scope of the exemption. Further, in everyday language, ‘transport’ referred not only to the action of moving persons or goods from one place to another, but also to the mode of transport and to the means used to move those persons and goods. Furthermore, the objectives pursued by the <sup>f</sup> <sup>g</sup> <sup>h</sup> <sup>i</sup>

- a* directive included protection for the interests of suppliers of certain services from the disproportionate consequences arising from the cancellation at no expense and with no explanation of services which had given rise to the booking. Car hire undertakings, which had to make arrangements for the performance, on the date fixed at the time of booking, of the agreed service, would suffer the same consequences in the event of cancellation as other undertakings operating in the transport sector (see judgment paras 21, 24, 26, 27, 28–31, below).

Notes

For contracts negotiated at a distance, see Supp to 41 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 655A.

Cases cited

- Aéroports de Paris v European Commission* Case C-82/01 P [2002] ECR I-9297, ECJ.
ARO Lease BV v Inspecteur van de Belastingdienst Grote Ondernemingen te Amsterdam Case C-190/95 [1997] STC 1272, [1997] ECR I-4383, ECJ.
- d* Deutsche Post AG v Sievers Joined cases C-270/97 and C-271/97 [2000] ECR I-929, ECJ.
DIR International Film Srl v European Commission Case C-164/98 P [2000] ECR I-447, ECJ.
European Commission v Spain Case C-83/99 [2001] ECR I-445, ECJ.
Gregg v Customs and Excise Comrs Case C-216/97 [1999] All ER (EC) 775, [1999] ECR I-4947, ECJ.
- e* Hamann v Finanzamt Hamburg-Eimsbüttel Case 51/88 [1991] STC 193, [1989] ECR 767, ECJ.
Hässle AB v Ratiopharm GmbH Case C-127/00 [2003] ECR I-14781, ECJ.
Heininger v Bayerische Hypo- und Vereinsbank AG Case C-481/99 [2004] All ER (EC) 1, [2001] ECR I-9945, ECJ.
- f* Hönig v Stadt Stockach Case C-128/94 [1995] ECR I-3389, ECJ.
Lease Plan Luxembourg SA v Belgium Case C-390/96 [1998] STC 628, [1998] ECR I-2553, ECJ.
Philips Electronics NV v Remington Consumer Products Ltd Case C-299/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 634, [2003] Ch 159, [2003] 2 WLR 294, [2002] ECR I-5475, ECJ.
- g* Plato Plastik Robert Frank GmbH v Caropack Handelsgesellschaft mbH Case C-341/01 (2003) Transcript (opinion), 11 September, (2004) Transcript (judgment), 29 April, ECJ.
R v Bouchereau Case 30/77 [1981] 2 All ER 924n, [1978] QB 732, [1978] 2 WLR 251, [1977] ECR 1999, ECJ.
- h* Rockfon A/S v Specialarbejderforbundet i Danmark Case C-449/93 [1996] IRLR 168, [1996] ICR 673, [1995] ECR I-4291, ECJ.
Royscot Leasing Ltd v Customs and Excise Comrs Case C-305/97 [1999] All ER (EC) 908, [1999] ECR I-6671, ECJ.
Veedfald v Århus Amtskommune Case C-203/99 [2001] ECR I-3569, ECJ.

i Reference

This reference for a preliminary ruling concerned the interpretation of art 3(2) of European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 97/7 (on the protection of consumers in respect of distance contracts). The reference was made in the context of a dispute between the company easyCar (UK) Ltd (hereinafter easyCar) and the Office of Fair Trading (hereinafter the OFT) concerning the terms and conditions of the car hire contracts offered and concluded by easyCar. Observations were submitted on behalf of: easyCar by D Anderson QC, K Bacon, Barrister, and D Burnside, Solicitor; the United Kingdom government, by C Jackson, acting as agent, and M Hoskins, Barrister; the Spanish government, by S Ortiz Vaamonde, acting as agent; the French government, by R Loosli-Surrans, acting as agent; the Commission of the European Communities, by N Yerrell and M-J Jonczy, acting as agents. The language of the case was English. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General. a

b

11 November 2004. The Advocate General (C Stix-Hackl) delivered the following opinion<sup>1</sup>. c

I—INTRODUCTION

1. This case concerns the interpretation of art 3(2) of European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 97/7 (on the protection of consumers in respect of distance contracts)<sup>2</sup>. The Court of Justice of the European Communities is being asked to clarify how far car hire contracts can be regarded as 'contracts for the provision of ... transport ... services' within the meaning of that provision. d

2. Article 3(2) of the directive makes a derogation from the scope of the distance contracts directive in relation to arts 4, 5, 6 and 7(1) of the directive, and thereby also creates a derogation from the right to cancel which consumers are to enjoy under art 6. e

3. The case arises from a complaint by the Office of Fair Trading (OFT) and easyCar (UK) Ltd (easyCar), in which, on the one hand, the OFT claims that easyCar should cease refusing customers the right of withdrawal and refund, while easyCar is seeking a declaration from the national court that it is free from that obligation. f

II—LEGAL BACKGROUND

A—Community law

4. According to art 1 thereof, the object of the distance contracts directive is 'to approximate the laws, regulations and administrative provisions of the Member States concerning distance contracts between consumers and suppliers'. g

5. 'Distance contract' is defined by art 2(1) as—

'any contract concerning goods or services concluded between a supplier and a consumer under an organized distance sales or service-provision scheme run by the supplier, who, for the purpose of the contract, makes exclusive use of one or more means of distance communication up to and including the moment at which the contract is concluded.' h

6. One of the key provisions of the distance contracts directive is art 6(1), which provides that '[f]or any distance contract the consumer shall have a period of at least seven working days in which to withdraw from the contract without penalty and without giving any reason'. Article 6(2) defines the legal i a consequences of exercising the right to withdraw, while art 6(3) enumerates cases in which, unless the parties have agreed otherwise, the right to withdraw may not be exercised.

<sup>1</sup> Original language: German.

<sup>2</sup> OJ 1997 L144 p 19 (hereinafter the distance contracts directive).

b 7. However, art 3(2) of the distance contracts directive provides, inter alia, that art 6 is not to apply to 'contracts for the provision of accommodation, transport, catering or leisure services, where the supplier undertakes, when the contract is concluded, to provide these services on a specific date or within a specific period'.

B—National law

c 8. The distance contracts directive was implemented into United Kingdom law by the Consumer Protection (Distance Selling) Regulations 2000, SI 2000/2334 (the regulations). The derogating provision in art 3(2) is implemented by reg 6(2), which provides:

'Regulations 7 to 19(1) shall not apply to ...

d (b) contracts for the provision of accommodation, transport, catering or leisure services, where the supplier undertakes, when the contract is concluded, to provide these services on a specific date or within a specific period.'

9. The basic 'right to cancel' is set out in reg 10(1):

e 'Subject to regulation 13, if within the cancellation period set out in regulations 11 and 12, the consumer gives a notice of cancellation to the supplier ... the notice of cancellation shall operate to cancel the contract.'

10. Regulation 12 transposes the time limits set out in art 6(1) of the directive, regarding contracts for the supply of services, and reg 13(1)(a) (on which easyCar relies in the alternative) transposes art 6(3).

f 11. Regulation 14 transposes the provisions of art 6(2), and provides inter alia that on the cancellation of a contract under reg 10, the supplier shall reimburse any sum paid by or on behalf of the consumer in relation to the contract, free of charge less certain permitted charges made for the cost of returning goods.

g III—FACTS AND PROCEDURE

h 12. easyCar is a car hire company, which makes contracts with customers only over the Internet. The rental cost of the cars is determined by supply and demand, so that, in principle, prices rise as fewer cars remain available. In that way, prices are lower the earlier one books and rise as the start of the rental period draws closer, according to the remaining availability. Customers are thereby enabled to get a vehicle, even shortly before the rental date, but at increased prices.

13. According to easyCar's terms of business, the customer has a right to cancel after a hire contract has been concluded, but without any right to refund save in the event of unforeseeable or otherwise exceptional circumstances, such as serious illness or natural disaster.

i 14. After several consumer complaints were raised against easyCar over the question whether the hire contracts complied with British law, and with the regulations in particular, easyCar applied to the referring court on 21 November 2002 for a declaration that its rental agreements 'are exempted from the cancellation requirements of Regulations 10 and 12 pursuant to Regulation 6(2)(b) and/or Regulation 13(1)(a)'.

15. easyCar argued that its car hire contracts fell within the exception in reg 6(2)(b) for 'contracts for the provision of ... transport services', which in turn corresponds to art 3(2) of the distance contracts directive. a

16. On 7 February 2003 the OFT, in turn, issued a claim seeking an injunction, arguing that easyCar was not complying with its obligations under regs 10 and 14, which represent the implementation of art 6(1) and (2) of the distance contracts directive. b

17. Though the parties differ as to what is denoted by 'transport' within the meaning of the regulations, they agree that the car hire contracts at issue constitute 'distance contracts' and the 'provision of services' within the meaning of the regulations and thus of the distance contracts directive.

18. Since the regulations, breach of which the OFT alleges before the national court, are to be interpreted as the transposition of the distance contracts directive, the High Court of Justice (England and Wales), Chancery Division, referred the following question to the Court of Justice by order of 21 July 2003: c

'Does the term "contracts for the provision of ... transport ... services", in Article 3(2) of [the distance contracts directive] include contracts for the provision of car hire services?' d

IV—THE QUESTION REFERRED

A—Arguments of the parties

19. easyCar argues that car hire contracts are 'contracts for the provision of ... transport ... services', submitting that 'transport' includes not only the actual carrying out of transport by one's own staff but also simply the placing of means of transport at the customer's disposal. The legislature deliberately drew no distinction. The provision in art 3(2) therefore refers to all contracts concluded in the area of 'transport', an interpretation supported by the German wording 'in den Bereichen ... Beförderung' and the Italian wording 'relativi ... ai trasporti', which both exclude a narrow interpretation. e

20. Further, it maintains, it is clear from the other services referred to in art 3(2) that the cases to be removed from the scope of the distance contracts directive are precisely those in which cancellation is out of the question because the service provider would be exposed to severe consequences. That is particularly so where reservation is necessary on account of limited capacities. A car hire firm is also exposed to that risk. There is no distinction in that respect from contracts in the areas of accommodation, catering or leisure services. f

21. The travaux préparatoires to the directive, it argues, also support that interpretation, in that, for example, art 3 of the Commission of the European Communities' proposal for a directive of 21 May 1992<sup>3</sup> expressly includes services which require reservation. g

22. easyCar also relies on the interpretation of the word 'transport'. It argues that, as the court has stated in relation to the Sixth Council Directive (EEC) 77/388 (on the harmonisation of the laws of the member states relating to turnover taxes—common system of value added tax: uniform basis of assessment)<sup>4</sup>, that expression covers everything that is used to go from one place to another, so that means of transport are also included. Council h a Directive (EEC) 83/182 (on tax exemptions within the Community for certain means of transport temporarily imported into one member state from another)<sup>5</sup> also supports the view that the provision of vehicles constitutes a supply of transport services.

<sup>3</sup> OJ 1992 C156 pp 14, 16.

<sup>4</sup> OJ 1977 L145 p 1 (hereinafter the Sixth VAT Directive).

b 23. Not to include car hire would, moreover, not be in accordance with the Community law principle of equal treatment, as car hire would be disadvantaged vis-à-vis traditional transport services such as bus services, with which it is in competition, if the exception were not to apply to it.

c 24. The United Kingdom government, by contrast, argues that car hire contracts are not covered by the exception in art 3(2), firstly because the exception should be narrowly construed and secondly because 'transport' means the provision of transport services and is not limited to the provision of means of transport.

d 25. A difference in treatment from that accorded to passenger transport undertakings is, the government submits, justified. Unlike such undertakings, which require a special licence to transport persons, car hire is subject to no such requirement. In addition, passenger transport services depend on fixed route networks. Moreover, the position of a passenger as regards the possession of a driving licence and the conclusion of an insurance contract is not comparable with that of the driver of a hired car.

e 26. The United Kingdom government further doubts whether car hire services are in a competitive relationship with passenger transport services at all.

f 27. In any event, the government argues that the customer in a distance contract for the provision of car hire services is just as deserving of protection as in other cases covered by the directive.

g 28. The Spanish government argues that the content of a car hire contract is not transport per se. Although the expressions 'suministro/fourniture/provision' in the Spanish, French and English language versions<sup>6</sup> of art 3(2) of the directive might give the misleading impression that they cover the supply of moveable goods, the directive makes a derogation only for the carrying out of transport itself, not the supply of means. That, it argues, is apparent primarily from a comparison of the two indents in art 3(2) and the use which is there made of the term 'supply'.

h 29. The Commission agrees that art 3(2) does not cover car hire contracts. That, it argues, is obvious from the natural interpretation of the word 'transport'. 'Transport', it submits, means the movement of persons or things from one place to another. It thus includes an active element, which is absent in the case of the mere provision of hire cars.

i 30. The Commission further argues that, whilst all derogations concern services for which reservations are made, the aim of the legislature was also to remove from its scope services in respect of which cancellation close to the time of performance would lead to severe consequences for the undertaking providing the service. That risk, it submits, is not present in the case of car hire, since there the vehicle returns to the 'pool' of available vehicles, and thus remains at the disposal of the undertaking.

5 OJ 1983 L105 p 59.

6 In those language versions, these expressions are unclear, in that they can mean either the provision of a service or the supply of goods. Since the German version refers to 'Erbringung' (provision), its wording does not support such a view.

B—Legal assessment

31. The question referred concerns the interpretation of the second indent of art 3(2) of the distance contracts directive, and in particular the clarification of the expression 'for the provision of ... transport ... services'.

32. The second indent of art 3(2) excludes contracts for the provision of accommodation, transport, catering or leisure services from the scope of certain provisions of the directive, where the supplier undertakes, when the contract is concluded, to provide these services on a specific date or within a specific period.

33. It thus represents a derogation from the scope of the application of a provision of secondary law, which, according to the consistent case law of the court, is to be interpreted narrowly<sup>7</sup>. That applies in particular in the area of consumer protection<sup>8</sup>, since here in particular it is especially necessary to take account of the protective purpose of the measure in question when interpreting it.

34. With regard to car hire, the uncertainty surrounding the derogation in question arises from the fact that the contracts concerned might be capable of being regarded as contracts for the provision of transport services in that their purpose is the provision of a means of transport. From the wording of that derogation, the question which essentially arises is whether the provision of a means of transport is to be regarded as the provision of transport services. In this context, the purpose of the derogation merits particular attention.

1. The concept of 'transport' in art 3(2) of the distance contracts directive

35. The directive itself does not explain the term 'transport', so that, in principle, the term must be interpreted in its context within the directive in accordance with its ordinary meaning<sup>9</sup>.

36. In the common understanding, the characteristic factor in transport is that persons or goods are carried to a place other than the place of departure. It is not sufficient, however, that the carriage is effected by the recipient of the service himself, as in the case of car hire; rather, it is precisely the carriage to another place that naturally belongs to the characteristic duties of the provider of the service. The French government rightly pointed to that circumstance in its oral submissions.

37. In the context of the distance contracts directive, however, a divergent interpretation might arise simply from the fact that some language versions of the derogating provision refer not to 'transport' as such, but generally to a provision of services 'in the area' of transport. Thus the German and Italian versions concern all services 'in den Bereichen ... Beförderung' or 'relativi ai trasporti', whereas the French, Spanish or English versions refer to a provision 'of transport'<sup>10</sup>. It is, however, not excluded, as the Spanish government points out, that the wording of various language versions also allows a broader interpretation.

38. As the Community judicature has consistently held, the different language versions of a Community text must be given a uniform interpretation

<sup>7</sup> See, inter alia, European Commission v Spain Case C-83/99 [2001] ECR I-445 (para 19), Gregg v Customs and Excise Comrs Case C-216/97 [1999] All ER (EC) 775, [1999] ECR I-4947 (para 12).

<sup>8</sup> See, inter alia, Heininger v Bayerische Hypo- und Vereinsbank AG Case C-481/99 [2004] All ER (EC) 1, [2001] ECR I-9945 (para 31), Veedfald v Århus Amtskommune Case C-203/99 [2001] ECR I-3569 (para 15).

<sup>9</sup> See Commission v Spain (cited in footnote 7, above) (paras 16, 20).

<sup>10</sup> See footnote 6, above.

a and hence in the case of divergence between the versions the provision in question must be interpreted by reference to the purpose and general scheme of the rules of which it forms part<sup>11</sup>.

b 39. The directive is designed on the one hand to ensure comprehensive protection for consumers, to be accorded in principle in all areas where, on account of the use of distance selling methods, there is an increased need for information. Certain areas, on the other hand, which the legislature assumed would be particularly severely affected by the strict requirements of the distance contracts directive, remain exceptions.

c 40. If, for the purposes of interpretation, one considers, for example, the travaux préparatoires to the distance contracts directive and its wording to the effect that the services are to be provided at a certain time or within a certain period, it becomes clear that the essential feature of all the areas excluded by the second indent of art 3(2) is that they concern provisions of services for which reservations are made. The justification lies in the need to protect the provider of services, in particular, from cancellation at short notice of a service that has already been booked<sup>12</sup>.

d 41. That is because the dependence of an undertaking on reservations causes it to enter into various commitments, which would expose it to heavy burdens if the counterpart were lacking. In particular, the provider of services undertakes at the time the contract is made to keep a certain capacity free for a certain period. If the recipient does not use that service, the provider must rely at short notice on finding a new recipient, who wishes to receive the same service for exactly the same period. That can prove problematic from the point of view of complying with particular customer wishes in the absence of corresponding flexibility—unlike in the case of the renewed offering for sale of goods or services in respect of which reservation plays no part.

e 42. With that objective in mind—namely taking account of the needs of the service provider—the issue is not so much whether the carrying out of the activity in question constitutes transport as such as whether that activity falls within the area of transport and is therefore subject to the same risks as envisaged in the second indent of art 3(2).

f 43. Since the decisive factor for the exception is not, therefore, the actual carrying out of transport, one cannot exclude the possibility that the placing of means of transport at the customer's disposal is to be regarded as a service within the area of 'transport' and can therefore fall within the exception in the distance contracts directive.

g 2. The placing of means of transport at the customer's disposal as a service within the area of transport

h 44. easyCar essentially argues that the renting out of vehicles constitutes the placing of means of transport at the customer's disposal, which as a provision of services falls within art 3(2) of the distance contracts directive in just the

i 11 See Plato Plastik Robert Frank GmbH v Caropack Handelsgesellschaft mbH Case C-341/01 (2004) Transcript (judgment), 29 April (para 64), Hässle AB v Ratiopharm GmbH Case C-127/00 [2003] ECR I-14781 (para 70), Rockfon A/S v Specialarbejderforbundet i Danmark Case C-449/93 [1996] IRLR 168, [1995] ECR I-4291 (para 28) and R v Bouchereau Case 30/77 [1981] 2 All ER 924n, [1977] ECR 1999 (para 14).

12 See the Proposal for a Council Directive on the protection of consumers in respect of contracts negotiated at a distance (distance selling), COM/92/11 final (OJ 1992 C156 p 14). See also the Common Position (EC) 19/95 adopted by the Council on 29 June 1995 with a view to adopting Directive 95/ /EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of ... on the protection of consumers in respect of distance contracts (OJ 1995 C288 p 1).

same way as the provision of actual transport. easyCar refers in that respect to various judgments of the court clarifying the concept of means of transport. a

45. Whether and to what extent those judgments are relevant here, however, is questionable.

The relevance of the existing case law

46. In Hamann v Finanzamt Hamburg-Eimsbüttel<sup>13</sup> the court included sailing yachts within the term 'forms of transport' under art 9(2)(d) of the Sixth VAT Directive<sup>14</sup>. b

47. Concerning the place where a taxable provision of services is made, art 9(2) of the Sixth VAT Directive contains, for practical reasons, special determining criteria. The criterion for the hiring out of movable tangible property—the place of use—did not appear practicable in relation to the hiring out of forms of transport, since forms of transport may easily cross frontiers making it difficult, if not impossible, to determine the place where they are used<sup>15</sup>. Accordingly, that determining criterion does not apply to forms of transport. Against that background, the court justified the designation of sailing yachts as 'forms of transport' by reference to the difficulty in determining the place where the yacht was used and need to avoid a situation in which VAT was not payable at all. In making its decision, it relied on factors that can have no relevance for the interpretation of art 3(2) of the distance contracts directive. c
d

48. I come to the same conclusion in relation to the judgments in ARO Lease BV v Inspecteur van de Belastingdienst Grote Ondernemingen te Amsterdam<sup>16</sup> and Lease Plan Luxembourg SA v Belgium<sup>17</sup>, in which the court—again against the background of the Sixth VAT Directive and for the purpose of determining the place of supply of a service—equated the hiring out of motor vehicles to a hiring out of forms of transport. The same applies to the judgment in Commission v Spain<sup>18</sup>, in which the court held, concerning the application of a reduced rate of value added tax, that '[t]he making available of road infrastructure to users on payment of a toll does not consist in the provision of a means of transport but in permitting users who have a vehicle to make a journey in better conditions'. e
f

49. In conclusion, therefore, solutions worked out by the court in interpreting the Sixth VAT Directive can be used in other contexts only to a very limited extent. Moreover, the question here is not whether car hire can be classified as the placing of a form of transport at the customer's disposal, but rather whether it constitutes a service in the area of transport within the meaning of the distance contracts directive. g

50. Nor can Directive 83/182 and the case law based thereon give any information, since, here also, legislative material with an assessment in tax law is concerned with an area other than consumer protection. h

13 Case 51/88 [1991] STC 193, [1989] ECR 767 (para 15 et seq).

14 Concerning the concept of a motor vehicle in the Sixth VAT Directive: see also, for example, Royscot Leasing Ltd v Customs and Excise Comrs Case C-305/97 [1999] All ER (EC) 908, [1999] ECR I-6671 (para 20). i

15 See the judgment cited in footnote 13, above (para 17).

16 Case C-190/95 [1997] STC 1272, [1997] ECR I-4383 (paras 11–14).

17 Case C-390/96 [1998] STC 628, [1998] ECR I-2553 (paras 22, 23).

18 Cited in footnote 7, above (para 21).

a 51. Nor can the expression ‘service in the area of transport’ be derived from general legal rules of First Council Directive (EEC) 80/1263 (on the introduction of a Community driving licence)<sup>19</sup> or the subsequent Council Directive (EEC) 91/439 (on driving licences)<sup>20</sup>, since neither of those directives concern transport; their primary aim is rather the categorisation of individual classes of driving licence.

b 52. It can, it is true, also be deduced from the case law of the court that not all services in the transport sector constitute transport services. When one considers, however, that the issue in Aéroports de Paris v European Commission<sup>21</sup> was the classification of services in connection with the running of an airport, that become immediately obvious.

c Conclusions in relation to the interpretation of the distance contracts directive

53. If, therefore, no conclusions can be drawn from the existing case law regarding the interpretation of the distance contracts directive, the concept of transport in art 3(2) of the distance contracts directive requires an independent interpretation, apart from the above-mentioned directives and areas of law.

d That interpretation must accord with the context of the directive and the protective purpose of its provisions.

54. With regard to the derogation, as already emphasised<sup>22</sup>, the most important point to note is that, in accordance with consistent case law, such a provision is to be interpreted narrowly. Due attention must therefore also be paid to the affinity of a form of transport with transport within the meaning of the second indent of art 3(2).

e 55. A rented vehicle is, in principle, suitable for carrying objects and further persons in addition to the driver. A further factor supporting the argument that car rental constitutes a provision of services in the area of transport—at least in the broadest sense—is the purpose in using the rented vehicle as a form of transport. It is true that, in the case of car hire, the hirer has no way of knowing how the vehicles will be used. As easyCar argues with some justification, however, the result of renting a vehicle as an alternative to the use of public transport is that use as a form of transport stands in the foreground.

f 56. Therefore, even if the subject matter of a car hire contract is the placing of means of transport at the customer’s disposal, there is to that extent nevertheless a service in the area of transport. Whether, however—as required here—it constitutes a transport service within the meaning of art 3(2) of the distance contracts directive, essentially depends on the purpose of the relevant derogation from that directive.

g 3. The purpose of the derogation under art 3(2) of the distance contracts directive

h 57. It needs to be determined here whether, in accordance with its sense and purpose and taking due account of the consumer protection goals of the directive, the second indent of art 3(2) allows the placing of a form of transport at the customer’s disposal to be regarded as a transport service.

i

<sup>19</sup> OJ 1980 L375 p 1.

<sup>20</sup> OJ 1991 L237 p 1.

<sup>21</sup> Case C-82/01 P [2002] ECR I-9297 (para 27).

<sup>22</sup> See para 33, above.

The sense and purpose of the derogation

58. Even if car hire has the placing of a form of transport at the customer's disposal as its subject matter, the sense of the derogation might nevertheless require that not every such placing is to fall within the exception. That in turn depends upon whether, in the event of the distance contracts directive being applied, the undertaking in question would be exposed to the same particular financial or factual consequences as the other providers of services referred to in the second indent of art 3(2). Only if the undertaking were, through application of the provisions of the distance contracts directive, to be exposed to such consequences can a reduction in consumer protection, corresponding to the compromise apparent in the derogation between consumer protection and the legitimate concerns of undertakings<sup>23</sup>, be justified.

59. As established above<sup>24</sup>, the derogation seeks to protect particular services which have reservation as a precondition and would be affected by the requirements of the distance contracts directive to an unreasonable extent. That occurs where a reservation leads to a setting aside of capacities that can no longer be used in another place and can therefore lead to high opportunity costs on the part of the provider.

Whether car hire undertakings can be disproportionately burdened

60. A car hire undertaking that concludes all its contracts over the Internet is in principle dependent on a reservation of its services, because only in that way is it capable of making economic use of the vehicles. Even in the case of 'traditional' car hire undertakings, reservation allows a more economic use of the vehicle fleet. That economic consideration does not, however, appear on its own to be decisive, when one considers that, even in the case of hire vehicles which become available at short notice, a profitable bargain can still be made, through so-called last-minute offers, for example. In that case, the provider has a plan at his disposal to combat insufficient utilisation at the last minute. Application of the right to cancel under the distance contracts directive is therefore not in itself sufficient to constitute a disproportionate burdening of the undertakings concerned from the economic standpoint.

61. The essential feature of a disproportionate burden, however, would be an increased organisational effort on the basis of an existing reservation. That will as a rule not be the case with the mere placing of hire cars at customers' disposal, at least not if, for example, the preparation of the vehicle (cleaning, tanking, etc) is in any case carried out on the basis of an additional agreement, as appears to be the case with easyCar.

62. Nor, in principle, is a car hire contract affected by a cancellation in the same way as transport undertakings in general which undeniably fall within the derogation. Although, in the case of car hire also, contracts cancelled at short notice can lead to capacities remaining unused during the reserved period, a transport undertaking, unlike a car hire firm, also has in principle to solve the problem of a suitable redeployment of any staff who are not needed. Independently thereof, a transport undertaking also has to carry increased

<sup>23</sup> This in turn means that a proper interpretation of the derogation in question is not necessarily the 'most consumer-friendly' since the very existence of such an exceptional provision indicates in itself that an appropriate compromise between consumer protection and the legitimate concerns of undertakings is necessary in interpreting this derogation. In striking that compromise, it should be noted that, in the final analysis, innovative services or distribution channels are to be interpreted in favour of consumers.

<sup>24</sup> See paras 40 et seq, above.

a liability risks vis-à-vis transported goods or persons, which cause increased costs. Moreover, the loss of opportunity to use a vehicle from a fleet, as in the case of a car hire contract, is likely to involve less in the way of costs than the carrying out of a transport service with a high proportion of empty capacity.

b 63. Nor does any different result arise from the possibility of there being a relationship of competition between a car hire undertaking and passenger transport undertakings which fall within the derogation of art 3(2) of the distance contracts directive. Whether such a relationship of competition actually exists is immaterial, since, even if it did, account would have to be taken of the fact that non-application of the distance contracts directive to such transport undertakings is justified primarily by the particular demands on the business and its staff, such as special licences, dependence on networks and, in part, a practical obligation to contract, which do not apply to the same extent in the case of car hire.

c 64. It is apparent from all of the above that the service plan of a car hire firm is not unduly affected merely because of the existence of a right to cancel in favour of the consumer.

d 65. A car hire firm could become deserving of protection in principle only if it is itself dependent on an overall plan going beyond the individual undertaking. The proceedings in which this question has arisen concern the car hire firm of easyCar, which forms part of a business plan with many branches (easyJet, easyBus etc). A car hire firm that is bound into an overall business plan, which includes areas falling within the derogation under the distance contracts directive, to such an extent that serious consequences, on account, for example, of essential staff or business identity or on account of mixed offers (flight + hire car), actually feed through to the car hire business could fall within the derogation. Otherwise, the car hire firm would, on account of those consequences, be placed in a worse position than its competitors. In such circumstances, moreover, sufficient consumer protection might be afforded by means of Council Directive (EEC) 90/314 (on package travel, package holidays and package tours)<sup>25</sup>.

f 66. However, the facts underlying this reference do not suggest any such dependence.

g 67. In principle, therefore, none of the above justifies removing or restricting consumer protection in relation to the conclusion of a pure car hire contract through the non-application of provisions of the distance contracts directive, since consumers should above all be supplied with sufficient information in order to be clear in their own minds as to the contents of the contract. Particularly, however, in the case of an undertaking—such as the car hire firm of easyCar concerned by this reference—which makes cost savings on the basis of a high degree of splitting up of component services, an increased duty to provide information is necessary, for example as to which services are included and which are to be booked in addition.

h 68. I would therefore hold that a placing of forms of transport at customers' disposal by a car hire firm on the basis of hire contracts can be excluded from the scope of the directive only if, in the event of the rights contained in the provisions referred to in art 3(2) of the distance contracts directive coming into operation, the hire undertaking would suffer just as severe particular consequences as an undertaking carrying out transport itself. In the case of a 'normal' car hire firm, however, that is in principle not the case. a

25 OJ 1990 L158 p 59.

V—CONCLUSION

69. In the light of the above, I propose that the Court of Justice should reply to the question referred as follows: b

A pure car hire contract does not constitute a 'contract for the provision of ... transport ... services' within the meaning of art 3(2) of European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 97/7 (on the protection of consumers in respect of distance contracts).

10 March 2005. THE COURT OF JUSTICE (First Chamber) delivered the following judgment. c

1. The reference for a preliminary ruling concerns the interpretation of art 3(2) of European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 97/7 (on the protection of consumers in respect of distance contracts) (OJ 1997 L144 p 19) (hereinafter the directive).

2. The reference was made in the context of a dispute between the company easyCar (UK) Ltd (hereinafter easyCar) and the Office of Fair Trading (hereinafter the OFT) concerning the terms and conditions of the car hire contracts offered and concluded by easyCar. d

LAW e

Community legislation

3. The object of the directive, as stated in art 1, is to harmonise the provisions applicable in the member states to distance contracts between consumers and suppliers.

4. Under art 3(2) of the directive, arts 4, 5, 6 and 7(1) of the directive do not apply— f

'... to contracts for the provision of accommodation, transport, catering or leisure services, where the supplier undertakes, when the contract is concluded, to provide these services on a specific date or within a specific period ...'

5. Article 6(1) of the directive provides, in respect of distance contracts, for a right of withdrawal for the consumer. Under art 6(2), where the right of withdrawal has been exercised, the supplier must reimburse the sums paid by the consumer free of charge, except for the cost of returning the goods. g

National legislation h

6. The directive was transposed into United Kingdom law by the Consumer Protection (Distance Selling) Regulations 2000, SI 2000/2334 (the national regulations).

7. The exemption referred to in art 3(2) of the directive was transposed into national law by reg 6(2).

8. The right of withdrawal provided for in art 6(1) of the directive was transposed into national law by reg 10, and the obligation under art 6(2) to reimburse by reg 14. i

9. Regulation 27 of the national regulations authorises the OFT to apply for an injunction against any person who appears to it to be responsible for a breach.

a THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTION REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

10. easyCar is a self-drive car hire undertaking. It operates in the United Kingdom and in several other member states. The company's customers can book cars offered for hire only via the Internet. Under the terms and conditions of the car hire contract offered and concluded by easyCar, a customer cannot

b obtain a refund of sums paid if that contract is cancelled, except in 'unusual and unforeseeable events beyond [his] control including ... serious illness of the driver which results in the driver being unfit to drive; natural disaster ... acts or restraints of governments or public authorities; war, riot, civil commotion or acts of terrorism' or 'at the discretion of our Customer Service Manager in other extreme circumstances'.

c 11. In the view of the OFT, which received a number of complaints from consumers relating to hire contracts which they had concluded with easyCar, the terms and conditions of those contracts infringe regs 10 and 14, which provide, for the purpose of implementing the directive, for a right of withdrawal, together with full reimbursement of sums paid by the consumer, within a specific period after the conclusion of the contract.

d 12. easyCar submits that the hire contracts which it offers are covered by the exemption laid down for 'contracts for the provision of ... transport ... services' within the meaning of reg 6(2) of the national regulations and art 3(2) of the directive, and that it is therefore not subject to the requirements of regs 10 and 14. The OFT, on the other hand, contends that car hire cannot be e characterised as a 'transport service'.

13. Both easyCar and the OFT brought proceedings before the High Court of Justice of England and Wales, Chancery Division. easyCar sought a declaration that its rental agreements are exempted from the right of withdrawal provided for by the national regulations, whereas the OFT sought an injunction to restrain easyCar from infringing the national regulations by refusing to offer its

f customers the right to withdraw and to receive a refund of sums paid.

14. It was in those circumstances that the High Court of Justice of England and Wales, Chancery Division, decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following question to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

g 'Does the term "contracts for the provision of ... transport ... services", in Article 3(2) of [the directive], include contracts for the provision of car hire services?'

THE APPLICATION FOR REOPENING OF THE ORAL PROCEDURE

h 15. By application lodged at the Registry of the Court of Justice on 13 December 2004, easyCar sought the reopening of the oral procedure.

16. In that regard, it should be recalled that the court may order that the oral procedure be reopened, in accordance with art 61 of its Rules of Procedure, if it considers that it lacks sufficient information, or that the case must be dealt with on the basis of an argument which has not been debated between the parties (see Deutsche Post AG v Sievers Joined cases C-270/97 and C-271/97 [2000] ECR I-929 (para 30) and Philips Electronics NV v Remington Consumer Products Ltd Case C-299/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 634, [2002] ECR I-5475 (para 20)).

i

17. The court considers that there is no need in this case to order the reopening of the oral procedure. Consequently, the application for a reopening must be rejected.

THE QUESTION REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

18. The order for reference indicates that it is common ground between the parties that the contracts concluded between easyCar and its customers are distance contracts within the meaning of the national regulations and of the directive, and that they constitute contracts for the provision of services. By its question, the national court seeks, in essence, to ascertain whether car hire services are transport services for the purposes of art 3(2) of the directive. a

19. easyCar submits that this question should be answered in the affirmative. The Spanish, French and United Kingdom governments and the Commission of the European Communities maintain the opposite view. b

20. In that regard, it must be stated from the outset that neither the directive nor the documents relevant for its interpretation, such as the travaux préparatoires, provide clarification of the exact scope of the concept of 'transport services' mentioned in art 3(2) of the directive. Similarly, the general scheme of the directive shows only that its objective is to entitle consumers to extensive protection by conferring on them certain rights, including the right of withdrawal, and that art 3(2) provides for an exemption from those rights in four closely-related sectors of economic activity, including that of transport services. c

21. It is settled case law that the meaning and scope of terms for which Community law provides no definition must be determined by considering their usual meaning in everyday language, while also taking into account the context in which they occur and the purposes of the rules of which they are part (see Hönig v Stadt Stockach Case C-128/94 [1995] ECR I-3389 (para 9) and DIR International Film Srl v European Commission Case C-164/98 P [2000] ECR I-447 (para 26)). When those terms appear, as in the main proceedings, in a provision which constitutes a derogation from a principle or, more specifically, from Community rules for the protection of consumers, they must, in addition, be interpreted strictly (see European Commission v Spain Case C-83/99 [2001] ECR I-445 (para 19) and Heininger v Bayerische Hypo- und Vereinsbank AG Case C-481/99 [2004] All ER (EC) 1, [2001] ECR I-9945 (para 31)). d

22. So far as the term 'transport services' is concerned, it must be held that it represents, like each of the other categories of services listed, a sectoral exemption and that it therefore relates generally to services in the transport sector. e

23. When the provisions on the exemption at issue in the main proceedings were drafted the legislature did not opt for the term 'contracts of carriage' commonly used in the legal systems of the member states, which relates only to carriage of passengers and goods performed by the carrier, but for the distinctly broader term 'contracts for the provision of ... transport ... services', which can cover all contracts governing services in the field of transport, including those involving an activity which does not include, as such, the carriage of the customer or his goods, but which is aimed at enabling the customer to perform that carriage. f

24. The wording of art 3(2) of the directive thus demonstrates that the legislature intended to define the exemption laid down in that provision, not according to the type of contract, but in such a way that all contracts for the provision of services in the accommodation, transport, catering and leisure sectors come within the scope of that exemption, with the exception of those the performance of which is not due on a specific date or within a specific period. g

h

i

- a 25. That interpretation is expressly supported by several language versions of art 3(2) of the directive, namely the German, Italian and Swedish versions, which mention, respectively, 'Dienstleistungen in den Bereichen ... Beförderung' ('services in the transport sector'), 'servizi relativi ... ai trasporti' ('services relating to transport') and 'tjänster som avser ... transport' ('services which concern transport').
- b 26. In everyday language, 'transport' refers not only to the action of moving persons or goods from one place to another, but also to the mode of transport and to the means used to move those persons and goods. Making a means of transport available to the consumer is thus one of the services involved in the transport sector.
- c 27. Consequently, without exceeding the strict scope of the sectoral exemption relating to 'transport services', provided for in art 3(2) of the directive, it must be held that that exemption covers car hire services, the essential nature of which is precisely the making available to the consumer of a means of transport.
- d 28. In addition, so far as concerns the context in which the concept of 'transport services' is used and the objectives pursued by the directive, it is established, as Advocate General Stix-Hackl noted in paras 39–41 of her opinion, that the intention of the legislature was to institute protection for the interests of consumers who use means of distance communication, but also protection for the interests of suppliers of certain services, in order that the latter should not suffer the disproportionate consequences arising from the cancellation at no expense and with no explanation of services which have given rise to a booking. In that regard, easyCar rightly maintains, without, moreover, being contradicted on this point either by the governments which submitted observations to the court or by the Commission, that art 3(2) of the directive is aimed at exempting suppliers of services in certain sectors on the ground that the requirements of the directive could affect those suppliers disproportionately, in particular where a service has given rise to a booking and that booking is cancelled by the consumer at short notice before the date specified for the provision of that service.
- e 29. Clearly, car hire undertakings carry on an activity which the legislature intended to protect against such consequences by means of the exemption laid down in art 3(2) of the directive. Those undertakings must make arrangements for the performance, on the date fixed at the time of booking, of the agreed service and therefore, for that reason, suffer the same consequences in the event of cancellation as other undertakings operating in the transport sector or in the other sectors listed in art 3(2).
- f 30. It follows from the foregoing considerations that the interpretation to the effect that car hire services are transport services for the purposes of art 3(2) of the directive is the only one which ensures that the exemption laid down in that provision has the character of a sectoral exemption and which enables the objective pursued by that provision to be achieved.
- g 31. The answer to the question referred must therefore be that art 3(2) of the directive is to be interpreted as meaning that 'contracts for the provision of transport services' includes contracts for the provision of car hire services.
- h
- i

COSTS

32. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable. a

On those grounds, the Court of Justice (First Chamber) hereby rules:

Article 3(2) of European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 97/7 (on the protection of consumers in respect of distance contracts) is to be interpreted as meaning that 'contracts for the provision of transport services' includes contracts for the provision of car hire services. b

a Ferriere Nord SpA v European Commission

(Case T-176/01)

b COURT OF FIRST INSTANCE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (FOURTH CHAMBER, EXTENDED COMPOSITION)

JUDGES LEGAL (PRESIDENT), TIILI, MEIJ, VILARAS AND FORWOOD

15 JANUARY, 18 NOVEMBER 2004

c European Community – State aids – Aid for environmental protection – Member state notifying Commission of proposed measure to assist undertaking's investment in technologically innovative manufacturing plant – New plant reducing polluting and noise emissions – Commission declaring proposed measure incompatible with common market – Commission concluding that proposed investment for economic and industrial purposes, and that environmental benefits inherent in process – Whether undertaking pursuing environmental objectives.

d

The Italian competent authorities notified the Commission of the European Communities of its intention to grant the applicant undertaking, which was situated in Italy and which operated in the steel, mechanical and metallurgical sector, a financial contribution for investment in continuous flow plant and in new rolling line, which was technologically innovative and which would reduce polluting and noise emissions. However, in respect of that proposed aid measure, the Commission adopted Commission Decision (EC, ECSC) 2001/829 (on the state aid which Italy is planning to grant to Ferriere Nord SpA), by which it declared the financial assistance to be incompatible with the common market and not to be implemented. The Commission held, so far as relevant: (i) that the undertaking's investment in the plant had not been based on environmental objectives, but economic and industrial purposes, which precluded the grant of aid for environmental protection; and (ii) that environmental protection advantages were inherent in the process and could not be isolated from the total cost of the investment, as was required by the Community guidelines on state aid for environmental protection (OJ 2001 C 37 p 3). Maintaining, inter alia, that its investment had pursued an environmental objective which rendered it eligible on that basis for aid for environmental protection, the applicant sought annulment of the decision. In particular, it was submitted that the Commission had failed to take into account the environmental purpose of the project and had considered, arbitrarily, that the purpose of the investment was predominantly economic, whereas the objective of the new process had specifically been to make the production system ecological—while it was logical that the new plant should be more economically efficient than the old plant, the former rolling line had remained satisfactory in functional and technological terms and it had been replaced by innovative equipment in order to eliminate the disadvantages which the old process had represented for the environment.

e

f

g

h

i

Held – Where a project pursued a partially environmental objective, in order for assisted investment to be justified as state aid for environmental protection, it had to be demonstrable that the same economic performance might be obtained using less costly, but more economically harmful equipment. Having regard to the scheme of the guidelines, it was clear that only an additional investment cost linked with environmental protection was eligible for state aid. Such eligibility assumed that economic considerations were not in themselves sufficient to justify the investment in the form chosen. Although a project might have an objective of improving economic productivity whilst at the same time an objective of environmental protection, the existence of the second objective was not to be inferred from the mere finding that the new equipment had a less negative impact on the environment than the old equipment, which might be merely a collateral effect of a change in technology for economic purposes or of the renewal of used equipment. It followed that the instant case did not depend on whether the investment brought environmental improvements or whether it went beyond existing standards, but, primarily on whether the investment was being carried out in order to bring about such improvements. In that regard, it was apparent that the applicant had equipment which it wished to replace by a plant using a technologically innovative process incorporating the performance for environmental protection of any modern equipment. The inevitable conclusion was, therefore, that the investment had followed on from a decision of the undertaking to modernise its production equipment and that it would in any event have been in that form. Accordingly, the Commission had not made an error of assessment by taking the view that it had not been established that the investment had a genuinely environmental purpose. In any event, the decision had stated that the cost of the investment intended to protect the environment could not be isolated from the total cost of the operation, which finding was not superfluous, since, if the project chosen entailed an additional cost by comparison with a different, hypothetical, project offering the same economic performance in less environmentally favourable conditions, it might be inferred that the investment had an environmental object. Accordingly, the Commission had lawfully declared the aid incompatible with the common market and there was no reason to annul the decision (see judgment paras 147, 151, 152, 155–157, 163, 164, below).

Notes

For competition and state aids generally, see 47 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2001 reissue) para 439.

Cases cited

- Associação dos Refinadores de Açúcar Portugueses (ARAP) v European Commission* Case C-321/99 P [2002] ECR I-4287, ECJ.
- Belgium v EC Commission* Case 234/84 [1986] ECR 263, ECJ.
- ESF Elbe-Stahlwerke Feralpi GmbH v European Commission* Case T-6/99 [2001] ECR II-1523, CFI.
- Förde-Reederei GmbH v EU Council* Case T-170/00 [2002] ECR II-515, CFI.
- France v European Commission* Case C-17/99 [2001] ECR I-2481, ECJ.
- Germany v EC Commission* Case 84/82 [1984] ECR I-1451, ECJ.
- GruSa Fleisch GmbH & Co KG, Import-Export (Firma) v Hauptzollamt Hamburg-Jonas* Case C-34/92 [1993] ECR I-4147, ECJ.
- Italy v European Commission* Case C-400/99 [2001] ECR I-7303, ECJ.
- Italy v European Commission* Case C-47/91 [1994] ECR I-4635, ECJ.
- Keller SpA v European Commission* Case T-35/99 [2002] ECR II-261, CFI.

- a* Koinopraxia Enoseon Georgikon Synetairismon Diacheiriseos Enchorion Proionton Syn PE v European Commission Case C-146/91 [1994] ECR I-4199, ECJ.
Licata v Economic and Social Committee Case 270/84 [1986] ECR 2305, ECJ.
Lorenz (Gebr) GmbH v Germany Case 120/73 [1973] ECR 1471, ECJ.
Oleifici Mediterranei (SA) v European Economic Community Case 26/81 [1982] ECR 3057, ECJ.
- b* Regione Siciliana v European Commission Case T-190/00 (2003) Transcript (judgment), 27 November, CFI.
Saldanha v Hiross Holding AG Case C-122/96 [1998] All ER (EC) 238, [1997] ECR I-5325, ECJ.
Scan Office Design SA v European Commission Case T-40/01 [2002] ECR II-5043, CFI.
- c* Société française de Biscuits Delacre v EC Commission Case C-350/88 [1990] ECR I-395, ECJ.
Spain v EC Commission Joined cases C-278–280/92 [1994] ECR I-4103, ECJ.
Spain v European Commission Case C-113/00 [2002] ECR I-7601, ECJ.
Spain v European Commission Case C-114/00 [2002] ECR I-7657, ECJ.
- d* Spain v European Commission Case C-351/98 [2002] ECR I-8031, ECJ.
Thai Bicycle Industry & Co Ltd v EU Council Case T-118/96 [1998] ECR II-2991, CFI.
Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v European Commission Joined cases T-228/99 and T-233/99 [2003] ECR II-435, CFI.

e Application

- By application lodged on 13 July 2001 at the Registry of the Court of First Instance of the European Communities, Ferriere Nord SpA (Ferriere), an undertaking in the steel, mechanical and metallurgical industrial sector established in Osoppo, Italy, brought the present action on the basis of the fourth paragraph of art 230 EC (formerly art 173 of the EC Treaty), art 235 EC (formerly art 178 of the EC Treaty) and the second paragraph of art 288 EC (formerly art 215 of the EC Treaty) for, first, annulment of Commission Decision (EC, ECSC) 2001/829 (on the state aid which Italy is planning to grant to Ferriere Nord SpA) and, second, compensation for the harm allegedly sustained by the applicant following the adoption of that decision. Ferriere was represented by W Viscardini Donà and G Donà, lawyers. Ferriere was supported by the Italian Republic, represented initially by U Leanza, acting as agent, and subsequently by I Braguglia and M Fiorilli, Avvocati dello Stato, with an address for service in Luxembourg. The Commission of the European Communities was represented by V Kreuschitz and V Di Bucci, acting as agents, with an address for service in Luxembourg. The language of the case was Italian. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

18 November 2004. THE COURT OF FIRST INSTANCE (Fourth Chamber, Extended Composition) delivered the following judgment.

LEGAL FRAMEWORK

- i* 1. Article 87 EC (formerly art 92 of the EC Treaty) provides that, save as otherwise provided, state aid is incompatible with the common market in so far as it affects trade between member states and is anti-competitive in that it favours certain undertakings or the production of certain goods.
2. Article 88 EC (formerly art 93 of the EC Treaty) governs co-operation between the Commission of the European Communities and the member states as regards examination of existing aid systems and new aid systems. It authorises the Council of the European Communities to act in the event of aid which is incompatible with the common market and determines the powers of the Council.

3. Article 174 EC (formerly art 130r of the EC Treaty) provides that Community policy on the environment is to have as its objectives, inter alia, the protection and improvement of the quality of the environment and the protection of human health.

4. Article 7(6) of Council Regulation (EC) 659/1999 (laying down detailed rules for the application of art [88 EC]) (OJ 1999 L83 p 1), on the decisions taken by the Commission to close the formal examination procedure, provides:

‘... The Commission shall as far as possible endeavour to adopt a decision within a period of 18 months from the opening of the procedure. This time limit may be extended by common agreement between the Commission and the Member State concerned.’

5. Article 6 of Commission Decision (ECSC) 2496/96 (establishing Community rules for state aid to the steel industry) (OJ 1996 L338 p 42), which was applicable until 22 July 2002, provided, in respect of the procedure:

‘1. The Commission shall be informed, in sufficient time to enable it to submit its comments, of any plans to grant or alter aid of the types referred to in Article 2 to 5. It shall likewise be informed of plans to grant aid to the steel industry under schemes on which it has already taken a decision under the EC Treaty ...

2. The Commission shall be informed, in sufficient time for it to submit its comments, and by 31 December 2001 at the latest, of any plans for transfers of State resources by Member States, regional or local authorities or other bodies to steel undertakings in the form of acquisition of shareholdings, provisions of capital, loan guarantees, indemnities or similar financing ...

5. If the Commission considers that a certain financial measure may represent State aid within the meaning of Article 1 or doubts whether a certain aid is compatible with the provisions of this Decision, it shall inform the Member State concerned and give notice to the interested parties and other Member States to submit their comments. If, after having received the comments and after having given the Member State concerned the opportunity to respond, the Commission finds that the measure in question is an aid incompatible with the provisions of this Decision, it shall take a decision not later than three months after receiving the information needed to assess the proposed measure. Article 88 of the [ECSC] Treaty shall apply in the event of a Member State’s failing to comply with that decision.

6. If the Commission fails to initiate the procedure provided for in paragraph 5 or otherwise to make its position known within two months of receiving full notification of a proposal, the planned measures may be put into effect provided that the Member State first informs the Commission of its intention to do so ...’

6. The Community guidelines on state aid for environmental protection (OJ 1994 C72 p 3; the 1994 guidelines), the period of validity of which expired on 31 December 1999 and was twice extended, until 30 June 2000 (OJ 2000 C14 p 8) and then until 31 December 2000 (OJ 2000 C184 p 25), were applicable in a all the sectors governed by the EC Treaty, including those subject to specific Community rules on state aid (point 2). Those guidelines (at point 3) stated the conditions for the application of the rules on state aid, in particular for investment aid:

b '3.2.1. Aid for investment in land (when strictly necessary to meet environmental objectives), buildings, plant and equipment intended to reduce or eliminate pollution and nuisances or to adapt production methods in order to protect the environment may be authorised within the limits laid down in these guidelines. The eligible costs must be strictly confined to the extra investment costs necessary to meet environmental objectives. General investment costs not attributable to environmental protection must be excluded. Thus, in the case of new or replacement plant, the cost of the basic investment involved merely to create or replace production capacity without improving environmental performance is not eligible ... In any case aid ostensibly intended for environmental protection measures but which is in fact for general investment is not covered by these guidelines.'

d 7. Point 3 of the 1994 guidelines also defined the special conditions for authorisation of aid to help firms to adapt to new mandatory standards or to improve on mandatory environmental standards and also the conditions for the grant of aid in the absence of mandatory standards.

e 8. The Community guidelines on state aid for environmental protection (OJ 2001 C37 p 3; the 2001 guidelines), which replaced the 1994 guidelines, provide at point 7 that they apply to aid to protect the environment in all sectors governed by the EC Treaty, including those subject to specific Community rules on state aid.

f 9. As regards the reference to environmental standards, points 20 and 21 of the 2001 guidelines state that if environmental requirements are to be taken into account in the long term, prices must accurately reflect costs and environmental protection costs must be fully internalised; accordingly, the Commission takes the view that the grant of aid is no longer justified in the case of investment designed merely to hold firms to comply with existing or new Community technical standards, except in favour of small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) in order to enable them to adapt to new Community standards, and that it may prove a useful incentive for firms to achieve levels of protection higher than those required by Community standards.

g 10. As regards the investments taken into consideration, point 36 (first sentence) of the 2001 guidelines states:

h 'The investments concerned are investments in land which are strictly necessary in order to meet environmental objectives, investments in buildings, plant and equipment intended to reduce or eliminate pollution and nuisances, and investments to adapt production methods with a view to protecting the environment.'

i 11. As regards the eligible costs, point 37 provides, in the first three paragraphs:

'Eligible costs must be confined strictly to the extra investment costs necessary to meet the environmental objectives.'

This has the following consequences: where the cost of investment in environmental protection cannot be easily identified in the total cost, the Commission will take account of objective and transparent methods of calculation, e.g. the cost of a technically comparable investment that does not though provide the same degree of environmental protection.

In all cases, eligible costs must be calculated net of the benefits accruing from any increase in capacity, cost savings engendered during the first five years of the life of the investment and additional ancillary production during that five-year period.'

12. The 2001 guidelines state that they are to become applicable when they are published in the Official Journal of the European Communities (point 81), which they were on 3 February 2001. Furthermore, point 82 of those guidelines states:

'The Commission will apply these guidelines to all aid projects notified in respect of which it is called upon to take a decision after the guidelines are published in the Official Journal, even where the projects were notified prior to their publication ...'

BACKGROUND TO THE DISPUTE

13. In 1978 the Italian Autonomous Region of Friuli-Venezia Giulia adopted a number of measures designed to encourage the initiatives of industrial undertakings for environmental protection. The scheme in question, which results from art 15(1) of Regional Law No 47 of 3 June 1978, was amended by art 7 of Regional Law No 23 of 8 April 1982 and then by art 34 of Regional Law No 2 of 20 January 1992. It was approved by the Commission (letter SG (92) D/18803 of 22 December 1992) and definitively adopted by Regional Law No 3 of 3 February 1993. Article 15(1) of Regional Law No 47 of 3 June 1978, as amended most recently by Regional Law No 3 of 3 February 1993, provides:

'The regional administration is authorised to grant to industrial undertakings which have been in operation for at least two years and which propose to introduce or alter processes and production plant in order to reduce the quantity or danger of discharges, waste and emissions produced or noise nuisance or to improve the quality of working conditions, in accordance with the new standards fixed by the legislation applicable to the sector, financial assistance up to a maximum of 20% in equivalent gross subsidy of the costs considered eligible.'

14. In 1998, the Italian Autonomous Region of Friuli-Venezia Giulia voted for new credits to finance the aid scheme approved by the Commission in 1992. Article 27(c)(16) of Regional Law No 3 of 12 February 1998 on the refinancing of Regional Law No 2 of 20 January 1992 provided budget credits of ITL 4,500m per annum for the period 1998–2000. That refinancing measure was approved by Commission Decision SG (98) D/7785 of 18 September 1998.

15. Ferriere Nord SpA (Ferriere) is an undertaking in the steel, mechanical and metallurgical industrial sector, situated in Osoppo, in the Autonomous Region of Friuli-Venezia Giulia. It makes steel products, some of which come under the ECSC Treaty while others come under the EC Treaty. The undertaking, which is one of the main European producers of electro-welded mesh, had a turnover of €210,800,000 in 1999; of this, 84% was in Italy, 11% in the rest of the European Union and 5% in the rest of the world.

16. By letter of 26 March 1997, Ferriere requested the Autonomous Region of Friuli-Venezia Giulia to make a financial contribution, under art 15 of a Regional Law No 47 of 3 June 1978, as amended, in order to ... a new plant for the production of electrowelded mesh, which was technologically innovative and of such a kind as to reduce polluting and noise emissions and to improve working conditions. The total investment came to ITL 20,000m.

b 17. By Regional Decree of 8 October 1998, the Autonomous Region of Friuli-Venezia Giulia decided to grant Ferriere a contribution equal to 15% of the admissible cost, namely ITL 1,650,000,000 (€852,154).

c 18. By letter dated 18 February 1999, received by the Commission's Directorate-General 'Competition' on 25 February, the Italian authorities notified the Commission, in the context of the procedure for systematic notification of projects involving the transfer of public resources for the benefit of steel industries provided for in art 6(1) and (2) of Decision 2496/96, of their intention to grant the steel undertaking Ferriere state aid for environmental protection, in application of Regional Law No 47 of 3 June 1978, as amended.

d 19. The notification related to state aid for investment in continuous flow plant and in a new rolling line for welded steel mesh. Payment of the aid in respect of the second investment was suspended by the Italian authorities in order to prevent the problems which might arise if it had to be reimbursed pursuant to a Community decision finding it incompatible with the common market.

e 20. By letter of 3 June 1999, the Commission informed the Italian Republic that it had decided to initiate the procedure provided for in art 6(5) of Decision 2496/96 concerning aid C 35/99—Italy—Ferriere Nord (OJ 1999 C288 p 39).

f 21. The Italian authorities informed the Commission, by letter of 3 August 1999 from the Autonomous Region of Friuli-Venezia Giulia to the Permanent Representation of Italy to the European Union, that the investment in respect of the rolling line fell within the scope of the EC Treaty, since the welded steel mesh manufactured with that equipment is not an ECSC product; that it satisfied objectives aimed at protecting health and the environment; and that the measure came within the framework of point 3.2.1 of the 1994 guidelines.

g 22. Ferriere and the European Independent Steelworks Association (EISA), by letters of 5 and 4 November 1999 respectively, also claimed that the relevant legal framework for the purposes of examining the aid measure was the EC Treaty.

h 23. By letter of 25 July 2000, the Italian authorities informed the Commission that, at Ferriere's request, they were withdrawing the part of the notification relating to the ECSC investment in respect of the continuous flow plant and confirmed the part of the notification relating to the investment in respect of the rolling line, which concerned non-ECSC steel products; and they requested the Commission to make a determination under art 88(3) EC concerning the compatibility of the project with the common market.

i 24. By letter of 14 August 2000, the Commission informed the Italian Republic that it had decided to initiate the procedure provided for in art 88(2) EC concerning aid C 45/00—Italy—Ferriere Nord SpA, towards investments in a new rolling line for welded steel mesh (OJ 2000 C315 p 4). The Commission stated, inter alia, in that decision that as Ferriere was an undertaking which did not keep separate accounts for its activities according to whether they came under the ECSC Treaty or the EC Treaty, it had to ensure that the aid did not benefit the ECSC activities.

25. Ferriere submitted its comments in a letter of 13 November 2000, in which it emphasised the separation between its ECSC activities and its EC activities and stressed the importance of the environmental objective of its investment, stating that the aid came within the scheme approved in 1992 and that it was consistent with point 3.2.1 of the 1994 guidelines. a

26. By letter to the Commission of 4 December 2000, the United Kingdom Iron and Steel Association stated that the aid should be examined from the aspect of the ECSC provisions and that the proposed investment had a manifestly economic purpose.

27. In a letter dated 15 January 2001, the Italian Republic confirmed that the aid should be assessed in the light of the EC Treaty. b

28. On 28 March 2001, the Commission adopted Decision (EC, ECSC) 2001/829 (on the state aid which Italy [was] planning to grant to Ferriere Nord SpA) (OJ 2001 L310 p 22; the contested decision).

29. The Commission states in the contested decision that the welded mesh, which will be manufactured in a separate unit of the undertaking using the new rolling line, is not an ECSC product and that the aid must therefore be assessed in the light of the EC Treaty. It states that the proposed financial assistance constitutes state aid. c

30. The Commission considers that the investment, which is intended to improve the undertaking's competitiveness and to replace old equipment, is essentially based on economic reasons, that it would have been made in any event and that it does not justify the grant of aid for environmental protection. Its positive effects, from the point of view of environmental protection and working conditions, would be inherent in a new plant. The Commission observes that, in the absence of mandatory ecological standards requiring the construction of the new rolling line, the aid cannot be regarded as an individual application of a scheme which has already been approved. Last, it states that, on the assumption that the environmental purpose was predominant, it would not be possible to distinguish, within the total cost of the investment, the part attaching to environmental protection, as required by the 2001 guidelines. d

31. Consequently, the Commission declares that the aid is incompatible with the common market and cannot be implemented. It orders the Italian Republic to comply with that decision. It terminates the procedure initiated in respect of aid C 35/99—Italy—Ferriere Nord (see para 20, above). e

PROCEDURE

32. By application lodged at the Registry of the Court of First Instance on 13 July 2001, Ferriere brought the present action on the basis of the fourth paragraph of art 230 EC (formerly art 173 of the EC Treaty), art 235 EC (formerly art 178 of the EC Treaty) and the second paragraph of art 288 EC (formerly art 215 of the EC Treaty). g

33. On 22 November 2001, the Italian Republic sought leave to intervene in support of the form of order sought by the applicant. By order of 14 January 2002, the President of the First Chamber, Extended Composition, granted that application. h

34. By decision of the Court of First Instance of 2 July 2003 (OJ 2003 C184 p 32), the Judge-Rapporteur was assigned, for the period 1 October 2003–31 August 2004, to the Fourth Chamber, Extended Composition, to which the case was consequently reallocated. i

35. By a measure of organisation of procedure notified to the parties on 28 October 2003, the court requested the Commission and the Italian Republic to produce certain legislative and administrative documents concerning the aid scheme approved in 1992 and to state whether it had subsequently been a amended. The applicant was also requested to indicate the factors which in its view made it possible to isolate the investment cost associated with environmental protection.

36. By letters of 26 November 2003, the parties answered the court's requests.

b 37. The parties presented oral argument and their answers to the questions put by the court at the hearing on 15 January 2004.

FORMS OF ORDER SOUGHT BY THE PARTIES

38. Ferriere claims that the court should:

—annul the contested decision;

c —order the Commission to make good the harm caused to the applicant by that decision, together with interest at the statutory rate applicable in Italy and a sum taking account of monetary revaluation, both to be calculated on the amount of the aid as from 26 April 1999;

—order the Commission to pay the costs.

d 39. The Italian Republic claims that the court should annul the contested decision.

40. The Commission contends that the court should:

—dismiss the action;

—order the applicant to pay the costs.

THE LAWFULNESS OF THE CONTESTED DECISION

e 41. In support of its action, Ferriere puts forward both procedural pleas and substantive pleas.

Procedure

f 42. The applicant develops six procedural pleas, alleging that the Commission was not lawfully entitled to initiate the formal aid examination procedure, that it did not observe the procedural time limits and that it breached the rights of the defence, the principle of protection of legitimate expectations, the principle of sound administration and its obligation to state the reasons for its decision.

g First plea: the Commission was not lawfully entitled to initiate the formal aid examination procedure

—Arguments of the parties

h 43. Ferriere maintains that the Commission unlawfully initiated the formal procedure, first on 3 June 1999 and then a second time on 14 August 2000, as the aid constitutes a measure for the application of the authorised scheme. The Commission should have closed the file, notified in error, after declaring that it was compatible with the approved scheme. The initiation of the formal procedure in the circumstances of the present case thus constitutes a breach of the principles of protection of legitimate expectations and legal certainty.

i 44. The Italian Republic, which alleges misuse of powers, claims that the Commission should have merely taken note of the notification and not examined it as an individual aid.

45. The Commission contends that it was justified in initiating the formal examination procedure. First, it states that the Italian authorities notified the aid at the request of the Autonomous Region of Friuli-Venezia Giulia, since the aid was not considered to be covered by the approved scheme; that, in the second notification, of 25 July 2000, the Italian government asked it to adopt a position on a plan to grant new aid within the meaning of art 88(3) EC; and that, since it was not maintained that the aid was covered by the approved scheme, it had no reason to carry out further investigations. Second, when notifying the aid, the Italian authorities stated that there were no mandatory standards, contrary to the requirements of the approved scheme. The Commission further contends that, after finding, following verification, that the planned aid was not covered by an existing scheme, it then examined it in the light of the legislation in force.

—Findings of the court

46. It is not in dispute that two decisions to initiate the formal procedure were notified to the Italian authorities, on 3 June 1999 and 14 August 2000.

47. It follows from the Commission's letter of 22 December 1992, referred to at para 13, above, approving the aid scheme in favour of environmental protection proposed by the Autonomous Region of Friuli-Venezia Giulia, that the Commission determined the matter within the framework of the provisions of the EC Treaty, under which the scheme in question had been notified to it by the Italian authorities on 23 January 1992, and not within the framework of the ECSC Treaty.

48. Also, in accordance with the requirements of art 6(1) of Decision 2496/96, which provides that the Commission is to be informed of plans to grant aid in respect of which it has already taken a decision under the EC Treaty, the Italian authorities on 18 February 1999 notified the planned aid in favour of environmental protection which they intended to grant to the applicant. The information given in that notification, to the effect that the aid was granted pursuant to Regional Law No 47 of 3 June 1978, as amended by Regional Law No 2 of 2 January 1992, 'notified at the time to the European Community with a favourable outcome', is immaterial, since approval had been given in the context of the EC Treaty and in such circumstances the above-mentioned provisions of Decision 2496/96 required the member state to notify planned aid covered by the ECSC Treaty.

49. Upon being notified of such planned aid, the Commission, when it had doubts as to its compatibility with the provisions of Decision 2496/96 on aid to the steel industry, could lawfully, pursuant to art 6(5) of that decision, cited at para 5, above, initiate the formal procedure, as it did on 3 June 1999.

50. Ferriere cannot therefore maintain that the Commission initially acted unlawfully in initiating the formal procedure.

51. As regards the second initiation of the formal procedure, it should be borne in mind that, when the Commission has before it a specific grant of aid alleged to have been made in pursuance of a previously authorised scheme, it cannot at the outset examine it directly in relation to the Treaty. Prior to the initiation of any procedure, it must first examine whether the aid is covered by the general scheme and satisfies the conditions laid down in the decision approving it. If it did not do so, the Commission could, whenever it examined an individual aid measure, go back on its decision approving the aid scheme, which had already involved an examination in the light of art 87 EC. This would jeopardise the principles of the protection of legitimate expectations and legal certainty. Aid which constitutes the strict and foreseeable application of the conditions laid down in the decision approving the general aid scheme is thus considered to be existing aid, which does not need to be notified to the Commission or examined in the light of art 87 EC (see Associação dos

a Refinadores de Açúcar Portugueses (ARAP) v European Commission Case C-321/99 P [2002] ECR I-4287 (para 83) and the case law cited).

b 52. In the present case, when the Italian authorities withdrew part of the first notification and confirmed the notification in respect of the aid relating to the rolling line, on 25 July 2000, as stated at para 23, above, they expressly requested the Commission to adopt a position on the compatibility of the planned aid with the common market pursuant to art 88(3) EC, which concerns new aid, and not in the context of the permanent co-operation between the Commission and the member states established by art 88(1) EC, which is concerned with existing aid.

c 53. Furthermore, while the letter from the Autonomous Region of Friuli-Venezia Giulia of 18 February 1999 attached to the notification of 18 February 1999, which remained valid for the part of the notification which was maintained, contained a reference to the approved scheme, the Italian authorities did not maintain that the aid in respect of Ferriere's investment constituted a measure for the application of that scheme. Furthermore, and for the sake of completeness, although the approved d scheme, cited at para 13, above, concerns investments which bring improvements from the aspect of environmental protection or working conditions 'in accordance with the new norms fixed by the legislation in the sector', the above-mentioned letter stated that Ferriere was not subject to mandatory norms or to other legal obligations, which on the face of it gave rise to doubt as to whether the notified project corresponded to the approved e scheme.

54. In those circumstances, in the light of the ambiguity of the letter of 15 February 1999 and of the fact that the Italian authorities did not maintain at the time of their second notification that the aid measure granted to Ferriere constituted a measure for the application of the approved scheme even though they twice took the initiative to notify the impugned aid project to the f Commission, notifying it for the second time on the basis of art 88(3) EC, as new aid the compatibility of which they expressly requested the Commission, in their letter of 25 July 2000, to determine, it does not appear that the Commission acted unlawfully in initiating the formal procedure for a second time.

g 55. The reference which Ferriere and the Italian Republic make to the Italgrani and Tirrenia cases previously examined by the Court of Justice (see Italy v European Commission Case C-47/91 [1994] ECR I-4635 (the Italgrani case) and Italy v European Commission Case C-400/99 [2001] ECR I-7303 (the Tirrenia case)) is irrelevant. In those cases, the Commission had initiated the formal procedure following complaints and the Italian government contended that the h aid granted to the undertakings concerned fell, in the Italgrani case, within an approved scheme and, in the Tirrenia case, within a public service contract, so that it constituted existing aid (see the Italgrani case (paras 6, 12), and the Tirrenia case (paras 8, 24, 25)). The Court of Justice stated in the Italgrani case that for the Commission to call in question 'aid in strict conformity with the decision approving the aid scheme' would jeopardise the principles of i protection of legitimate expectations and legal certainty (see the Italgrani case (para 24)).

56. The reasoning of the Court of Justice does not appear to be capable of being transposed to the present case, which concerns individual aid notified to the Commission as new aid pursuant to art 88(3) EC.

57. It follows from the foregoing that Ferriere cannot argue that the formal procedure was initiated unlawfully or that there has been a breach of the principles of protection of legitimate expectations and legal certainty. The first plea must therefore be rejected. a

Second plea: the Commission failed to observe the procedural time limits b

—Arguments of the parties

58. Ferriere claims that the Commission exceeded the procedural time limits laid down in respect of state aid, from two aspects. First, the Commission initiated the formal procedure on 3 June 1999, more than three months after notification of the aid, when, according to the texts and the case law, it ought to have adopted a decision within two months following notification of aid. Second, the Commission did not observe the period of 18 months prescribed by art 7(6) of Regulation 659/99 within which it must take a decision after initiating a formal procedure, as 20 months elapsed before the contested decision was adopted. Ferriere further submits that while the 18-month period is not mandatory, it can be extended only by common consent between the Commission and the member state concerned. c
d

59. The Italian Republic maintains that the delay in adopting the contested decision constitutes a breach of art 7(6) of Regulation 659/1999 and that it did not agree to an extension of the period for closing the formal procedure. The intervener further contends that the Commission failed to observe the principle of loyal co-operation by declaring, in art 3 of the contested decision, that the procedure initiated under the ECSC Treaty following the notification of 18 February 1999 was closed. e

60. The Commission contends that the plea alleging that the procedure was unduly long is unfounded. As regards the initiation of the formal procedure, it observes that the initial notification was effected on the basis of rules which proved to be irrelevant, so that it could not be compelled to react within the two-month period normally applicable, and that the Italian authorities had not informed it of their intention to implement the aid. As regards the duration of the formal examination procedure, the Commission claims that the period of 18 months in art 7(6) of Regulation 695/1999 is not mandatory. Furthermore, as the contested decision, dated 28 March 2001, was based on the second decision to initiate the formal procedure, dated 14 August 2000, the real duration of the procedure was seven-and-a-half months. f
g

—Findings of the court

61. As regards the first decision to initiate the formal procedure, the relevant provisions, concerning a notification made under the ECSC Treaty, are those set out in art 6(6) of Decision 2496/96 and not, as the parties wrongly state, those of art 4(5) of Regulation 659/1999, which apply to the second notification. h

62. Article 6(6) of Decision 2496/96 mentions a period of two months beyond which, if a formal procedure has not been initiated, the planned aid measures may be put into effect provided that the member state has first informed the Commission of its intention. That provision does not impose on the Commission a period on pain of nullity but, in accordance with the principle of proper administration, invites it to act diligently and allows the member state concerned to put the aid measures into effect once a period of two months has elapsed, subject to having previously informed the i

- a Commission that it intends to do so (see Lorenz (Gebr) GmbH v Germany Case 120/73 [1973] ECR 1471 (para 6) and Germany v EC Commission Case 84/82 [1984] ECR I-1451 (para 11)).

b 63. It is common ground that the Italian authorities did not inform the Commission of their intention to pay the aid. The intervener cannot claim that it did not grant an 'extension' of the period to the Commission, since such a mechanism is not provided for by art 6(6) of Decision 2496/96. Likewise, although the Commission, which had received notification on 25 February 1999, did not initiate the formal procedure until 3 June 1999, or three months and nine days later, that period, during which the Italian authorities did not contact the Commission according to the procedures laid down in the above-mentioned provision, does not in the circumstances of the case appear excessive. In any event, it does not follow from the wording of art 6(6) of Decision 2496/96 that a formal procedure initiated more than two months after notification would for that reason be vitiated by nullity.

c 64. Ferriere cannot therefore validly maintain that the contested decision is unlawful owing to the belated initiation of the formal procedure.

d 65. As regards the time which the Commission took to adopt the contested decision, art 7(6) of Regulation 659/1999, cited at para 4, above, which is applicable to the aid measure in question, provides that the Commission is as far as possible to endeavour to adopt a decision within 18 months from the opening of the procedure and that that period may be extended by common agreement between the Commission and the member state concerned.

e 66. In the present case, that period applies to the procedure which followed the second notification, made under the EC Treaty, and not, as the applicant contends, to the procedure which followed the first notification, made under the ECSC Treaty.

f 67. Admittedly, the contested decision refers to both treaties, mentions the first notification, effected on 25 February 1999 under the ECSC Treaty and, in art 3, declares that the procedure initiated following that notification is closed. However, that first notification was withdrawn, as regards the planned ECSC aid which it mentions, on 25 July 2000, by the second notification. That second notification, which replaced the preceding notification, confirmed that the Commission was being requested to examine the impugned planned aid, this time by reference to the EC Treaty. On that point, the Italian authorities explained at the hearing the problems of characterisation which arise in the case of intervention in favour of steel undertakings such as the applicant, which operate within the sphere of both treaties. Furthermore, the assessment of the time which elapsed with effect from the first decision initiating the formal procedure, taken on 3 June 1999, should be made in the light of Decision 2496/96, which, however, does not specify a period within which a decision must be adopted following the opening of a formal procedure.

g 68. Consequently, it is with effect from the decision to open the formal procedure adopted on 14 August 2000, which followed the second notification of the planned aid, based on the EC Treaty, that the duration of that procedure must be assessed, in the light of the requirements of Regulation 659/1999.

i 69. As the Commission adopted the contested decision on 28 March 2001, or seven months and 14 days after initiating the formal procedure, the period of 18 months referred to at para 65, above, which is indicative and can be extended, was complied with. The applicant is therefore not justified in maintaining that the Commission exceeded the periods laid down for adopting the contested decision. In any event, even on the assumption that the date initiating the formal procedure, namely 3 June 1999, were to be taken into consideration, the duration of the procedure would be a little under 22 months, which would not mean that the indicative period of 18 months mentioned above was unreasonably exceeded (see Regione Siciliana v European Commission Case T-190/00 (2003) Transcript (judgment), 27 November (para 139)).

70. Nor does it appear that the Commission failed to fulfil its duty of loyal co-operation with the Italian Republic, in the circumstances of the present case, characterised by the fact that the undertaking engaged in two categories of activities and maintained a single set of accounts, that two successive notifications were submitted, under the ECSC Treaty and then under the EC Treaty, and that the Commission was required to ascertain the exact nature—ECSC or EC—of the activity benefiting from the aid. Article 3 of the contested decision, which declares that the procedure initiated following the notification made under the ECSC Treaty is closed, is limited, in that context, to drawing the necessary formal conclusion from the procedure initiated on 3 June 1999.

71. It follows from the foregoing that Ferriere cannot validly maintain that the Commission failed to observe the procedural time limits. The second plea must therefore be rejected.

Third plea: failure to observe the rights of the defence

—Arguments of the parties

72. Ferriere maintains that the Commission failed to observe the rights of the defence in applying the successive guidelines on state aid for environmental protection. After initiating the formal procedure in accordance with the 1994 guidelines, it adopted the contested decision on the basis of the 2001 guidelines, without inviting the Italian Republic and interested parties to submit their comments in respect of the new guidelines.

73. The Commission claims that, in the procedure involving the examination of state aid, the only party with rights of defence is the member state, to which the decisions are addressed. The defendant further states that the applicant was informed of the opening of the formal examination procedures, that it twice submitted comments which were taken into account and that it could have submitted new comments following publication of the 2001 guidelines. Furthermore, the criteria for assessment remained substantially unaltered when the new guidelines were published.

—Findings of the court

74. It should first of all be noted that Ferriere's plea must be examined not from the point of view of the rights of the defence, which only the states enjoy in state aid matters, but in consideration of the right which, pursuant to art 88(2) EC, the 'parties concerned' have to submit comments during the review stage referred to in that provision (see Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v European Commission Joined cases T-228/99 and T-233/99 [2003] ECR II-435 (paras 122–125)).

75. It is common ground that, when the 2001 guidelines were published, the parties concerned had already produced their comments, in consideration of the 1994 guidelines. It follows from the 2001 guidelines, and in particular from the introduction thereto, that they are intended to follow on from the 1994 guidelines and define the Commission's new approach in the light of both

- a* national and international developments in the concepts, regulations and policies relating to environmental protection. On the assumption that the Commission, as it considered it was entitled to do, could lawfully apply the new guidelines when it adopted the contested decision—a question which will be examined at paras 134–140, below—it would not have been able, without disregarding the procedural rights of the parties concerned, to have
- b* based its decision on new principles introduced by the 2001 guidelines without inviting the parties concerned to submit their comments in that regard.

76. It follows from the contested decision that the Commission declared the aid incompatible with the common market on two types of grounds, namely that the main reason for the investment was economic (see recital (31)), the advantages in environmental terms being marginal consequences of that investment (see recital (33)), and that the extra investment cost incurred in order to meet environmental objectives could not be isolated (see recital (32)).

- c*
- d* 77. The principles laid down by the two sets of guidelines are, in the light of those grounds, substantially identical, as the Commission stated at recital (31) (footnote (3)) to the contested decision. Like the 1994 guidelines, the 2001 guidelines provide that investment aimed at protecting the environment is eligible (see point 3.2.1 of the 1994 guidelines and point 36 of the 2001 guidelines, cited at paras 6, 10, above respectively), the 1994 guidelines expressly precluding the grant of aid ostensibly intended for environmental protection measures but in fact for general investment. Both sets of guidelines also contain the same method of calculating the cost eligible for aid (see point
- e* 3.2.1 of the 1994 guidelines and point 37, cited at para 11, above, of the 2001 guidelines).

78. The applicant claimed at the hearing that the deletion of certain details in the 2001 guidelines is not inconsequential, particularly as regards the new plant for which, it contends, the 1994 guidelines permitted aid to be granted provided that the plant had a positive impact on the environment. On that

f point, Ferriere maintains in its written submissions that, since the 1994 guidelines, at point 3.2.1, excluded, in the case of new or replacement investment, the cost of basic investment intended to create or replace production capacity without improving environmental performance, that meant, a contrario, that aid could be granted for new plant having a positive impact for environmental protection.

- g* 79. In reality, however, the applicant's observations concern the determination, envisaged at point 3.2.1 of the 1994 guidelines, of the 'eligible costs' qualifying for an aid measure, which must be 'strictly confined to the extra investment costs necessary to meet environmental objectives'. The guidelines, cited at para 6, above stated that '[t]hus, in the case of new or
- h* replacement plant, the cost of the basic investment involved merely to create or replace production capacity without improving environmental performance is not eligible'. The terms of the 2001 guidelines cannot therefore be regarded as containing an amendment to the previous provisions. In effect, whether the investment concerns new plant or old plant, only the extra cost associated with environmental protection can benefit from an aid measure; and although the
- i* 2001 guidelines do not contain the same stipulation as the 1994 guidelines, that same condition of eligibility for aid remains applicable.

80. It therefore appears that the Commission did not derive from the new guidelines any principles or criteria for assessment which would have altered its analysis of the notified aid. In those circumstances, it was not required to consult the parties concerned again. The applicant was able to submit its comments, which are summarised in recitals (13) to (16) of the contested decision, on the principles and assessment criteria, substantially identical in both sets of guidelines, which led the Commission to declare the aid incompatible with the common market. a

81. The Commission did not therefore base its decision on grounds on which the applicant was unable to make known its comments and, accordingly, did not infringe art 88(2) EC. b

82. Ferriere cannot therefore validly maintain that there was a breach of the rights of the defence, understood here as the procedural rights which art 88(2) EC recognises to the 'parties concerned'. Consequently, the third plea must be rejected. c

Fourth plea: breach of the principle of protection of legitimate expectations

—Arguments of the parties

83. Ferriere maintains that the Commission failed to provide the protection which ought to be given to a legitimate expectation of a procedural nature. Since the Commission never asked the Italian authorities or the applicant to produce documents establishing the environmental objective of the investment, it could not lawfully state in its decision that no documents had been provided to it in that regard. d

84. The Italian Republic submits that the Commission's criticism in the decision that proof of the environmental purpose of the investment was not provided fails to observe the rules on the burden of proof, since in a procedure involving a review of compatibility with the Treaty and not a procedure for the approval of aid, the burden of proof was borne by the Commission. e

85. The Commission contends that it did not breach the principle of protection of legitimate expectations and that the Italian government and the undertaking were clearly invited by the decisions initiating the formal procedure to adduce evidence of the environmental objective of the investment. f

—Findings of the court

86. This plea consists of two parts, concerning, first, the elements which the Commission should have requested from the parties concerned and, second, the rules on proof. g

87. First, Ferriere criticises the Commission for not having asked it or the Italian Republic to provide documentation relating to the environmental purpose of the investment, then for having stated in its decision that no evidence on that point had been provided (see recital (30)).

88. The principle of protection of legitimate expectations on which the applicant relies means that in carrying out the procedure involving review of state aid, the Commission must take account of the legitimate expectations which the parties concerned may entertain as a result of what was said in the decision opening the procedure (see ESF Elbe-Stahlwerke Feralpi GmbH v European Commission Case T-6/99 [2001] ECR II-1523 (para 126)) and, subsequently, that it does not base its final decision on the absence of elements which, in the light of those indications, the parties concerned were unable to consider that they must provide to it. h

89. It is apparent from the decision of 3 June 1999 initiating the formal procedure, referred to at para 20, above, that the Commission stated in that decision that it had doubts that the principal objective of the investment was i

- a environmental protection, that it considered at that stage that its effect in that regard would be very limited and that the alleged advantages for environmental protection seemed to it to be more connected with the protection of the workers, which did not come under either the code on aid to the steel industry or the 1994 guidelines. The Commission also pointed out that the decision to make the necessary investments for economic reasons
- b owing to the age of the plant was not eligible for aid.

90. In the decision of 14 August 2000 initiating the formal procedure, referred to at para 24, above, the Commission gave an indication of its initial assessment of the investment from the point of view of environmental protection. It stated that the Italian authorities had not proved that the acquisition of the rolling line had as its main objective to improve environmental protection or c the working conditions of the workforce and that it appeared to the Commission, on the contrary, that Ferriere had essentially sought to replace or increase its production capacity by acquiring very productive equipment. The Commission concluded that at that stage of its review the effects of the investment on working conditions and the environment appeared to constitute d only very marginal consequences of the investment.

91. Such reiterated information was sufficiently clear and precise for the Italian authorities and the applicant to consider that they were being invited to provide all the relevant evidence capable of showing that the investment had a principally environmental objective. Ferriere's complaint alleging breach of a legitimate expectation of a procedural nature cannot therefore be upheld.

e 92. Second, Ferriere claims that the Commission based its decision on presumptions without carrying out the specific checks which it was required to do. The Italian Republic further claims that proof of the non-environmental objective of the investment had to be adduced by the Commission and that the decision reverses the burden of proof.

f 93. When the Commission decides to initiate the formal procedure, it is for the member state and the potential recipient of the aid to put forward the arguments whereby they seek to show that the planned aid corresponds to the exceptions provided for in application of the Treaty, since the object of the formal procedure is specifically to ensure that the Commission is fully informed of all the facts of the case (see, to that effect, Germany v Commission, cited above (para 13)).

g 94. Although the Commission is required to express its doubts clearly as to the compatibility of the aid with the common market when it opens a formal procedure in order to allow the member state and other parties concerned to respond as fully as possible, the fact remains that it is for the applicant for the aid to dispel those doubts and to establish that its investment satisfies

h the condition on which it may be granted (see, to that effect, France v European Commission Case C-17/99 [2001] ECR I-2481 (paras 41, 45–49)). It was therefore for the Italian Republic and Ferriere to establish that the investment in question was eligible for aid for environmental protection and, in particular, that it had the environmental objective required by the two sets of guidelines applicable in turn (see, to that effect, Spain v EC Commission Joined cases C-278–280/92 [1994] ECR I-4103 (para 49) and Spain v European Commission Case C-113/00 [2002] ECR I-7601 (para 70)).

i 95. It is apparent from the case file and, in particular, from the contested decision that the Commission, which had expressed its doubts as to the compatibility of the aid with the common market and received the comments of the interested third parties and the Italian Republic on the project in question, carried out a precise and properly reasoned analysis of the evidence submitted to it, at recitals (23) to (36) to the decision, as it was required to do. a

96. It follows from the foregoing that Ferriere cannot validly maintain that the Commission failed to observe the principle of protection of legitimate expectations during the administrative procedure. The fourth plea must therefore be rejected. b

Fifth plea: breach of the principle of sound administration

—Arguments of the parties

97. Ferriere maintains that the Commission failed to respect the principle of sound administration, by erring in its quest for the relevant legal basis—the ECSC Treaty and then the EC Treaty—and by embarking on a formal procedure in respect of a measure applying an authorised scheme. c

98. The Commission claims that it did not fail to respect the principle of sound administration. As two notifications were submitted to it, on the basis of the ECSC Treaty and then on the basis of the EC Treaty, it was required, in a case involving a steel undertaking which did not keep separate accounts, to examine the aid from the aspect of both Treaties. d

—Findings of the court

99. It is apparent from the case file that Ferriere is a steel undertaking manufacturing products which in some cases come under the ECSC Treaty and in others the EC Treaty; that the Italian authorities first notified the aid in question under the ECSC Treaty; that during the administrative procedure the Italian Republic and Ferriere then stated that welded steel mesh (to be manufactured in the rolling line for which the investment was planned) was not an ECSC product but an EC product; and that a new notification was made under the EC Treaty. In that regard, the intervener explained at the hearing that it was difficult to determine the relevant legal framework in the case of undertakings whose activities are covered by both Treaties. e f

100. Furthermore, in the case of a steel undertaking which, like Ferriere, does not keep separate accounts, the Commission was correct to ascertain that the aid in question would not be diverted to the ECSC activities (see the Feralpi case, cited above (paras 74, 125)).

101. In those circumstances, the Commission cannot be imputed with alleged procedural errors, when it was not immediately certain whether the investment related to the ECSC Treaty or the EC Treaty; when the planned aid was notified to it successively under each of the two Treaties; and when in any event it was required to ascertain that the aid was not likely to benefit activities other than those in respect of which it would be granted. The Commission's need to ascertain the legal basis on which to found its decision clearly cannot constitute a breach of the principle of sound administration. g h

102. Furthermore, from a strictly procedural point of view, the fact of embarking upon two formal procedures does not in this case disclose a failure to observe the principle of sound administration when, as stated in response to the first plea (paras 50, 54, 57, above), both of those procedures were lawfully opened following the notifications submitted by the Italian authorities. As regards Ferriere's argument concerning breach of the principle of sound administration owing to the opening of a formal procedure when the case involved a measure for the application of an approved scheme, that goes to the substantive question, which is whether, as the applicant maintains, the aid i a measure in question constituted such a measure, and it will be examined together with the first substantive plea (see paras 116–128, below).

103. It follows from the foregoing that Ferriere cannot validly maintain that the Commission failed to observe the principle of sound administration. The fifth plea must therefore be rejected.

b Sixth plea: breach of the obligation to state reasons

—Arguments of the parties

104. Ferriere maintains that the Commission did not sufficiently state the reasons for its decision by merely stating, at recital (30) (footnote (1)), that no specific legal limits existed for the type of plant concerned.

c 105. The Commission states that it could not rely on any grounds other than that it had found that no standards existed.

—Findings of the court

d 106. It is settled case law that the obligation to provide a statement of reasons laid down in art 253 EC (formerly art 190 of the EC Treaty) is an essential procedural requirement, as distinct from the question whether the reasons given are correct, which goes to the substantive legality of the contested measure. The statement of reasons must be appropriate to the act at issue and must disclose in a clear and unequivocal fashion the reasoning followed by the institution which adopted the measure in question in such a way as to enable the persons concerned to ascertain the reasons for the measure and to enable the competent court to exercise its power of review. The question whether the statement of reasons meets the requirements of art 253 EC must be assessed with regard not only to its wording but also to its context and to all the legal rules governing the matter in question (see Société française de Biscuits Delacre v EC Commission Case C-350/88 [1990] ECR I-395 (paras 15, 16) and Spain v European Commission Case C-114/00 [2002] ECR I-7657 (paras 62, 63)).

f 107. In the light of that case law, it does not appear that the Commission failed in the present case to fulfil its obligation to provide a sufficient statement of the reasons for the contested decision.

g 108. The contested decision cites, at recital (1) (footnote (3)), art 15(1) of Regional Law No 47 of 3 June 1978, as amended (cited at para 13, above), which provides that aid may be granted to investments made by industrial undertakings which adapt their processes or plant to new standards fixed by the legislation applicable to the sector. The contested decision refers at recital (14) to the applicant's observations concerning the existence of mandatory limit values with which its plant complies and states in that regard, at recital (30) (footnote (1)), that, contrary to the company's contentions, no specific legal limits are prescribed for this kind of plant. The reason based on the absence of binding norms applicable to Ferriere's plant is clearly stated in a legal and factual context which enabled the applicant to grasp its meaning.

h 109. Ferriere cannot therefore validly maintain that the contested decision is vitiated by a failure to state reasons. Consequently, the sixth plea must be rejected.

i 110. It follows from the foregoing that the six pleas relating to the procedure must be rejected in their entirety.

Substance

111. In support of its action, Ferriere develops substantive pleas of three types, alleging, first, that its investment constitutes a measure implementing an approved scheme and not new aid; second, that the contested decision should have been adopted on the basis of the 1994 guidelines and not the 2001 guidelines; and, third, that its investment pursues an environmental objective which renders it eligible on that basis for aid for environmental protection.

First plea: Ferriere's investment constitutes a measure implementing an approved scheme and not new aid

—Arguments of the parties

112. Ferriere maintains that its investment came under the regional scheme approved by the Commission in 1992 and was merely an implementing measure, so that by the contested decision the Commission failed to take account of its own decision authorising the aid.

113. It submits that the Commission misinterpreted the aid scheme approved in 1992, as adaptation to 'standards established by the legislation' does not refer to adaptation to 'mandatory environmental standards' but may be understood as adaptation to purely indicative and therefore non-binding standards. That interpretation corresponds to the philosophy of the 1994 and 2001 guidelines, which include that nature of the aid as an incentive. Furthermore, the 2001 guidelines provide that aid may be authorised for investments carried out in the absence of mandatory standards. In addition, environmental standards concerning polluting emissions or sound nuisance and standards aimed at improving working conditions exist under national or Community provisions and were taken into account in the completion of the applicant's new plant.

114. The Italian Republic maintains that the aid comes under the scheme approved in 1992. In 1998, moreover, the Commission authorised the refinancing of that scheme in terms which show, as is also apparent from the 1994 and 2001 guidelines, that the grant of aid is not subject to the existence of mandatory standards. The Commission therefore misinterpreted the approved scheme.

115. The Commission claims that the aid in question is not compatible with the scheme approved in 1992. That scheme lays down as a condition of eligibility for aid that the investment concerned is aimed at adaptation to new standards in the sector. In the Commission's submission, Ferriere's previous plant satisfied the existing standards and the new plant has no connection with the entering into force of new standards. The standards to which the applicant refers are neither new nor binding, or indeed are relied on for the first time in the present proceedings. The Commission further states that the improvement of working conditions and hygiene or security measures taken inside the factories are not environmental protection measures.

—Findings of the court

116. The question whether the impugned aid constitutes a measure for the implementation of the scheme approved in 1992 or new aid depends on the interpretation of the provision establishing that scheme, cited at para 13, above, according to which investments intended to introduce improvements from the point of view of the environment or working conditions 'in accordance with the new standards determined by the legislation in the sector' are eligible for aid.

117. It follows from the actual wording of that provision that standards must be applied in the sector in which the candidate for the aid is active, that they must have been recently introduced and that in order to be eligible the investment must bring the plant into conformity with those standards.

a 118. That interpretation is corroborated by the circumstances in which, during the examination of the planned aid scheme, the condition relating to adaptation to new standards was introduced. It follows from two letters from the Commission to the permanent representation of Italy that in the first letter, dated 21 May 1992, the Commission had asked whether, according to b the planned scheme, the grant of the aid was conditional upon conformity with new normative standards and that in the second, dated 9 September 1992, it stated unequivocally that 'the aid [must] have as its objective to facilitate the adaptation of undertakings to new obligations imposed by the public authorities relating to the elimination of pollution'.

c 119. No amendment was made to that scheme, particularly in the case of the condition concerning adaptation to new standards, when the Commission, by letter of 18 September 1998, gave its approval to the refinancing of the scheme approved in 1992. The summary of the authorised scheme in that letter cannot be interpreted as an amendment of the scheme. Incidentally, the Italian Republic and the Commission stated in their answers to the questions put by the court, referred to at para 36, above, that the procedure initiated in 1998 was
d aimed merely at the refinancing of the existing scheme and did not affect the content or the scope of that scheme.

120. Ferriere's request, dated 26 March 1997, to the Autonomous Region of Friuli-Venezia Giulia for aid did not mention any standard with which the plant sought to comply. Furthermore, the letter from the Region dated 15 February 1999 attached to the notification submitted by the Italian authorities on e 18 February 1999, referred to at paras 53, 54, above, expressly states that there are no mandatory standards or other legal obligations to which the undertaking would be subjected and further states that the investment, made in order to improve the results from the environmental aspect, goes further than the Community standards. As stated at paras 53, 54, above, moreover, the Italian authorities did not maintain, at the time of the second notification, that f the aid granted to Ferriere constituted a measure implementing the approved scheme.

121. Admittedly, during the administrative procedure, Ferriere, in its letter of 13 November 2000, referred to at para 25, above, made reference, without indicating the legal basis, to 'limit values' prescribed by the legislation in force, explaining that those values also complied with the guidelines in Council
g Directive (EC) 96/61 (concerning integrated pollution prevention and control) (OJ 1996 L257 p 26), which was transposed into domestic law by Legislative Decree No 372 of 4 August 1999, ie at a date later than its application for aid and the notification of February 1999. However, those documents, which do not themselves contain any value in figures, merely make recommendations
h for the issue of authorisation in connection with industrial plant which bears no relation to the aid case in issue here.

122. In its application, Ferriere also referred to Council Directive (EEC) 86/188 (on the protection of workers from the risks related to exposure to noise at work) (OJ 1986 L137 p 28), implemented in Italy by Legislative Decree No 277 of 15 August 1991, and referred in a footnote to various
i measures of Community or national law laying down limit values with which its investment complies. The applicant refers, in Community law, to Council Directive (EEC) 91/689 (on hazardous waste) (OJ 1991 L377 p 20), amended by Council Directive (EC) 94/31 of 27 June 1994 (OJ 1994 L168 p 28) and implemented in Italy by Legislative Decree No 22 of 5 February 1997. The applicant also mentions a number of measures of domestic law, namely Decree

No 203 of the President of the Republic of 24 May 1988 on smoke and dust emissions in the atmosphere, Law No 447 of 26 October 1995 on emissions of noise nuisance outside industrial plant and one of its implementing regulations, Implementing Decree No 675900 of the President of the Council of Ministers of 14 November 1997.

123. However, irrespective of the fact that on the date of the application for aid, 26 March 1997, those requirements were for the most part not new, Ferriere has not identified, either during the administrative procedure or during these proceedings, the standards which, in its submission, were provided for by those provisions and to which its investment was intended to adapt the industrial plant. As that information was not produced and thus could not be taken into consideration in drafting the contested decision, it cannot be relied on to challenge the legality of that decision (see Belgium v EC Commission Case 234/84 [1986] ECR 263 (paras 11, 16)). As regards, moreover, the provisions of Community law on which the applicant relies, first, it is apparent that Directive 86/188 was concerned with the provision of information to and the protection and medical supervision of workers exposed to certain noise levels at their place of work, but does not deal with standards to be complied with by undertakings. Second, there is no indication in the file that Ferriere produces hazardous waste such as that referred to in Directive 91/689 and is therefore affected by the provisions of that directive.

124. Thus, it must be held that Ferriere was not in a position to indicate, either during the administrative procedure or during the present proceedings, the precise new standards, applicable in the sector in which it is active, with which its investment was intended to comply. The arguments based on provisions of Community law or national law, which are not new or which have no connection with the grant of the aid in issue, are inadmissible in part, since they are raised for the first time before the court, and unfounded in part, since they have no connection with the investment in question. The inevitable conclusion is that Ferriere has failed to establish the relationship between its investment and any new standards concerning its sector.

125. Accordingly, there is no need to determine whether the standards referred to by the approved aid scheme are to be understood as mandatory or indicative standards or to ascertain whether any standard introduced after the commissioning in the 1970s of the plant to be replaced should be characterised as aid, as Ferriere maintains, as the applicant has failed to identify any standards whatsoever to which it wished to adapt its plant. Likewise, the argument that the 1994 and 2001 guidelines would allow aid to be granted, by way of incentive, in the absence of mandatory standards or in circumstances where the investment goes beyond the standards to be complied with is of no relevance here, since the provision establishing the approved scheme requires that, in order to be eligible for aid, the investment must be aimed at the adaptation of the plant to new standards which apply to the sector.

126. It follows from the foregoing that the Commission was correct to consider that the impugned aid could not be regarded as a measure implementing the approved scheme but was a new measure.

127. It follows, moreover, that Ferriere's argument, referred to at para 102, above, that the Commission infringed the principle of sound administration by initiating a formal procedure in respect of a measure implementing an approved scheme cannot be upheld either.

128. The first substantive plea must therefore be rejected.

a Second substantive plea: the contested decision should have been adopted in the light of the 1994 guidelines and not the 2001 guidelines

—Arguments of the parties

b 129. Ferriere claims that its investment should have been examined in the light of the 1994 guidelines. It submits that the contested decision has an incorrect legal basis. The aid should have been evaluated on the basis of the criteria set out in the 1994 guidelines and not by reference to those in the 2001 guidelines. The Commission also failed to observe the principle of protection of legitimate expectations on that point.

c 130. The applicant submits that, as interpreted by the Commission, point 82 of the 2001 guidelines (cited at para 12, above) is illegal. The new guidelines could be applied to aid which had already been notified only in so far as a formal procedure had not yet been initiated in respect of that aid.

131. The Italian Republic claims that the aid should have been evaluated in the light of the 1994 guidelines, which were in force when it was granted, on 8 October 1998, and not according to the law in force at the time of adoption of the contested decision.

d 132. The Commission contends that the planned aid was incompatible with the common market in the light of the 2001 guidelines and that it could not have been authorised under the 1994 guidelines either.

e 133. It further claims that the objection of illegality in respect of point 82 of the 2001 guidelines was not raised in the application that it is therefore inadmissible under art 48(2) of the Rules of Procedure of the Court of First Instance. In any event, point 82 merely provides for the immediate application of the new system in accordance with the general principles of the application of the law ratione temporis, which does not breach the principle of protection of legitimate expectations.

f —Findings of the court

g 134. The compatibility with the common market of planned aid aimed at environmental protection is assessed in accordance with the combined provisions of art 6 EC (formerly art 3c of the EC Treaty) and art 87 EC and by reference to the Community guidelines which the Commission has previously adopted for the purposes of such an examination. The Commission is bound by the guidelines and notices that it issues in the area of supervision of state aid where they do not depart from the rules in the Treaty and are accepted by the member states (see Spain v European Commission Case C-351/98 [2002] ECR I-8031 (para 53)). The parties concerned are therefore entitled to rely on those guidelines and the court will ascertain whether the Commission complied with the rules it has itself laid down when it adopted the contested decision (see Keller SpA v European Commission Case T-35/99 [2002] ECR II-261 (paras 74, 77)).

h 135. In the present case, it must first of all be determined what Community guidelines on state aid in relation to environmental protection the Commission was required to apply when adopting its decision.

i 136. The objection of illegality expressly raised in the reply is admissible, contrary to the Commission's contention, since it constitutes the expansion, in paras 12–18 of the reply, of a plea raised by implication in para 54 of the application (see, to that effect, Thai Bicycle Industry & Co Ltd v EU Council Case T-118/96 [1998] ECR II-2991 (para 142)).

137. It follows from points 81 and 82 of the 2001 guidelines (see para 12, above) that those guidelines entered into force on the date on which they were published, on 3 February 2001, and that the Commission was then required to apply them to all notified aid projects, even where they were notified prior to the publication of the guidelines. Contrary to the applicant's interpretation, the immediate application of the new guidelines is not subject to any reservation, and therefore does not preclude a case, such as this, in which a formal procedure has been initiated.

138. First, what is stated at points 81 and 82, which are inspired by art 254(2) EC (formerly art 191(2) of the EC Treaty) on the entry into force of regulations and directives of the Council and of the Commission, proceeds from the principle that, subject to derogations, acts of the institutions are immediately applicable (see Licata v Economic and Social Committee Case 270/84 [1986] ECR 2305 (para 31) and Saldanha v Hiross Holding AG Case C-122/96 [1998] All ER (EC) 238, [1997] ECR I-5325 (paras 12–14)).

139. Second, the principle of protection of legitimate expectations cannot be usefully invoked here, since, like the principle of legal certainty, it concerns situations existing before the entry into force of new provisions (see Firma GruSa Fleisch GmbH & Co KG, Import-Export v Hauptzollamt Hamburg-Jonas Case C-34/92 [1993] ECR I-4147 (para 22)). Ferriere is not in such a situation, but in the temporary situation in which a member state has notified a new aid project to the Commission and requested that it examine the compatibility of the aid with the Community rules, the grant of the aid being dependent on the outcome of that examination. Furthermore, and in any event, since the two successive sets of guidelines were essentially identical, as previously stated (see para 77, above), the applicant's legitimate expectation cannot have been affected.

140. Consequently, the contested decision was adopted legally in application of the 2001 guidelines, which entered into force on 3 February 2001.

Third plea: Ferriere's investment pursued an environmental objective which rendered it eligible on that basis for aid for environmental protection

—Arguments of the parties

141. Ferriere maintains that its investment was eligible for aid for environmental protection. It meets the objectives of the Community policy on the environment set out in art 174 EC and satisfies the requirements of the Community directives and recommendations. The investment entails, in particular, improvements from the point of view of atmospheric pollution, the elimination of hazardous waste, noise nuisance and working conditions, the last two of which are expressly mentioned in the provision establishing the approved scheme.

142. The applicant also claims that it was possible to isolate from the total cost the cost corresponding to environmental protection, which the region evaluated at ITL 11,000m out of a total investment of ITL 20,000m.

143. The Commission failed to take account of the environmental purpose of the project and considered, arbitrarily, that the purpose of the investment was predominantly economic, whereas the objective of the new process was specifically to make the production system ecological. While it is logical that a new plant should be more economically efficient than an old one, the former rolling line was still perfectly satisfactory in functional and technological terms and was replaced by innovative equipment in order to eliminate the disadvantages which the old process represented for the environment.

a 144. The Italian Republic claims that the investment in question was determined principally on grounds linked with environmental protection.

b 145. The Commission contends that the aid was not justified in the present case, since the investment would have been made in any event for reasons unconnected with environmental protection; the reduction in nuisance and pollution was the necessary and intrinsic consequence of a predominant and inescapable economic and technological choice. Nor is it possible to isolate the additional costs associated with the environmental aspect. In addition, the documents produced for the first time at the stage of the reply, on the assumption that they are admissible, cannot have an impact on the legality of the contested decision, which was adopted in the light of the matters which came to its knowledge during the administrative procedure.

c —Findings of the court

d 146. The Commission declared the aid incompatible for the reasons stated at para 30, above, namely that the investment, which was intended to replace old equipment by an innovative plant, was not based on environmental objectives but was being done for economic and industrial purposes, which precluded the grant of aid for environmental protection. It further considered that the advantages for environmental protection were inherent in the process, which did not make it possible to isolate from the total cost of the investment the part corresponding to environmental protection (see recitals (29) and (31) to (33) to the decision).

e 147. The benefit of the Community provisions on state aid for environmental protection depends on the purpose of the investment in respect of which aid is sought. Thus the 2001 guidelines (points 36 and 37, cited at paras 10, 11, above), which are identical in that regard to the 1994 guidelines (point 3.2.1, cited at para 6, above), mention investments intended to reduce or eliminate pollution or nuisances, or to adapt production methods, and state that only the additional investment cost linked with environmental protection is eligible for aid. The eligibility for aid for environmental protection of an investment which meets, inter alia, economic considerations assumes that those considerations are not in themselves sufficient to justify the investment in the form chosen.

g 148. It follows from the scheme of the 2001 guidelines, which is identical in that regard to the scheme of the 1994 guidelines, that any investment which adapts plant to standards, whether mandatory or not, national or Community, which exceeds such standards or which is carried out in the absence of any standards is not eligible for aid, but only investment whose very object is that environmental performance.

h 149. The Commission was therefore entitled to declare the project incompatible with the common market in so far as it did not satisfy that requirement.

i 150. It is therefore irrelevant that the applicant maintains that its investment brings improvements from the point of view of environmental protection, as is the fact that the contested decision recognises the advantages of the investment from the point of view of environmental protection or of the health and safety of workers.

151. Admittedly, it is possible that a project should have an objective of improving economic productivity and at the same time an objective of environmental protection, but the existence of the second objective cannot be inferred from the mere finding that the new equipment has a less negative impact on the environment than the old equipment, which may be merely a collateral effect of a change in technology for economic purposes or of the renewal of used equipment. In order that a partially environmental object of the assisted investment may be accepted in such a case, it is necessary to establish that the same economic performance could have been obtained by using less costly, but more environmentally harmful, equipment. a

152. The outcome of the dispute therefore does not depend on whether the investment brings environmental improvements or whether it goes beyond existing environmental standards, but, primarily, on whether it was carried out in order to bring such improvements. b

153. On this point, the applicant maintains that the objective of the new process was to render the production system ecological, as explained in detail in annexes B and C to its request for aid dated 26 March 1997. Those documents confirm the technological advance represented by the new, fully-automated process for the production of welded steel mesh, which has the consequences of reducing noise from the plant and eliminating dust emissions. They therefore confirm the interest of such a plant from an economic and industrial point of view, an interest which suffices to justify the decision to make the investment. c

154. Ferriere also claims that its previous plant was still operating perfectly satisfactorily when it decided to replace it in order to acquire an innovative technique eliminating the environmental disadvantages of the old process. In that regard, the documents produced for the first time with the reply, which were therefore not communicated to the Commission during the administrative procedure, can have no impact on the lawfulness of the contested decision (see Belgium v Commission (para 16)). Incidentally, those documents show at the most that as early as 1993–1994 the undertaking was planning to acquire a new innovative plant. Furthermore, the fact, which seems to be accepted by the Commission at recital (29) to the contested decision, that the new rolling line did not entail an increase in production capacity does not establish the environmental objective of the investment. d

155. It is apparent, in short, that Ferriere had equipment more than 25 years old which it wished to replace by a new plant using a technologically innovative process incorporating the performance for environmental protection of any modern equipment. The inevitable conclusion is that the investment follows on from a decision of the undertaking to modernise its production equipment and that it would in any event have been made in that form. e

156. Consequently, the Commission did not make an error of assessment in taking the view that it was not established that the investment had a genuinely environmental purpose. The Commission was entitled to consider that the advantages of the investment for environmental protection were inherent in that innovative plant. Furthermore, the analysis of the advantages of the investment from the point of view of working conditions is not in contradiction with the grounds of which the applicant complains, since according to point 6 of the 2001 guidelines actions aimed at safety and hygiene are not covered by those guidelines. g

157. Second, apart from finding that the investment had no environmental purpose, the contested decision states that the cost of the investment intended to protect the environment could not be isolated from the total cost of the operation. That ground of the contested decision is not superfluous, since if the project chosen entailed an additional cost by comparison with a different, h a hypothetical, project offering the same economic performance in less environmentally favourable conditions, it might be inferred that the investment had an environmental object (see para 151, above).

b 158. On that point, Ferriere claims that the environmental part of its investment corresponds to the part of the total costs of the investment which was recognised by the Autonomous Region of Friuli-Venezia Giulia as eligible for aid, namely ITL 11,000m (€5.68m).

c 159. When invited in a written question put by the court, referred to at para 35, above, to specify the evidence on the basis of which the additional investment cost of environmental protection could be evaluated at ITL 11,000m of the ITL 20,000m representing the total cost of the investment, Ferriere merely referred to the assessment made by the region. At the hearing, the applicant acknowledged that it was difficult to draw distinctions in the case of a process which in itself improves environmental protection and it indicated that the region had excluded general expenditure.

d 160. The letters from Ferriere to the region, dated 26 May and 26 June 1998, which are on the file and which present the detailed budget of the investment broken down into its various components, do not answer the question. The court has been given no further explanation which would enable it to understand the method followed and to conclude that the ITL 11,000m correspond to the environmental cost of the investment. While it is possible to understand the difficulty in isolating the cost in a case such as this where the advantages for the environment are inherent in the process, the principles laid e down in the 2001 guidelines, which are similar to those in the 1994 guidelines, preclude the total cost of an investment from being eligible for aid and require that the additional costs involved in attaining the objective of protecting the environment be identified.

f 161. However, neither the applicant nor the Italian Republic has provided any explanation on that point. In particular, they have not indicated the procedure followed by the Autonomous Region of Friuli-Venezia Giulia in arriving at a determination of the amount of the investment eligible for aid.

162. Consequently, the Commission could lawfully consider in the contested decision that it was not possible to isolate in the investment the expenditure specifically intended for environmental protection.

g 163. Accordingly, the Commission was entitled to consider that Ferriere's investment was not eligible for aid for environmental protection.

h 164. It follows from all of the foregoing that the Commission could lawfully declare the aid incompatible with the common market. Ferriere and the Italian Republic are therefore not entitled to request annulment of the contested decision. The submissions seeking annulment of that decision must therefore be rejected.

THE APPLICATION FOR COMPENSATION FOR THE ALLEGED HARM

Arguments of the parties

i 165. Ferriere maintains that it suffered harm owing to the illegality of the contested decision, which impairs freedom of economic initiative and the right of property, to the initiation of the formal procedure and to the time taken to close it. As it was unable to have the aid which the region was prepared to grant it, it was required to borrow in order to finance the investment and was deprived of the possibility of using the amount advanced for other purposes.

166. The applicant claims compensation for the period during which it was unable to have the aid. The compensation should correspond to an amount allowing it to pay the statutory interest and compensation for monetary devaluation and should be calculated as from 26 April 1999, which corresponds to the end of the two-month period following receipt of the notification, on 25 February 1999, and is the date on which the Commission should have recognised that the aid was compatible with the common market.

167. The Commission contends that the conditions for engaging liability are not met. Among the fundamental rights, only those which protect legal certainty and legitimate expectations are in theory capable of being included in the category of rules whose breach may render the institutions liable. Furthermore, the serious and manifest nature of the breach is in any event absent in the present case. Last, the applicant does not show the alleged interference with freedom of economic initiative and the right to property.

168. The Commission further contends that the alleged harm is neither certain nor determinable, as undertakings do not have a right to receive state aid, still less at a fixed date. Even on the assumption that the aid did come under an authorised scheme, the delay in paying it would not be imputable to the Commission but to the Italian authorities, who chose to notify the aid and then to suspend payment thereof. The claim for default interest is unfounded as regards reparation of harm. Last, as regards monetary depreciation, actual damage is not made out.

Findings of the court

169. Ferriere's claim for compensation, submitted on the basis of arts 235 and 288 EC, seeks to establish the non-contractual liability of the Community owing to the harm allegedly caused to it as a result of the unlawfulness of the contested decision.

170. According to established case law, in order for the Community to incur non-contractual liability, the applicant must prove the unlawfulness of the alleged conduct of the institution concerned, actual damage and the existence of a causal link between that conduct and the damage pleaded (see Oleifici Mediterranei (SA) v European Economic Community Case 26/81 [1982] ECR 3057 (para 16) and Scan Office Design SA v European Commission Case T-40/01 [2002] ECR II-5043 (para 18)). If any one of those conditions is not satisfied, the action must be dismissed in its entirety and it is unnecessary to consider the other conditions for non-contractual liability (see Koinopraxia Enoseon Georgikon Synetairismon Diacheiriseos Enchorion Proionton Syn PE v European Commission Case C-146/91 [1994] ECR I-4199 (paras 19, 81) and Förde-Reederei GmbH v EU Council Case T-170/00 [2002] ECR II-515 (para 37)).

171. As the first condition of the which Community's non-contractual liability within the meaning of the second paragraph of art 288 EC, relating to the unlawfulness of the contested measure, is not fulfilled, the claim for compensation must be rejected in its entirety and there is no need to examine the other conditions of that liability, namely actual damage and the existence of a causal link between the Commission's conduct and the damage pleaded.

172. It follows from all the foregoing that the application must be dismissed in its entirety.

COSTS

173. Under art 87(2) of the Rules of Procedure, the unsuccessful party is to be ordered to pay the costs if these have been applied for in the successful a party's pleadings. Furthermore, art 87(4) of the Rules of Procedure provides that the member states are to bear their own costs when they have intervened in the proceedings.

174. Since the applicant has been unsuccessful, it must be ordered to bear its own costs and to pay those incurred by the Commission.

b 175. In accordance with art 87(4) of the Rules of Procedure, the Italian Republic must be ordered to bear its own costs.

On those grounds, the Court of First Instance (Fourth Chamber, Extended Composition) hereby:

- (1) Dismisses the action;
- c* (2) Orders the applicant to bear its own costs and to pay those incurred by the Commission;
- (3) Orders the Italian Republic to bear its own costs.

Valmont Nederland BV v European Commission<sup>a</sup>

(Case T-274/01)

COURT OF FIRST INSTANCE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (FOURTH CHAMBER, EXTENDED COMPOSITION)<sup>b</sup>

JUDGES LEGAL (PRESIDENT), TIILI, MEIJ, VILARAS AND FORWOOD

19 FEBRUARY, 16 SEPTEMBER 2004

European Community – Commission – Decision – Annulment – Evidential basis for decision – Sale of land by public body to private undertaking – Member state providing Commission with expert report concerning commercial value of land at material time – Further information arising from report requested by Commission but not provided by member state – Member state subsequently providing Commission with second expert report together with explanation of discrepancies between reports – Commission adopting decision declaring land transaction as state aid – Decision based on first report – Whether decision having proper evidential basis – Commission Decision (EC) 2002/142 – Article 87(1) EC (formerly EC Treaty, art 92(1)).<sup>c</sup>

The applicant was successor in title to a company with whom a municipality in the Netherlands had agreed to sell an area of undeveloped land. As a result, articles in the national press claimed that that company had been the recipient of an improper subsidy granted by selling the land at less than commercial value. Before the Commission of the European Communities had opened a formal investigation into the matter, the Netherlands authorities had supplied it with a report produced by an independent expert (the first report), which estimated the commercial value of the land at the material time. Further information arising from that report was requested by the Commission, but none was provided. Once the formal investigation was opened, the Netherlands authorities provided the Commission with: (i) a report from a different independent expert (the second report), which provided a different estimate of the commercial value of the land at the material time; (ii) information from the second expert explaining the discrepancies between the two reports; and (iii) information explaining that, although a car park which had been constructed on part of the land had been financed by the municipality, other undertakings were permitted to use that car park in various ways, free of charge. In due course, Commission Decision (EC) 2002/142 (on the state aid implemented by the Netherlands in favour of Valmont Nederland BV) was adopted, which declared that the land transaction and the construction of the car park contained elements of state aid that were incompatible with the common market within the meaning of art 87(1) EC<sup>d</sup> (formerly art 92(1) of the EC Treaty), and which ordered recovery of that aid from the applicant. In adopting that decision, the Commission had relied upon the report of the first and not the second expert, and it had attributed half of the benefit of the financing of the car park to the applicant. Subsequently, the applicant brought an action before the Court of First Instance of the European Communities seeking annulment of the<sup>e</sup>

<sup>a</sup> Article 87(1) EC, so far as material, is set out at judgment para 1, below

- a decision. It contended: (i) that the Commission had erroneously based itself on the first report (which had been inconsistent and which had arrived at a market price for the land without any rational explanation) and had adopted its conclusion without having conducted a serious examination of it; and (ii) that the Commission had arbitrarily concluded that half of the financing granted by the municipality for the construction of the car park was to be deemed a benefit.

Held – (1) Where the Commission considered that aid had been granted, which had not been notified to it and which was therefore unlawful, it had the power to require the member state concerned to provide it with all the information necessary for its examination. It was only where the member state concerned had failed to provide the information so required that the Commission was empowered to make its decision based on the information available to it. However, in the instant case, the Commission, considering that the information in its possession was insufficient, had requested the information from the Netherlands authorities, but it had not required (by decision, and according to the applicable provisions of Community law) that that information be provided. Therefore, it could not rely on the incomplete nature of the information in its possession to justify the decision. Further, none of the arguments advanced to justify the evidential value of the first report was persuasive. Accordingly, the Commission had misapplied art 87(1) EC inasmuch as it had considered, on the basis of an expert's report devoid of evidential value in that respect, that the sale of the land contained an element of state aid (see judgment paras 55, 59, 60, 70, 89–91, below).

(2) Where a state measure amounted to compensation for services provided by a recipient undertaking in order to discharge public service obligations, such that the undertaking concerned did not enjoy a real financial benefit and was not placed in a more favourable competitive position than undertakings competing with it, the state measure concerned might fall outside of the scope of art 87(1) EC where a number of conditions were satisfied. In the instant case, it had followed from the Commission's own assessments that the applicant bore a burden in allowing others to use its car park in various ways regularly and free of charge, under an agreement concluded in the public interest with a national territory. It was also apparent that a portion of the financing granted by the national authority for the construction of the car park had benefited the applicant. However, the Commission could not, as it had done, automatically consider that that portion of the financing necessarily benefited the applicant without having first examined whether or not that portion of the financing might amount to compensation for the burden borne by the applicant. In so far as the Commission maintained that the requisite conditions had not been satisfied, it was not for the Community judicature to replace the Commission by carrying out an examination in its stead and substituting the conclusions to which the court arrived. It followed that the Commission had failed to establish to the requisite legal standard that half of the financing granted for the construction of the car park was to be classified as state aid. Accordingly, the decision would be annulled in its entirety (see judgment paras 129, 130, 132–134, 136–139, below).

Notes

For grounds for annulment generally, see 51 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) paras 2.45–2.49.

Cases cited

- Altmark Trans GmbH v Nahverkehrsgesellschaft Altmark GmbH* (Oberbundesanwalt beim Bundesverwaltungsgericht, third party) Case C-280/00 [2005] All ER (EC) 610, [2003] ECR I-7747, ECJ.
- Astilleros Zamacona SA v European Commission* Case T-72/98 [2000] ECR II-1683, CFI.
- Belgium v EC Commission* Case 234/84 [1986] ECR 2263, ECJ.
- Belgium v European Commission* Case C-197/99 P [2003] ECR I-8461, ECJ.
- Belgium v European Commission* Case C-56/93 [1996] ECR I-723, ECJ.
- De Gezamenlijke Steenkolenmijnen in Limburg v ECSC High Authority* Case 30/59 [1961] ECR 1, ECJ.
- Département du Loiret v European Commission* Case T-369/00 [2003] ECR II-1795, CFI.
- Diputación Foral de Álava v European Commission* Joined cases T-127/99, T-129/99 and T-148/99 [2002] ECR II-1275, CFI.
- Enirisorse SpA v Ministero delle Finanze* Joined cases C-34–38/01 [2003] ECR I-14243, ECJ.
- Fédération Française des Sociétés d'Assurance (FFSA) v European Commission* Case T-106/95 [1997] ECR II-229, CFI.
- Fédération Nationale du Commerce Extérieur des Produits Alimentaires v France* Case C-354/90 [1991] ECR I-5505, ECJ.
- France v EC Commission* Case C-301/87 [1990] ECR I-307, ECJ.
- France v European Commission* Case C-17/99 [2001] ECR I-2481, ECJ.
- France v Ladbroke Racing Ltd* Case C-83/98 P [2000] ECR I-3271, ECJ.
- Germany v EC Commission* Joined cases C-324/90 and C-342/90 [1994] ECR I-1173, ECJ.
- Italy and SIM 2 Multimedia SpA v European Commission* Joined cases C-328/99 and C-399/00 [2003] ECR I-4035, ECJ.
- Kneissl Dachstein Sportartikel AG v European Commission* Case T-110/97 [1999] ECR II-2881, CFI.
- Kwekerij Gebroeders Van der Kooy BV v EC Commission* Joined cases 67/85, 68/85 and 70/85 [1988] ECR 219, ECJ.
- Linde AG v European Commission* Case T-98/00 [2002] ECR II-3961, CFI.
- Ministère de l'Economie, des Finances et de l'Industrie v GEMO SA* Case C-126/01 [2003] ECR I-13769, ECJ.
- Namur-Les Assurances du Crédit SA v Office National du Ducroire* Case C-44/93 [1994] ECR I-3829, ECJ.
- Salomon SA v European Commission* Case T-123/97 [1999] ECR II-2925, CFI.
- Steinike und Weinlig (Firma) v Germany* Case 78/76 [1977] ECR I-595, ECJ.
- Thyssen Stahl AG v European Commission* Case T-141/94 [1999] ECR II-347, CFI; affd Case C-194/99 P [2003] ECR I-10821, ECJ.

Application

By application lodged on 22 October 2001 at the Registry of the Court of First Instance of the European Communities, Valmont Nederland BV (Valmont), a company incorporated under Netherlands law and established in Maarheeze, North Brabant, Netherlands, brought the present action for the annulment of Commission Decision (EC) 2002/142 (on the state aid implemented by the Netherlands in favour of Valmont Nederland BV). Valmont was represented by A Van Landuyt, A Prompers and G Van de Wal, lawyers. The Commission of the European Communities was represented initially by G Rozet and a H Speyart, and subsequently by G Rozet and H Van Vliet, acting as agents, with an address for service in Luxembourg. The language of the case was Dutch. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

16 September 2004. The COURT OF FIRST INSTANCE (Fourth Chamber, Extended Composition) delivered the following judgment.

b
LEGAL FRAMEWORK

1. Article 87(1) EC (formerly art 92(1) of the EC Treaty) provides that, save as otherwise provided in the Treaty, any aid granted by a member state or through state resources in any form whatsoever which distorts or threatens to distort competition by favouring certain undertakings or the production of certain goods are, in so far as it affects trade between member states, incompatible with the common market.

c 2. Commission Communication 97/C 209/03 on state aid elements in sales of land and buildings by public authorities was published in the Official Journal of the European Communities on 10 July 1997 (OJ 1997 C209 p 3) d (hereinafter the communication on land sales).

3. In point I, that communication states its purpose to be, among other things, to clarify the practice of the Commission of the European Communities regarding the examination of sales of publicly owned land, to reduce the number of transactions to be examined in the light of arts 87 and 88 EC (formerly arts 92 and 93 of the EC Treaty) and, to that end, to provide
e guidance on procedure to the member states.

4. In point II.1, entitled 'Sale through an unconditional bidding procedure', the communication states, in particular, that '[a] sale of land ... following a sufficiently well-publicised, open and unconditional bidding procedure, comparable to an auction, accepting the best or only bid is by definition at market value and consequently does not contain State aid'.
f

5. In point II.2, entitled 'Sale without an unconditional bidding procedure', it states, in particular, as follows:

'If public authorities intend not to use the procedure described under 1, an independent valuation should be carried out by one or more independent asset valuers prior to the sale negotiations in order to establish the market value on the basis of generally accepted market indicators and valuation standards. The market price thus established is the minimum purchase price that can be agreed without granting State aid.'

g 6. In point II.3, entitled 'Notification', the communication on land sales indicates, essentially, that, in order to allow the Commission to establish whether state aid exists, the member states should, without prejudice to the de minimis rule, notify to it any sale that was not concluded on the basis of either h of the procedures described at points II.1 or II.2.

BACKGROUND TO THE DISPUTE

i 7. Valmont Nederland BV (Valmont) is a company incorporated under Netherlands law established in Maarheeze, Netherlands, in Noord-Brabant (North Brabant). It is the successor to Nolte Mastenfabriek BV, which was bought in 1991 by its parent company, Valmont Industries Inc.

8. On 1 July 1993, the municipality of Maarheeze (hereinafter Maarheeze) and Nolte Mastenfabriek BV signed an agreement for the sale by the former and the purchase by the second of some three hectares of undeveloped land intended for industrial purposes. That agreement fixed a sale price excluding VAT of 900,000 Netherlands guilders (NLG), or approximately €408,402. a

9. The transaction was finalised by an authentic deed of sale signed on 8 February 1994. The sale price, excluding VAT, was fixed in accordance with the sale agreement of 1 July 1993, on the basis of NLG 30/m<sup>2</sup> (approximately €13·61/m<sup>2</sup>). b

10. In the spring of 1998, articles in the Netherlands press claimed that certain municipalities in Noord-Brabant had made improper use of subsidies granted by the provincial authorities in order to attract businesses into their region. It was claimed that Maarheeze had been the recipient of one such subsidy and used it in such a way as to enable it to sell land below its commercial value. c

11. By letter of 1 April 1998, the Commission invited the Netherlands authorities to provide it with information on the matter.

12. By letter of 2 July 1998, the Netherlands authorities informed the Commission of their intention to send it an expert's report determining the price of some of the land concerned at the time when it was sold.

13. By letter of 19 January 1999, the Netherlands authorities sent the Commission a copy of a report of 4 December 1998, drawn up for them by an independent expert, Mr Laureijssen, a member of the firm of experts Laureijssen & Brocken (the Laureijssen report). That report, which dealt with two plots of land sold by different municipalities to different undertakings, concluded, with regard to the land sold to Valmont, that the price per square metre should be estimated at NLG 42·50 (approximately €19·29) in 1993. d

14. By letter of 7 November 2000, the Commission notified the Netherlands authorities of its decision to open a formal investigation procedure under art 88(2) EC. It indicated in that decision that the sale of the land, on the one hand, and the subsequent construction of a car park on part of that land, financed by Maarheeze for up to NLG 250,000 (approximately €113,445), on the other, appeared to amount to state aid. Furthermore, it doubted whether it fulfilled the requisite conditions to enable it to be declared compatible with the common market. e

15. By letter of 12 December 2000, the Netherlands authorities transmitted their comments to the Commission, together with the following documents:

—a report of 4 October 1994, drawn up on behalf of Valmont by an independent expert, Mr Schekkerman, a member of the firm of experts Troostwijk (the Troostwijk report), which concluded that the sale price of the land should be estimated at NLG 1,050,000 (approximately €476,000) in 1994; g

—a letter of 28 November 2000 from the same person entirely devoted to the discrepancy between the estimates arrived at in the Laureijssen and Troostwijk reports (the Troostwijk letter); h

—three letters of 6 and 7 October 2000 from undertakings other than Valmont declaring that they used the latter's car park in various ways, free of charge.

16. By Commission Communication 2001/C 37/08 (invitation to submit comments pursuant to art 88(2) EC, concerning aid C 57/2000 (ex NN 157/99) in favour of Valmont Nederland BV (ex Nolte), the Netherlands) (OJ 2001 C37 p 44), the letter of 7 November 2000 notifying the Netherlands authorities of the decision to open a formal investigation procedure was brought to the attention of interested parties. i

17. By letters of 20 February and 5 March 2001, Valmont counsel submitted its comments to the Commission.

a 18. On 18 July 2001, the Commission adopted Decision (EC) 2002/142 (on the state aid implemented by the Netherlands in favour of Valmont Nederland BV) (OJ 2002 L48 p 20; the decision).

19. Article 1 thereof provides that the land transaction and the construction of the car park contain elements of state aid in favour of Valmont amounting to NLG 375,000 (approximately €170,168) and NLG 125,000 (approximately €56,723) respectively.

b 20. It also finds that those state aid elements are incompatible with the common market (see art 2) and requires the Netherlands, first, to take all necessary measures to recover it from the recipient (see art 3) and, secondly, to inform the Commission of the above-mentioned measures (see art 4).

c PROCEDURE AND FORMS OF ORDER SOUGHT BY THE PARTIES

21. By application lodged at the Registry of the Court of First Instance of the European Communities on 22 October 2001, Valmont brought the present action.

d 22. The case was initially allocated to the First Chamber, Extended Composition, and subsequently, upon the Judge-Rapporteur being assigned to the Fourth Chamber as a result of the changes to the composition of the chambers of the Court of First Instance from 1 October 2003, to the Fourth Chamber, Extended Composition.

e 23. On hearing the report of the Judge-Rapporteur, the Court (Fourth Chamber, Extended Composition) decided to open the oral procedure. It also asked the parties, pursuant to art 64 of its Rules of Procedure, to answer a number of written questions and produce a number of documents. The parties complied with the request within the specified period.

24. The parties made their submissions to the court and gave their oral replies to the court's questions at the hearing on 19 February 2004.

f 25. Valmont claims that the court should:

- annul the decision;
- order the Commission to pay the costs.

26. The Commission contends that the court should:

- dismiss the application;
- order Valmont to pay the costs.

g LAW

27. In support of its claims, Valmont puts forward six pleas in law.

h 28. The first plea in law alleges infringement of art 87(1) EC inasmuch as the sale of the land carries no benefit. The second plea in law alleges infringement of art 87(1) EC inasmuch as the sale of the land and the construction of the car park do not affect trade and do not distort competition. The third plea in law alleges, in essence, that the administrative procedure was conducted irregularly and that Valmont's procedural rights were not observed. The fourth plea in law alleges, in essence, infringement of art 87(1) EC inasmuch as the Commission concluded that the sale of the land contained a benefit by basing itself on an expert's report which is of no evidential value. The fifth plea in law alleges, in essence, infringement of art 87(1) EC inasmuch as the construction of the car park contains no benefit. The sixth plea in law alleges, in essence, infringement of the rules regarding recovery of state aid and procedural time limits.

i 29. Valmont's first and fourth pleas in law constitute, in essence, a single plea in law, alleging infringement of art 87(1) EC inasmuch as the sale of the land does not contain a benefit, which must be examined first. Next to be examined will be Valmont's fifth plea in law alleging infringement of art 87(1) EC inasmuch as the construction of the car park does not contain a benefit. a

The plea in law, alleging infringement of art 87(1) EC inasmuch as the sale of the land does not contain a benefit

30. According to Valmont, the Commission misapplied the communication on land sales, made erroneous use of the Laureijssen report and made a manifest error of assessment of the sale. b

31. The argument concerning the use made by the Commission of the Laureijssen report must be examined first of all.

Arguments of the parties

32. First, Valmont argues that the Commission based itself on the Laureijssen report, drawn up at the request of the Netherlands authorities towards the end of the preliminary investigation stage, in 1998, despite the fact that it was inconsistent. In particular, Valmont claims that, with regard to the land at issue, that report arrives, without any rational explanation, at a market price of NLG 42.50/m<sup>2</sup> and that the Commission adopted that conclusion without seriously examining it. c
d

33. Secondly, the Commission disregarded the Troostwijk report, commissioned by Valmont in order to obtain bank financing, in 1994, despite the fact that it was relevant. Furthermore, it peremptorily disregarded the Troostwijk letter.

34. The Commission replies that Valmont's arguments overlook the fact that, when investigating land sales by a public body pursuant to art 87(1) EC, the Commission, which is not itself qualified to estimate the price of such an asset, bases itself on the objective criteria set down in the communication on land sales. In particular, in the context of the procedure described in point II.2 of that communication, it is for an expert to take into account the whole of the relevant economic circumstances. Provided that, first, such an expert is qualified and independent within the meaning of that provision and that, secondly, no serious methodological error is apparent in his report, the Commission is obliged to adopt the conclusions to which it arrives. e
f

35. In the present case, on the one hand, the Commission could base itself on the Laureijssen report, which was drawn up after the sale but still for the purposes of the administrative procedure. First, the expert was possessed of the knowledge and independence required by the second to fourth paragraphs of point II.2(a) of the communication on land sales. Next, the task entrusted to him to estimate the price of the land at the time of the sale was carried out in accordance with the fifth paragraph of point II.2(a) of that communication. Furthermore, his working methods were appropriate since, in particular, he had visited the site. Finally, careful examination of the Laureijssen report shows that the expert dedicated the requisite attention to all the relevant factors and that, finally, the calculation of the price per square metre of the land properly included those factors. g
h

36. On the other hand, the Commission could disregard the Troostwijk report and the Troostwijk letter since the estimate in those documents concerned the developed land which Valmont could sell rather than the undeveloped land which it had acquired. i

Findings of the court

37. In view of the fact that aid is a legal concept which must be interpreted on the basis of objective factors, the Community courts must in principle,

- a having regard both to the specific features of the case before them and to the technical or complex nature of the Commission's assessments, carry out a comprehensive review as to whether a measure falls within the scope of art 87(1) EC (see France v Ladbroke Racing Ltd Case C-83/98 P [2000] ECR I-3271 (para 25) and Linde AG v European Commission Case T-98/00 [2002] ECR II-3961 (para 40)). The exception to that principle is where a complex economic appraisal is involved, in which case review by the court is restricted (see, to that effect, Belgium v European Commission Case C-56/93 [1996] ECR I-723 (para 11) and Italy and SIM 2 Multimedia SpA v European Commission Joined cases C-328/99 and C-399/00 [2003] ECR I-4035 (para 39)).

- c 38. Furthermore, the legality of a Commission decision concerning state aid must be assessed in the light of the information available to the Commission when the decision was adopted (see Belgium v EC Commission Case 234/84 [1986] ECR 2263 (para 16) and Belgium v European Commission Case C-197/99 P [2003] ECR I-8461 (para 86)).

- d 39. In the present case, art 1 of the decision states that the sale of the land contains an element of state aid amounting to NLG 375,000 (approximately €170,168) and it is clear from recitals (15) to (18) of the decision that the difference between the sale price of the land and the market price of the land determined by the Commission is thus described as state aid.

- e 40. In order to arrive at such a conclusion, the Commission first pointed out that it followed from point II.2 of the communication on land sales that a member state which wished to sell a piece of land could have its value estimated beforehand by an expert, such an estimate then constituting the market price which, where adhered to, rules out the existence of state aid. It found, in the present case, that the experts' reports which it had available were subsequent to the transaction (see recital (16) of the decision).

- f 41. Next, it considered that the Troostwijk report had no evidential value while the Laureijssen report was evidential (see recital (17) of the decision).

42. Finally, it adopted the market price of NLG 42.50/m<sup>2</sup> (approximately €19.29/m<sup>2</sup>) estimated in the Laureijssen report, compared the sale price of NLG 30/m<sup>2</sup> (approximately €13.61/m<sup>2</sup>) with it and concluded from that comparison that there existed state aid (see recital (18) of the decision).

- g 43. It must therefore be considered whether the Commission based itself exclusively on a report devoid of any evidential value in order to conclude that there was state aid in the land's sale price. Since that question does not involve, in the present case, any complex economic appraisal it must, as such, be fully reviewed.

- h 44. Measures which, in various forms, mitigate the burdens which are normally included in the budget of an undertaking and which are thereby similar to subsidies constitute benefits for the purposes of art 87(1) EC (see, to that effect, De Gezamenlijke Steenkolenmijnen in Limburg v ECSC High Authority Case 30/59 [1961] ECR I at 39 and the Italy and SIM 2 Multimedia case, cited at para 37, above (para 35), such as, among others, the supply of goods or services on favourable terms (see, to that effect, Kwekerij Gebroeders Van der Kooy BV v EC Commission Joined cases 67/85, 68/85 and 70/85 [1988] ECR 219 (paras 28, 29) and Ministère de l'Economie, des Finances et de l'Industrie v GEMO SA Case C-126/01 [2003] ECR I-13769 (para 29)).

- i 45. When applied to the sale of land to an undertaking by a public authority, the consequence of that principle is that it must be determined whether, in particular, the sale price could not have been obtained by the purchaser under normal market conditions (see, to that effect, Diputación Foral de Álava v

European Commission Joined Cases T-127/99, T-129/99 and T-148/99 [2002] ECR II-1275 (para 73), a paragraph which was not subject to appeal). Where the Commission carries out an examination for that purpose of the experts' reports drawn up after the transaction in question, it is bound to compare the sale price actually paid to the price suggested in those various reports and to determine whether it deviates sufficiently to justify a finding that there is a benefit (see, to that effect, the Diputación Foral de Álava case, cited above (para 85), a paragraph which was not subject to appeal). That method makes it possible to take into account the uncertainty of such a determination, which is by nature retrospective, of such market prices. a

46. In the present case, contrary to what is stated in recital (18) of the decision, the conclusion of the Laureijssen report that the sale price excluding VAT should be estimated at NLG 42.50/m<sup>2</sup> in 1993 does not rely on any calculation or on a comparison with the prices paid for other land sold by the municipality concerned and sales of land by other proprietors. c

47. First, that figure does not rely on any explicit and verifiable figures. Indeed, after stating, in the ninth and tenth paragraphs of point 3.4, as follows:

'[T]he municipality of Cranendonck, formerly Maarheeze, also based itself on the cost price. No plot of approximately [three hectares] which was directly sellable was available. The plot sold to Valmont International BV belonged to the municipality and consisted of woods worth approximately NLG 2/m<sup>2</sup>.

The cost of construction had been estimated by the municipality at NLG 30/m<sup>2</sup> excluding VAT (which is also the figure found for "Den Engelsman"). The development plan was drawn up after the sale to Valmont, namely on 24 August 1994 ...' e

The Laureijssen report immediately concludes (at point 4):

'[O]n the basis of the foregoing evaluations and of the comparison with assets sold and rented, the immovable asset in question must be estimated on the basis of:

- (a) the 1993 price index;
- (b) its being unburdened by a lease;
- (c) there being no third-party rights ...
- (d) its being unburdened by any mortgage or charge;
- (e) there being no drawbacks at the environmental level, such as pollution of the ground or the air, processed or harmful materials, which might negatively influence, in the long or short term, the value of the asset being estimated;

(f) taking nevertheless into account justified cost reductions for each asset, such as declared by the municipality, as being:

value for private freehold sale ...
NLG 42.50/m<sup>2</sup> excluding VAT.'

48. On the one hand, it is clear from the passage cited above that, in order to fix the sale price, Maarheeze based itself on a cost price of NLG 32/m<sup>2</sup> obtained by adding the value of the ground in its original wooded state (NLG 2/m<sup>2</sup>) and the costs of providing services (NLG 30/m<sup>2</sup>). That cost price therefore consists of the explicit and verifiable sum of objective figures. Moreover, it is apparent that the cost of providing services of NLG 30/m<sup>2</sup>, which constitutes the essential constituent of that cost price, corresponds to i a that found for the whole of the Den Engelsman area, in which is situated the land sold to Valmont, and may therefore be considered as having been estimated at its fair value. Finally, it is apparent that that cost price justifies a sale price of NLG 30/m<sup>2</sup>, as the expert states in the first to third paragraphs of point 3.4 of his report:

b 'During the visits we made to the municipalities of Helmond and Cranendonck [formerly Maarheeze], we received information concerning the fixing of the sale price charged in the transactions in question involving E. P. M. and Valmont Nederland BV.

The municipalities have explained the reduction in the land prices.

c For the sake of completeness of our report, we do not wish to deprive you of that reply. We believe that the explanations given are such as to justify the sale prices.'

49. On the other hand, it is clear that it is impossible to verify objectively the elements then set forth in the Laureijssen report or the market price of NLG 42.50/m<sup>2</sup> supposedly resulting from their combination.

d 50. In the first place, the elements appearing in point 4(b), (c), (d) and (e) of that report had already been taken into account by the sale agreement of 1 July 1993 and by the authentic deed of sale of 8 February 1994. The former document indicates, at para 1, that '[t]he municipality has investigated whether there is any pollution of the ground of the land sold' and that 'the investigation shows that the state of the ground is deemed fit for development and for its use for the purpose intended for the plot'. The second document reiterates that conclusion at point C.6, and reiterates, at points C.2.1, C.2.3 and C.5, that the plot is freehold and unburdened by third party rights, charges or mortgages. In the absence of any explanation in the Laureijssen report, it is arbitrary to consider that the latter document evaluates the effect of those elements on the sale price more accurately than was done at the time of the sale.

f 51. Next, as regards the reference in point 4(f) of the Laureijssen report to 'justified cost reductions for each asset' being taken into account, it is worth noting that, although that report actually describes a justified cost reduction so far as concerns the second plot, sold by a municipality other than Maarheeze, to an undertaking other than Valmont, which it aimed to estimate (see para 13, above), it does not, on the contrary, mention any such element with regard to the plot sold by Maarheeze to Valmont.

g 52. At the hearing, the Commission stated that it had requested further details in that respect from the Netherlands authorities during the administrative procedure, that they had failed to provide them and that the passage in question referred no doubt to declarations made to the expert by h Maarheeze municipal officials but which were not set down in the Laureijssen report.

i 53. According to the case law cited in para 38, above, the legality of a decision on state aid adopted by the Commission may only be assessed on the basis of information available to the Commission at the time of its adoption. In the present case, it follows that, although the Commission did not obtain the additional information it requested, it did indeed however have at its disposal the Laureijssen report containing the reference in question and was not exonerated from assessing the evidential value thereof. The court may thus review the legality of the decision in that respect. However, it is not disputed by the parties that the Laureijssen report does not explain what the 'justified cost reduction' relating to the land bought by Valmont might be and the court considers that an unsubstantiated reference cannot reasonably be considered conclusive and relevant for the purpose of explaining the discrepancy of NLG 10.50/m<sup>2</sup> noted between the cost price of NLG 32/m<sup>2</sup> on which Maarheeze based itself and the sale price of NLG 42.50/m<sup>2</sup> estimated in the Laureijssen report. The argument that that reference could be considered to refer to statements made to the expert by Maarheeze municipal officials which were not set down in the Laureijssen report is too speculative to affect that assessment.

54. However, in so far as it may be inferred from the Commission's arguments that the error committed by it in that respect is connected with the incomplete nature of the information available to it, it remains to be examined whether the Commission may avail itself of that fact.

55. According to the case law, where it considers that aid has been granted without it having been notified to it and is, therefore, unlawful, the Commission has the power to require the member state concerned to provide it with all the information necessary for its examination; it is only where the member state concerned fails to provide the information requested that the Commission is empowered to make its decision on the basis of the information available to it (see, to that effect, France v EC Commission Case C-301/87 [1990] ECR I-307 (paras 19, 22) and Germany v EC Commission Joined cases C-324/90 and C-342/90 [1994] ECR I-1173 (para 26)).

56. The power conferred on the Commission to require the member state concerned to provide it with information is at present provided for by Council Regulation (EC) 659/1999 (laying down detailed rules for the application of art [88 EC]) (OJ 1999 L83 p 1). That regulation entered into force on 16 April 1999. To the extent that it provides procedural rules, it applies to any administrative procedure pending before the Commission when it entered into force, save for those provisions which contain a specific body of rules in that regard (see, to that effect, Département du Loiret v European Commission Case T-369/00 [2003] ECR II-1795 (paras 50, 51)). Since the preliminary investigation stage was set in motion by the letter of 1 April 1998 and the formal investigation procedure was opened by decision of the Commission notified to the Netherlands authorities by letter of 7 November 2000 (see paras 11, 14, above), that regulation applies in the present case.

57. According to the wording of art 10 of Regulation 659/1999 itself, the power conferred on the Commission to address to the member state concerned, successively, a request for information (see art 10(2) and, by reference, art 5(1) thereof), followed, if necessary, by a reminder (see art 10(2) and, by reference, art 5(2) thereof) and, finally, an instruction to provide information (see art 10(3) of that regulation) depends initially merely on a choice by the Commission. Furthermore, art 10(3) of Regulation 659/1999 provides, inter alia, that, where a decision requiring information to be provided is adopted, it must 'specify what information is required'.

58. It follows that the Commission may adopt a final decision where it considers to have available all the necessary information and that it is only where it considers that that is not the case that it requires the member state concerned to provide it (see, to that effect, Germany v Commission, cited in para 55, above (para 26) and France v European Commission Case C-17/99 [2001] ECR I-2481 (para 28)), as described in the preceding paragraph.

59. However, in the present case, the Commission has stated that it had requested the Netherlands authorities to provide it with an explanation regarding the reference in the Laureijssen report to a 'justified cost reduction'

- a relating to the land bought by Valmont. In other words, the Commission considered that the information in its possession was not sufficient. None the less, it did not obtain additional information and finally based the decision solely on the information it then had in its possession. Moreover, the fact that the Commission stated in the decision that 'on the basis of the information available, [it could] rely [on the Laureijssen] report' (see recital (18) of the decision) attests to that.

b 60. Nevertheless, it is not clear from the decision or the file, nor does the Commission claim, moreover, that the Netherlands authorities were ever required, by decision requiring that information be provided, adopted under art 10(3) of Regulation 659/1999, to provide the information in question. Since the Commission has not made use of the powers enabling it to enjoin the member state concerned to provide it with it, it cannot rely on the incomplete nature of the information in its possession in order to justify the decision (see, to that effect, Germany v Commission, cited at para 55, above (paras 28, 29)).

c 61. Finally, the reference, in point 4(a) of the Laureijssen report, to the 1993 price index does not demonstrate that the sale price ought to have been fixed at NLG 42.50/m<sup>2</sup> but only that it could, in theory and in different circumstances, have been fixed at NLG 50/m<sup>2</sup>. That latter figure must be understood, as the Commission explained at the hearing, only as a 'rather artificial price'.

d 62. Perusal of the table entitled 'Land sale price, excluding VAT, per square metre', in point 3.2 of the Laureijssen report, shows that a price of NLG 50/m<sup>2</sup> was the theoretical sale price applicable in 1993 in Maarheeze. The evaluations which precede that table state that the sale prices actually agreed case by case are 'strongly influenced and/or decided' by that theoretical sale price, and the '[r]emarks' which follow it show that, in the expert's view, that price is applicable irrespective of the actual size of the land concerned, since '[Maarheeze] does not distinguish between large and small plots'.

e 63. However, point 3.2 of the Laureijssen report also reads that, in 1993, 'the economy was clearly in recession ... in central and eastern [Noord-]Brabant', that, indeed, 'land prices have not generally been downwardly revised', but also that, '[i]n the circumstances, there is clearly a devaluation'. The expert continues, in unambiguous terms:

f 'Charging a lower price in unfavourable economic circumstances, particularly when selling large volumes of industrial land, is entirely understandable. Indeed, obtaining a quicker return on investment and preventing loss of future interest are sufficient reasons from an economic point of view. Moreover, in the circumstances described, that could have a knock-on effect on the price where one is dealing with market operators who are acting logically.'

g 64. Perusal of the Laureijssen report thus makes it clear, first, that a sale price which is lower than the theoretical price of NLG 50/m<sup>2</sup> was 'entirely' understandable, 'particularly when selling large volumes', or even logical in the economic context of 1993 with regard to a transaction such as that in issue in the present case; secondly, that the cost price of NLG 32/m<sup>2</sup> was based on objective and ascertainable criteria and could constitute a market price; thirdly, that the alleged market price of NLG 42.50/m<sup>2</sup> arrived at in that report is not based on the sum of verifiable elements.

h 65. In the second place, that figure of NLG 42.50/m<sup>2</sup> is not based on a comparison with prices paid in other land sales by the municipality concerned or on land sales by other proprietors.

66. On the other hand, perusal of the Laureijssen report shows that the expert inquired into the existence of similar, contemporaneous transactions with which to compare the sale, as emerges from the second and third paragraphs of point 3.1 of the report, and that he reviewed the transactions carried out by Maarheeze between 1991 and 1995 and examined the transactions carried out by other proprietors, both private and public, but that he then took the view that it was impossible to carry out such a comparison. a

67. Perusal of the table entitled 'Total land sales per year', in point 3.2 of the Laureijssen report, leads to the observation that, apart from the plot of three hectares sold to Valmont, sale of land by Maarheeze for industrial development and noted by the expert involved a total of 0.18 hectares of land in 1991, 0.56 hectares in 1993, 0.04 hectares in 1994 and 3.52 hectares in 1995, without it being, moreover, possible to determine whether the latter figure corresponds to a single transaction or to several transactions, since it is an annual total. b
c

68. Likewise, in the second to sixth paragraphs and the sixteenth to nineteenth paragraphs of point 3.2 and again in the first and third paragraphs of point 3.3 of the Laureijssen report, the expert found that there were no comparable transactions carried out by other proprietors in either the public or private sectors. First, the municipalities of Noord-Brabant had a monopoly with regard to sales of land made suitable for industrial development. Second, those municipalities charged different sales prices for plots of comparable sizes as shown in the table entitled 'Land sale prices excluding VAT per m<sup>2</sup>', which appears in point 3.2 of the above-mentioned report, and in the remarks which follow it. d
e

69. Consequently, as stated in the ninth paragraph of point 3.2 of the Laureijssen report, the expert carried out 'an estimate ... largely [based] on hypothetical arguments', without, moreover, his report making clear the elements on which that estimate had been based, since it states first that '[a]ccount has been taken of sales transactions, to a certain party, of a plot of a minimum size of [four hectares]' (fourth paragraph of point 3.1 of the Laureijssen report), then that '[t]here were no comparable land sales of [four hectares] in the municipality of [Maarheeze] during the period from 1991 to 1995 to a specific tenderer' (first paragraph of point 3.3 of the Laureijssen report) and finally that the synopsis of the figures in the table entitled 'Land sales excluding VAT per m<sup>2</sup>' 'covers an average for plots of approximately 90 000 m<sup>2</sup>', that is to say nine hectares (point 3.2 of the Laureijssen report). f
g

70. When asked to speak to the evidential value of the Laureijssen report, the Commission put forward various arguments seeking to justify the market price of NLG 42.50/m<sup>2</sup> concluded in that document and to put to one side the market price of NLG 32/m<sup>2</sup> which it mentions. However, none of those arguments is persuasive. h

71. First, the Commission indicated in its answers to the court's written questions that it was normal for an expert report to provide, as here, a general estimate. It is nevertheless true that an expert report can be deemed of any evidential value, either by the Commission or by the court, only as regards its objective content and that a mere unsubstantiated statement in such a document does not make it possible to conclude that state aid exists. Besides, it is the line of argument adopted by the Commission during the hearing with regard to the Troostwijk report. It argued that, if the method for determining the price of the land adopted in the Troostwijk report, which subtracts the costs of construction from the value of the developed land (see recital (17) of i a the decision) were deemed to be acceptable, it is still the case that 'no accurate calculation' of those costs was carried out in the present case and the figure of NLG 35/m<sup>2</sup> at which the report arrives is therefore inadequate in any event.

b 72. Secondly, the Commission stated in its replies to the court's written questions and later at the hearing that, although imprecise, the list of factors determining the market price in point 4 of the Laureijssen report is adequate provided it is produced, as in the present case, by an independent qualified expert. However, although the Commission may commission outside consultants, without albeit being bound thereto (see, to that effect, Fédération Française des Sociétés d'Assurance (FFSA) v European Commission Case T-106/95 [1997] ECR II-229 (para 102) and Astilleros Zamacona SA v European Commission Case T-72/98 [2000] ECR II-1683 (para 55)), it is not thereby exempted from assessing their work. Subject to judicial review, ensuring that art 87 EC is observed and art 88 EC is implemented is the central and exclusive responsibility of the Commission (see, to that effect, the judgments of the Court of Justice of the European Communities in Firma Steinike und Weinlig v Germany Case 78/76 [1977] ECR I-595 (para 9), Fédération Nationale du Commerce Extérieur des Produits Alimentaires v France Case C-354/90 [1991] ECR I-5505 (para 14) and Namur-Les Assurances du Crédit SA v Office National du Ducroire Case C-44/93 [1994] ECR I-3829 (para 17)) and not of the aforementioned experts.

c 73. Thirdly, the Commission states in its replies to the written questions of the court that the Laureijssen report also mentions factors which help to explain the conclusion at which it arrives. The Commission took those factors into account implicitly in its analysis.

d 74. On the one hand, the Commission observes that the land, which is located alongside a major road, is easily accessible and has modern facilities, according to the description in point 2 of the Laureijssen report. However, the court considers that, on account of its generality and vagueness, that argument does not appear in this case capable of explaining, by itself, the conclusion at which the Laureijssen report arrives. For the rest, although the expert mentions those factors in his report, he does not draw any explicit inference therefrom in his assessment or in his conclusion as to the value of the land.

e 75. On the other, the Commission takes the view that account should be taken of the reference in the first paragraph of point 3.2 of the Laureijssen report, according to which '[a]s a general rule, land prices are determined on the basis of the addition of the purchase or asset value, the cost of providing services, infrastructure and change-of-use work, the benefits, the risks etc'. However, the court notes that according to the case file, the costs of providing services are in fact taken into account in point 3 of the sale undertaking of 1 July 1993 and in point C.6 of the deed of sale of 8 February 1994, and points out that the Laureijssen report unequivocally states that they, together with the asset value of the land, are already included in the cost price on which Maarheeze based itself when selling the land to Valmont (see paras 47, 48, above). As to the other factors, it is sufficient to state that they are not examined in the Laureijssen report any more than they are in the decision.

f 76. Fourthly, the Commission bases a line of argument in its answers to the court's written questions, and subsequently at the hearing, on a document produced at its own initiative entitled 'Proposal of the [Maarheeze municipal] council of 17 June 1980' which aims, in particular, at fixing the general terms and conditions of the sale and a sale price of the plots of land intended for industrial use.

77. Even if that document, of which the Commission was not in possession when it adopted the decision, since its reply to the court's written questions make it clear that it was sent in a letter from the Netherlands authorities of 15 January 2004, could be taken into account, it does not mean it must be followed. a

78. Admittedly, the document deals with the carrying-out, in 1980, of an extension to the Den Engelsman industrial estate, into which Valmont moved in 1994. The document says of that extension that '[t]he gross surface is of +/- 2.85 hectares, and the net surface area to be made available is +/- [1.74] hectares', so that 'the sale price should be fixed at NLG 45/m<sup>2</sup> excluding VAT'. However, without it being necessary to examine the relevance in the present case of a proposal relating to a developed area of land 14 years prior to the transaction in question as a response to '[v]arious undertakings established in [the] municipality [which] asked to be taken into account for the purchase of industrial land', the gross surface area of which is, moreover, smaller than that of the land sold to Valmont, it suffices to note that there is nothing in the file to suggest that the proposal in question was ever adopted by Maarheeze. b

79. On the contrary, the decision of Maarheeze municipal council of 26 June 1980 concerning general terms and conditions for the sale of land intended for industrial use, to which the deed of sale of 8 February 1994 refers and which was also produced before the court, does not contain, for its part, any reference whatever to the sale price. c

80. Moreover, perusal of the proposal of 17 June 1980 on which the Commission is placing reliance leads to the observation that it intended to fix a sale price of NLG 45/m<sup>2</sup> on the basis of a cost price of NLG 44.10/m<sup>2</sup> and, therefore, to limit the immediate pecuniary benefit obtained by Maarheeze from the sale of the land in question to NLG 0.90/m<sup>2</sup>. That document is therefore not such as to establish the reasonable nature of the conclusion at which the Laureijssen report arrived, which found a cost price of NLG 32/m<sup>2</sup> and a market price of NLG 42.50/m<sup>2</sup>, so that there is a discrepancy of NLG 10.50/m<sup>2</sup>, that is to say ten times greater than that in the document in question, between those two figures. d

81. Fifthly, the Commission maintained in its replies to the court's written questions that the market price of NLG 42.50/m<sup>2</sup> is corroborated by a report of the Netherlands ministry for social housing, development and the environment entitled '1993 inquiry into industrial estates and the location of spare offices' and included as annex 25 to its defence. With regard to the land acquired by Valmont, that report mentioned a price of NLG 47/m<sup>2</sup>. However, it must be stated that, as produced by the Commission as an annexure to its pleadings, that document consists of a page-long general synthesis in which there is no mention of the information in question. e

82. Sixthly, the Commission claimed at the hearing that the Laureijssen report was, amongst the expert reports available to it, the only relevant document since its purpose was to estimate the price of the land to be sold freehold by private contract in the same state as at the time of sale. On the other hand, as stated in recital (17) of the decision, it could not rely on the Troostwijk report since it evaluated the whole industrial estate, including buildings, rather than the land as sold by Maarheeze, that is to say undeveloped. f

83. None the less, although the Commission was able to observe as a matter of fact that the purpose of the Troostwijk report was to estimate the land as developed, to take the view that that was insufficient and to refer to the g a Laureijssen report, the purpose of which it believed to correspond to the wording of the fifth paragraph of point II.2(a) of the communication on land sales, it was still necessary to establish its evidential value.

h

i

b 84. It must further be observed that, in recital (18) of the decision, the Commission disregarded the Troostwijk letter, which stated in particular that the Laureijssen report did not take any account of the fact that the land was not totally accessible from the public highway and, therefore, overvalued its price, on the ground that '[t]hat statement is not ... supported by any evidence' and that '[t]he [Laureijssen report] explicitly states that the experts visited the site'.

c 85. However, although the first paragraph of point 3.1 of the Laureijssen report suggests that the expert actually visited the site, that is also the case as regards the author of the Troostwijk report, according to the first paragraph of the section of his report, entitled 'Reply'. The Commission in any event acknowledged as much at the hearing.

d 86. Accordingly, having noted the existence of a discrepancy between the Laureijssen and Troostwijk reports regarding a factual element affecting the price of the land and not having any information available to consider that the Laureijssen report was accurate in that respect and that the Troostwijk report was not, the Commission, which had taken the view that the latter did not employ a satisfactory calculation method and was not suited in that specific regard, could not extend that opinion and simply disregard the Troostwijk letter as of no evidential value. Furthermore, although the method consisting in calculating the value of undeveloped land on the basis of that of developed land might appear imperfect, it can hardly be denied that its interest lay in the fact that it was free from speculation, as Valmont stated at the hearing without being challenged on that point.

f 87. Seventhly, the Commission argued that, even supposing that the cost price of NLG 32/m<sup>2</sup> constituted a market price which it was constrained to compare with the selling price of NLG 30/m<sup>2</sup>, it was nevertheless true that there was a discrepancy of NLG 2/m<sup>2</sup> between those prices and that therefore Maarheeze did not derive any pecuniary benefit from the sale.

g 88. None the less, that finding is not relevant, since it follows from the case law cited at para 45, above that it was still necessary to determine whether the sale price of NLG 30/m<sup>2</sup>, which produces a full price of NLG 900,000, diverged from the market price of NLG 32/m<sup>2</sup>, which gives a full price of NLG 960,000, sufficiently to be classified as state aid. In other words, it was for the Commission to assess the discrepancy of 6.25% between those figures in the light of art 87(1) EC and, on that basis, to come to a conclusion as to the existence or otherwise of state aid.

h 89. It follows from the foregoing that Valmont's arguments are well founded. The Laureijssen report does not support the Commission's conclusion that the sale price is less than the market price and therefore contains an element of state aid.

i 90. Accordingly, the Commission has misapplied art 87(1) EC inasmuch as it considered, on the basis of an expert's report devoid of evidential value in that respect, that the sale of the land contained an element of aid.

91. Article 1 of the decision must therefore be annulled in so far as it declares that the sale of the land contains an element of state aid, without there being any need to examine the rest of the present plea in law or the other pleas in law put forward in that regard. Consequently, arts 2, 3 and 4 of that decision must also be annulled in so far as they concern the sale of the land.

The plea in law alleging infringement of art 87(1) EC inasmuch as the construction of the car park contains no benefit a

Arguments of the parties

92. Valmont claims, first of all, that the information transmitted to the Commission during the administrative procedure shows that the car park built on the land it purchased from Maarheeze is used free of charge by other undertakings. According to Valmont, the information includes, besides the letters from undertakings examined by the Commission in recitals (20) and (21) of the decision (see para 15, above), a letter of 6 October 2000 sent to it by Maarheeze and which it produced as annex 6d to its application initiating proceedings. b

93. Secondly, Valmont understands that the Commission might correctly have considered it to be, in recital (20) of the decision, as being the principal beneficiary of the car park, but contests the relevance of certain factual elements on which the Commission relies in support of that assessment. c

94. Thirdly, Valmont maintains that, in the circumstances of the present case, the Commission, first, disregarded the conclusiveness of the existence of the opportunity or the right conferred on third parties to use its own car park and, secondly, failed to take account thereof in its reasoning. d

95. Fourth and lastly, it contests the approach of the Commission consisting in describing an infrastructure such as the car park as semi-public and arbitrarily concluding that half of the financing granted by a public body for its construction must be deemed a benefit.

96. In reply to those arguments, the Commission states that, in view of the information available, which it claimed did not include the letter produced by Valmont as annex 6d to its application initiating proceedings, it could consider that half of the financing granted by Maarheeze in view of the construction of the car park could be deemed a benefit. e

97. First, the Commission did not misassess the facts by considering that the car park constituted a semi-public infrastructure. Indeed, it would appear that that infrastructure was not public, that is to say freely accessible to everyone at any time on the same conditions and without prior authorisations and that Valmont could be considered to be its principal beneficiary. However, it also appeared that undertakings other than Valmont could make use of that infrastructure under a 'gentlemen's agreement' between Valmont and Maarheeze and that Valmont could not legitimately be considered to be the exclusive beneficiary thereof. f

98. Secondly, in the absence of a legal rule requiring it to classify an infrastructure such as that referred to in the present case as purely public or private and in the light of information attesting to its hybrid nature, the Commission was entitled to classify the infrastructure as semi-public. That approach was all the more legitimate since the Commission was required to determine accurately the benefit contained in the financing granted to Valmont and that, in the present case, such an operation depended directly on the use made of that infrastructure. g

99. Thirdly, in order to overcome such a classification, Valmont ought to have shown that it did not use the infrastructure in question any more than it would use a public car park, which it did not demonstrate, since Valmont was the owner of the land on which it is built. h

100. Fourthly and lastly, the logical consequence of classification as a semi-public infrastructure is that half the financing granted for constructing it i

- a constitutes state aid. Howbeit, Valmont did not explain why the Commission should have classified as a benefit a smaller proportion of that financing.

Findings of the court

- b 101. Before examining the plea in law, the letter appended as annex 6d to the application initiating proceedings must be excluded from the proceedings. That letter from Maarheeze to Valmont was classified by the latter as among documents which were appended by the Netherlands authorities to the observations they submitted to the Commission during the formal investigation procedure on 12 December 2000.

- c 102. As observed in para 38, above, the legality of a Commission decision in the matter of state aid must be assessed in the light of the information available to the Commission when the decision was adopted. As the Commission rightly pointed out, the consequence of that principle is that, whereas there is nothing to prevent an applicant from developing, in support of an action for annulment of such a decision, a legal plea which it did not raise, as an interested third party, during the formal investigation procedure, it is not, on the other hand, d permissible for it to rely on factual arguments which were unknown to the Commission and which it had not notified to the latter during that procedure (see, to that effect, Kneissl Dachstein Sportartikel AG v European Commission Case T-110/97 [1999] ECR II-2881 (para 102) and Salomon SA v European Commission Case T-123/97 [1999] ECR II-2925 (para 55)).

- e 103. In the present case, the Commission claimed in its defence that the letter in question had not been produced during the administrative procedure and Valmont rejoined, first, that it was entitled to rely in judicial proceedings on any factual element, even if unknown by the Commission and not notified thereto and, secondly, that that document did not, in any event, contain any information which was not already in the letters from undertakings referred to in para 15, above.

- f 104. In the light of the case law cited in paras 38 and 102, above, the first of those objections is manifestly unfounded in law. As regards the second objection, the court points out that, although the letter in question does indeed refer to factual information notified to the Commission by the Netherlands authorities, it contains, furthermore, new factual information as the Commission, in any event, stated in reply to a written question of the court without being challenged on that point. That letter must therefore be removed g as not fulfilling the requisite conditions for inclusion in the context of judicial review.

- h 105. As to the substance, art 1 of the decision states that the construction of the car park contains an element of state aid amounting to NLG 125,000 (€56,723), and recitals (20) to (22) of the decision make it clear that half of the financing granted to that end is also classified as state aid.

106. The Commission, in that connection, put forward an argument in three stages.

- i 107. First, it takes the view that the car park could not be regarded as public given that Valmont was the main beneficiary, as is evidenced by its legal status as proprietor of the car park, by the fact that it was, in all probability, the main user, by the fact that it would in any event have been responsible for the cost of providing services necessary for carrying on business and, moreover, by the fact that the fencing surrounding the car park did not give passers-by the impression that it was a public infrastructure (see recital (2) of the decision). The Commission added, in particular, that the 'gentlemen's agreement'

entered into, according to the Netherlands authorities and Valmont, between the latter and Maarheeze for the purpose of enabling public access to the car park was not sufficient to establish the public nature of that infrastructure. a

108. Next, the Commission considered that the car park should be regarded as semi-public on the ground, first, that it was actually regularly used by other undertakings free of charge, as emerges from the letters from undertakings mentioned in para 15, above, secondly, that it was potentially accessible to other undertakings and, thirdly, that the long-term nature of that situation, which was the result of the 'gentlemen's agreement' between Valmont and Maarheeze, was guaranteed by Maarheeze's powers under the municipal land use plan (see recital (21) of the decision). b

109. Finally, in view of those factors, the Commission indicated that it regarded half of the costs of providing services for the car park as normal business costs, that, since Maarheeze had financed all the costs of providing services, it had favoured Valmont and that it must be found that there was a benefit amounting, in essence, to half the financing in issue (see recital (22) of the decision). c

110. As Valmont maintains, the line of argument used by the Commission in order to classify half of the financing in issue as state aid is erroneous. d

111. In view of the arguments by which the Commission changed, at the hearing, some of the considerations appearing in its own decision, it is appropriate to consider, first, the assessment of the Commission, in the decision, of the facts of the case as they emerge from the information available and, next, to examine the conclusions drawn by the Commission, in its decision, from that assessment as to the legal classification of the facts. e

—Assessment of the facts

112. It is for the court, when hearing and determining an action for annulment of a Community act, itself to interpret that act, in particular where, as in the present case, the institution from which it emanates explains how the considerations in that act are to be understood (see, to that effect, the judgment of the Court of Justice in Thyssen Stahl AG v European Commission Case C-194/99 P [2003] ECR I-10821 (paras 55, 56), confirming, on appeal, the judgment of the Court of First Instance in Thyssen Stahl AG v European Commission Case T-141/94 [1999] ECR II-347 (para 392)). f

113. In the present case, the court observes that the Commission stated in recital (21) of the decision that undertakings other than Valmont had, in some cases, access or, in others, could have continued free access to the car park. It also accepted the explanations put forward by the Netherlands authorities, set forth in recital (13) of the decision, regarding the 'gentlemen's agreement' between Maarheeze and Valmont, taking the view that Maarheeze 'is in a position to be able to enforce strict observance of its ['gentlemen's agreement'] with Valmont and to ensure the continued use [of the] land as a car park by virtue of its powers under the municipal land use plan'. g
h

114. Examination of the file, in particular of the documents on which the Commission claims to have relied in reply to the questions put at the hearing, leads to the conclusion that those considerations are not erroneous. i

115. Indeed, perusal of the letters from undertakings cited at para 15, above, on which the Commission relied, confirms that, far from being reserved for the exclusive use of Valmont, access to the car park was open to other undertakings under arrangements concluded with them. It is thus clear from them, first, that Valmont authorises certain undertakings active in the delivery

a and transport industry to make use of that infrastructure. Secondly, that authorisation has continued uninterrupted since 1994, when Valmont established itself on its site. Thirdly, such authorisation can be assumed to be continuous, since it covers evenings and weekends. Fourthly, they confer on the undertakings concerned benefits which are not limited to the right to use parking spaces but also cover rights of various kinds including that of loading and unloading, storage of equipment and easier access to locked-off property belonging to those undertakings. It also contributes to protecting those undertakings against a number of risks such as theft of equipment and the bogging-down of the heavy vehicles which such undertakings use. Fifthly, it palliates the lack of public infrastructure suitable for the parking of trailers and, as the Commission has pointed out, avoids their being parked on the streets of Maarheeze. Sixthly, the benefits are granted to the undertakings in question by Valmont free of charge.

116. Likewise, the wording of the letter of 14 May 2001 included in annex 25 to the defence, which the Commission explained at the hearing was the basis for its considerations relating to the 'gentlemen's agreement', leads to the confirmation that the arrangements described in the preceding paragraph are connected with an agreement concluded directly between Valmont and Maarheeze. It therefore follows, first, that the latter concluded and comply with a 'gentlemen's agreement' whose aim is to ensure public use of the car park. Secondly, that the continued and long-term nature of that agreement are, furthermore, guaranteed by a legislative prohibition on the change of use of the land set aside for use as a car park.

117. Accordingly, there is no credence in the argument whereby the Commission, seeking to modify a number of considerations in the decision, claimed that, in point of fact, only a few undertakings made occasional use of the car park when it suited Valmont and that, therefore, the final assessment in the decision was hardly too severe.

118. It remains true, however, that the Commission itself observed in recital (21) of the decision that the infrastructure 'is available for use by other firms as well' under a 'gentlemen's agreement' between Valmont and Maarheeze; as stated above, it follows from the case file and the oral submissions of the parties that those considerations are not erroneous.

119. Similarly, the court must reject argument by which the Commission sought to change its assessment of the 'gentlemen's agreement' examined in recitals (20) and (21) of the decision by maintaining that, at most, it was apparent from the letter of 14 May 2001, cited in para 116, above, that Maarheeze exerted, by means of powers under the municipal land use plan, a 'certain amount of control' over the use made by Valmont of the car park.

120. That document shows not only that Maarheeze is in a position to be able to ensure the long-term and continued use in various ways of the car park granted to other undertakings but also that that possibility originates in a pre-existing agreement, as the Commission itself points out in recital (21) of the decision.

121. Moreover, at the hearing, Valmont confirmed without being challenged that it could not terminate unilaterally the 'gentlemen's agreement' concluded with Maarheeze and applied uninterrupted since then.

122. It is thus apparent from both the decision and the case file that a general arrangement was concluded between Valmont and Maarheeze, that it is applied by them and that, furthermore, its application is ensured by means of a legislative provision and that the consequence is that the car park belonging to

Valmont is an infrastructure which is effectively available to a number of other undertakings and potentially to more. It is also apparent that that arrangement solves specific problems concerning parking, storage, loading, unloading, access and security in both the interest of the undertakings concerned and in the public interest. That latter aspect was, moreover, confirmed at the hearing by Valmont and not contested by the Commission. a

123. On the other hand, neither the decision nor, furthermore, the case file shows that Valmont was required by Netherlands law to allow other undertakings to make free and continued use, in different ways, of its own car park since the date of the acquisition of the land on which that infrastructure was constructed. Neither does it appear that that land was subject, at the time of its acquisition, to any rights of use or servitudes for the benefit of other undertakings. b
c

124. In those circumstances, as a result of the agreement it concluded with Maarheeze for the use of land which it owns, Valmont bears a burden in the public interest.

—The legal classification of the facts d

125. After pointing out, as described above, that the car park was not public (see recital (20) of the decision) and considering that it was nevertheless semi-public by virtue of an agreement concluded with Maarheeze, under which Valmont allowed other parties to make regular and free use thereof (see recital (21) of the decision), the Commission took the view, 'in view of [those factors]', that half of the financing granted by Maarheeze for the construction of that infrastructure constituted normal business costs (see recital (22) of the decision). For that reason, the Commission took the view that half of the financing granted by Maarheeze which effectively benefited Valmont amounted to business costs which it should normally have borne and placed it at an advantage; as a corollary, the Commission took the view, implicitly but necessarily, that the other half of that financing in fact benefited other undertakings and did not benefit Valmont. e
f

126. When questioned on that point at the hearing, the Commission confirmed, in clear terms, that that was indeed what was meant in the decision. It thus explained that 'the construction of the car park is of benefit to Valmont, but also a benefit to other undertakings, therefore the Commission considers that 50% of the costs of construction amount to State aid'. g

127. That must also be the interpretation as regards the Commission's written pleadings. It thus explained that 'once [it] had found that a number of neighbouring undertakings, under the gentlemen's agreement ... could use the [car park] in question, it could not properly consider that Valmont was the exclusive beneficiary' of that infrastructure (para 55 of the rejoinder). h

128. Consequently, while concluding that the second half of the financing in question could not be classified as state aid, since it did not benefit Valmont, the Commission also concluded that the first half of that financing, for its part, on the other hand amounted to state aid.

129. In that regard, it must be pointed out that the court has held that, where a state measure must be regarded as compensation for the services provided by the recipient undertakings in order to discharge public service obligations, so that those undertakings do not enjoy a real financial benefit and the measure thus does not have the effect of putting them in a more favourable competitive position than the undertakings competing with them, such a measure is not caught by art 87(1) EC (see the judgments of the Court of Justice in Altmark i a Trans GmbH v Nahverkehrsgesellschaft Altmark GmbH (Oberbundesanwalt beim Bundesverwaltungsgericht, third party) Case C-280/00 [2005] All ER (EC) 610, [2003] ECR I-7747 (para 87) and Enirisorse SpA v Ministero delle Finanze Joined cases C-34–38/01 [2003] ECR I-14243 (para 31)).

b 130. However, for such compensation to escape classification as state aid in a particular case, a number of conditions must be satisfied (see the Altmark Trans case (para 88) and the Enirisorse case (para 31)).

c 131. First, the recipient undertaking must actually have public service obligations to discharge, and the obligations must be clearly defined. Second, the parameters on the basis of which the compensation is calculated must be established in advance in an objective and transparent manner, to avoid it conferring an economic benefit which may favour the recipient undertaking over competing undertakings. Third, the compensation cannot exceed what is necessary to cover all or part of the costs incurred in the discharge of public service obligations, taking into account the relevant receipts and a reasonable profit for discharging those obligations. Fourth, where the undertaking which is to discharge public service obligations, in a specific case, is not chosen pursuant to a public procurement procedure, the level of compensation needed must be determined on the basis of an analysis of the costs which a typical undertaking, well run and adequately provided with means of transport so as to be able to meet the necessary public service requirements, would have incurred in discharging those obligations, taking into account the relevant receipts and a reasonable profit for discharging the obligations (see the Altmark Trans case (paras 89–95)).

f 132. In the present case, as has been stated above, it follows from the Commission's own assessments, which are not erroneous, that Valmont bears a burden in allowing others to use its car park in various ways regularly and free of charge, under an agreement concluded, in the public interest as much as in that of the third parties concerned, with a territorial authority. It is also apparent from those assessments that a portion of the financing granted by the territorial authority for the construction of that car park effectively benefits Valmont.

g 133. In those circumstances, the Commission could not automatically consider that that portion of the financing necessarily benefited Valmont but should first examine, in the light of the information available, whether or not that portion of the financing could be regarded as being in fact compensation for the burden borne by Valmont. To that end, it was required to ascertain whether the conditions set out in paras 130 and 131, above were satisfied.

h 134. However, the decision shows that the Commission merely considered that that portion of the financing benefited Valmont, and does not show at all that the Commission examined the question as to whether it could be regarded as being compensation for the burden borne by Valmont.

i 135. When asked at the hearing to state its views in that regard, the Commission claimed that the portion of the financing classified as state aid in the decision had rightly been so classified since it had been granted without expressly being made subject to the mandatory provision of specific services.

136. None the less, in so far as the Commission therefore suggests that the conditions necessary for that portion of the financing to escape being classified as state aid are not satisfied, it must be pointed out that it is not for the Community judicature to replace the Commission by carrying out in its stead an examination it never carried out and substituting the conclusions to which it then arrives.

137. It follows from the foregoing that the Commission has not established in the decision nor, furthermore, at the hearing, to the requisite legal standard that half of the financing granted to Valmont for it to construct a car park on its premises should be classified as state aid under art 87(1) EC. a

138. Article 1 of the decision must therefore be annulled in so far as it declares that the construction of the car park contains an element of state aid, without there being any need to examine the rest of the present plea in law or the other pleas in law put forward in that regard. Consequently, arts 2, 3 and 4 of that decision must also be annulled in so far as they concern the construction of the car park. b

139. It follows that the decision must be annulled in its entirety.

COSTS c

140. Under art 87(2) of the Rules of Procedure of the Court of First Instance, the unsuccessful party is to be ordered to pay the costs if they have been applied for in the other party's pleadings. As Valmont has applied for costs and the Commission has been unsuccessful, the Commission must be ordered to pay the costs. d

On those grounds, the Court of First Instance (Fourth Chamber, Extended Composition) hereby:

(1) Annuls Commission Decision (EC) 2002/142 (on the state aid implemented by the Netherlands in favour of Valmont Nederland BV);

(2) Orders the Commission to pay the costs. e a Criminal proceedings against Greenham and another

(Case C-95/01)

b COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (SIXTH CHAMBER) JUDGES SKOURIS (ACTING FOR THE PRESIDENT OF THE SIXTH CHAMBER), GULMANN, PUISOCHET, MACKEN (RAPPORTEUR) AND COLNERIC ADVOCATE GENERAL MISCHO

c 18 APRIL, 16 MAY 2002, 5 FEBRUARY 2004

d European Community – Freedom of movement – Goods – Restriction on freedom – Restrictions justified on grounds of protection of public health – Restriction on marketing foodstuffs intended for human consumption containing unauthorised additives – Whether restriction justifiable where same foodstuffs lawfully marketed in other member states – Articles 28, 30 EC (formerly EC Treaty, arts 30, 36).

In France, before the conditions under which nutrients might be added to foodstuffs had been laid down by Community legislation, a list was maintained, by reference to the opinion of the competent authorities, of substances with nutritional purposes which might lawfully be incorporated into foodstuffs intended for particular nutritional uses. The defendants were prosecuted for offences of marketing foodstuffs intended for human consumption which contained chemical products whose use had not been declared lawful. Before the national court, it was argued that, since the foodstuffs in question were already lawfully marketed in other member states, the national authorities could not prohibit their free movement and marketing in the national territory. The national court decided to stay the proceedings and refer for preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) a question concerning the compatibility with arts 28 EC<sup>a</sup> and 30 EC<sup>b</sup> of the prevention of the free movement and marketing of a food supplement lawfully sold in another member state.

g Held – Where, as in the main proceedings, nutrients such as vitamins or minerals, other than those whose use had been declared lawful in the member state concerned, had been added to foodstuffs lawfully manufactured and marketed in another member state, arts 28 and 30 EC did not preclude a member state from prohibiting the marketing of such foodstuffs without prior authorisation, provided: (i) that the prior authorisation procedure was readily accessible, capable of being completed within a reasonable time, and open to challenge in the courts; and (ii) that refusal to authorise marketing was based on a detailed assessment of the risk to public health, based upon the most reliable scientific data available and the most recent results of international i <sup>a</sup> Article 28 EC provides: 'Quantitative restrictions on imports and all measures having equivalent effect shall be prohibited between Member States.'

<sup>b</sup> Article 30 EC, so far as material, provides: 'The provisions of Articles 28 and 29 shall not preclude prohibitions or restrictions on imports, exports or goods in transit justified on grounds of ... the protection of health and life of humans ... Such prohibitions or restrictions shall not, however, constitute a means of arbitrary discrimination or a disguised restriction on trade between Member States.'

research. If, which was for the national court to check, the rules and principles flowing from the free movement of goods were applicable to the main proceedings, such rules as had been adopted might be justified, as a measure having equivalent effect to a quantitative restriction within the meaning of art 28 EC, in so far as they complied with the requirements of art 30 EC. A member state's discretion relating to the protection of public health for the purposes of art 30 EC was particularly wide where there remained uncertainty as to the current state of scientific research concerning certain nutrients, which were not, as a general rule harmful in themselves, but which might have special harmful effects solely if taken to excess as part of the general diet, the composition of which could not be foreseen or monitored. However, since the exercise of that discretion was subject to the principle of proportionality and the requirement that art 30 EC was to be applied strictly, in every case, a decision to prohibit the marketing of a fortified foodstuff, which was in fact the most restrictive obstacle to trade, might be adopted only if the alleged risk to public health appeared to be sufficiently established on the basis of the latest scientific data available. Where scientific uncertainty persisted, a member state might, in accordance with the precautionary principle, take protective measures without having to wait until the existence and gravity of those risks were demonstrated fully, provided that the risk assessment was not based on purely hypothetical considerations. In the main proceedings, it was for the referring court to determine whether, in the legal and factual circumstances, the prohibition on the marketing of the foodstuffs in question satisfied the requirements of Community law in order that the restriction on the free movement of goods might be justified (see judgment paras 33, 34, 37–40, 42, 43, 49, 50, below).

Notes

For justifications for restrictions on trade between member states, see 52 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) para 12-98.

For the EC Treaty, arts 28, 30 EC (formerly arts 30, 36), see 50 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) Current Statutes Service (issue 88) 363, 364.

Cases cited

- Bellon* (Criminal proceedings against) Case C-42/90 [1990] ECR I-4863, ECJ.
- Brandsma* (Criminal proceedings against) Case C-293/94 [1996] All ER (EC) 837, [1996] ECR I-3159, ECJ.
- Debus* (Criminal proceedings against) Joined cases C-13/91 and C-113/91 [1992] ECR I-3617, ECJ.
- EC Commission v France* Case C-216/84 [1988] ECR 793, ECJ.
- EC Commission v France* Case C-344/90 [1992] ECR I-4719, ECJ.
- EC Commission v Germany* Case 178/84 [1987] ECR 1227, ECJ.
- EFTA Surveillance Authority v Norway* E-3/00 [2001] 2 CMLR 1184, EFTA Ct.
- European Commission v Denmark* Case C-192/01 [2003] ECR I-9693, ECJ.
- European Commission v France* Case C-184/96 [1998] ECR I-6197, ECJ.
- European Commission v France* Case C-24/00 (2001) Transcript (opinion), 26 June, (2004) Transcript (judgment), 5 February, ECJ.
- European Commission v Germany* Case C-102/96 [1998] ECR I-6871, ECJ.
- Guimont* (Criminal proceedings against) Case C-448/98 [2000] ECR I-10663, ECJ.
- Harpegnies* (Criminal proceedings against) Case C-400/96 [1998] ECR I-5121, ECJ.
- Kainuun Liikenne Oy, Re* Case C-412/96 [1998] ECR I-5141, ECJ.

- a Ministère public v Mathot Case 98/86 [1987] ECR 809, ECJ.
Ministère public v Muller Case 304/84 [1986] ECR 1511, ECJ.
Monsanto Agricoltura Italia SpA v Presidenza del Consiglio dei Ministri Case C-236/01 [2003] ECR I-8105, ECJ.
Motte (Criminal proceedings against) Case 247/84 [1985] ECR 3887, ECJ.
- b Oosthoek's Uitgeversmaatschappij BV (Criminal proceedings against) Case 286/81 [1982] ECR 4575, ECJ.
Procureur du Roi v Dassonville Case 8/74 [1974] ECR 837, ECJ.
Pubblico Ministero v Ratti Case 148/78 [1979] ECR 1629, ECJ.
R v Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, ex p Hedley Lomas (Ireland) Ltd Case C-5/94 [1996] All ER (EC) 493, [1996] ECR I-2553, ECJ.
- c R v Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, ex p National Farmers' Union Case C-157/96 [1998] ECR I-2211, ECJ.
Rewe-Zentral AG v Bundesmonopolverwaltung für Branntwein Case 120/78 [1979] ECR 649, ECJ.
Rombi and Arkopharma SA (Criminal proceedings against) Case C-107/97 [2000] ECR I-3367, ECJ.
- d Sandoz BV (Criminal proceedings against) Case 174/82 [1983] ECR 2445, ECJ.
Società Agricola Fattoria Alimentare SpA v Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato Case C-337/88 [1990] ECR I-1, ECJ.
Société Civile Agricole du Centre d'Insémination de la Crespelle v Coopérative d'Élevage et d'Insemination Artificielle du Département de la Mayenne Case C-323/93 [1994] ECR I-5077, ECJ.
- e van Bennekom (Criminal proceedings against) Case 227/82 [1983] ECR 3883, ECJ.

Reference

By judgment of 19 February 2001, the Tribunal de Grande Instance de Paris (Regional Court, Paris) referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) a question on the interpretation of arts 28 and 30 EC (formerly arts 30 and 36 of the EC Treaty). That question was raised in the course of criminal proceedings against Mr John Greenham and Mr Léonard Abel, joint directors of NSA France SARL (hereinafter NSA France), whose seat is in Paris, France, which distributes foodstuffs from NSA International, a company established in the United Kingdom. Written observations were submitted on

- f behalf of: Mr Greenham and Mr Abel by M Jeannin, Avocat; the French government by G de Bergues and R Loosli-Surrans, acting as agents; the Greek government by S Spyropoulos, C Georgiadis and N Dafniou, acting as agents; the Spanish government by S Ortiz Vaamonde, acting as agent; the Commission of the European Communities by M Shotter and J Adda, acting as agents. Oral observations were made by Mr Greenham and Mr Abel, the French government, the Greek government and the Commission. The language of the case was French. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General.
- g
- h

- i 16 May 2002. The Advocate General (J Mischo) delivered the following opinion<sup>1</sup>.

1. The Tribunal de Grande Instance (Regional Court), Paris, France, asks whether arts 28 and 30 EC (formerly arts 30 and 36 of the EC Treaty) preclude national legislation which prohibits the marketing of a food supplement lawfully sold in another member state.

<sup>1</sup> Original language: French.

I—LEGAL BACKGROUND

A—Community law

2. There is no Community legislation which lays down the conditions governing the addition of nutrients to common foodstuffs. Some foodstuffs intended for particular nutritional uses are covered by directives adopted by the Commission of the European Communities on the basis of Council Directive (EEC) 398/89 (on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to foodstuffs intended for particular nutritional uses)<sup>2</sup>. These include products such as baby foods, meal substitutes, gluten-free foods or foods for sportsmen.

B—National provisions

3. The French legislation which applies to the marketing of food supplements and common foodstuffs enriched with vitamins, minerals and other nutrients such as amino acids is the Decree of 15 April 1912 implementing the Law of 1 August 1905 on fraud and falsification with respect to products or services relating to foodstuffs, and in particular meats, prepared meat products, fruits, vegetables, fish and preserved foods.

4. Article 1 of the Decree, as worded in Decree No 73-138 of 12 February 1973, provides:

'It is prohibited to possess with a view to sale, to make use of or to sell any goods and foodstuffs intended for human consumption to which chemical products have been added, other than those whose use is declared lawful by the orders made jointly by the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development, the Minister of Economics and Finance, the Minister of Industrial and Scientific Development and the Minister of Public Health, on the basis of the Opinion of the Conseil supérieur d'hygiène publique de France (French public health authority, hereinafter the CSHPF) and the Académie nationale de médecine (National Academy of Medicine).'

5. Decree No 99-242 of 26 March 1999 amended that decree by substituting the opinion of the Agence de Sécurité Sanitaire des Aliments (food safety agency, the AFSSA) for those of the CSHPF and the Académie National de Médecine.

6. Decree No 97-964 of 14 October 1997 was inserted into the Decree of 15 April 1912 and for the first time defines food supplements as—

'Products intended to be ingested as a supplement to traditional foods in order to make up for the real or assumed insufficiency of daily intake.'

II—THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTION REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

7. Mr Greenham and Mr Abel, defendants in the main proceedings and joint managers of the company NSA France SARL (hereinafter NSA France), are charged with having, in Paris in 1998 and in any case on the national territory during a period in respect of which criminal proceedings are not time-barred, committed two offences. First, they are charged with having displayed and offered for sale adulterated foodstuffs by marketing food supplements ('JUICE + mélange de légumes et de fruits') to which were added the substance 'coenzyme Q10', a chemical substance whose use in human food is not authorised in France, and vitamins in amounts greater than the daily

<sup>2</sup> OJ 1989 L186 p 27.

a recommended intake or in excess of the safety limits set by the CSHPF. They are also charged with having misled consumers in regard to product quality by marketing meal substitutes ('JUICE + Lite, arôme chocolate et arôme vanille') which do not comply with the requirements laid down in Commission Directive (EC) 96/8 (on foods intended for use in energy-restricted diets for weight reduction)<sup>3</sup>, in particular because the energy they provide is below the threshold set in the legislation and they are deficient in certain minerals.

b 8. Those actions follow upon a series of samples taken by the Direction Générale de la Concurrence, de la Consommation et de la Répression des Fraudes (hereinafter the DGCCRF) of the above-mentioned products, marketed in France by NSA France. The laboratories of the DGCCRF established their non-compliance.

c 9. The defendants in the main proceedings claimed, before the referring court, that the products in question were already in circulation in the European Union, and in particular in the United Kingdom, when they took up their posts, and that coenzyme Q10 has been in free circulation in Spain and Italy since 1995 and was still in free circulation in 2000 in Germany and the United Kingdom. They therefore maintained that the French authorities were not entitled to prevent the free movement and the marketing of those products.

d 10. Since it considered that the decision in the case before it required the interpretation of arts 28 and 30 EC, the Tribunal de Grande Instance de Paris, decided to stay proceedings and to refer the following question to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

e 'Must Articles 28 and 30 of the Treaty be interpreted as prohibiting a Member State from preventing the free movement and marketing of a food supplement lawfully sold in another Member State?'

III—ANALYSIS

f Preliminary observations

11. In view of certain statements or requests put forward during the proceedings before the court, three preliminary observations are in order.

12. First, the French government is uncertain as to the applicability, in the present case, of art 28 EC. It considers, first, that the referring court makes no mention of Mr Greenham and Mr Abel being engaged in importing.

g 13. Second, it points out that it is settled case law that a national measure falls under that article only in so far as it applies to situations connected with the importation of goods in intra-Community trade<sup>4</sup>.

h 14. Therefore, referring to the judgment in Criminal proceedings against Rombi and Arkopharma SA<sup>5</sup>, where the court held (at para 72) that it 'is not in a position to determine whether the rules and principles relating to the free movement of goods apply to an activity of the kind at issue in the main proceedings', on the grounds that 'it is not apparent from the documents in the main proceedings that the activity carried on by Arkopharma involved either exporting or importing the products concerned', the French government makes its observations subject to the referring court's verifying whether the above-mentioned condition for the applicability of art 28 EC is satisfied.

i

3 OJ 1996 L55 p 22.

4 See the judgments in Criminal proceedings against Oosthoek's Uitgeversmaatschappij BV Case 286/81 [1982] ECR 4575 (para 9), Ministère public v Mathot Case 98/86 [1987] ECR 809 (paras 3, 7-9), Criminal proceedings against Guimont Case C-448/98 [2000] ECR I-10663 (para 21).

5 Case C-107/97 [2000] ECR I-3367.

15. It does appear from the written observations by Mr Greenham and Mr Abel that they imported the contested products from the United Kingdom. They state that '[o]n 23 March 1998, the [DGCCRF] carried out an inspection at the premises of the Société NSA France (National Safety Association), which distributes products coming from the Société NSA International, a British company with its headquarters in Camberley—Surrey, 80 Park Street'<sup>6</sup>. In addition, it emerges from the DGCCRF's report of 30 December 1998 on the offence that 'the products are in fact stored in a Dutch warehouse'.

16. I must therefore base my reply to the question referred by the national court on the assumption that the products were imported from another member state.

17. Second, the French government and the Commission point out—correctly, in my opinion—that although, in the case which is the subject of the reference, the proceedings relate to both food supplements and meal substitutes, the question asked by the referring court concerns only food supplements.

18. Although the referring court does not explain the reason for this, it seems to me that the reasons lie in the fact that, as can be inferred from the order for reference, Directive 96/8 applies to the meal substitutes in issue.

19. If such is the case, art 30 EC, to which the question referred for a preliminary ruling is specifically directed, is no longer applicable. It is settled case law that, where Community directives provide for harmonisation of the measures necessary to achieve the specific objective laid down in art 30 EC, that article cannot be applied<sup>7</sup>.

20. I shall therefore not take a view on the interpretation of arts 28 and 30 EC in the light of national legislation such as that which applies in France to food supplements.

21. Third, Mr Greenham and Mr Abel ask the court to rule on the application to the present case of Directive 96/8.

22. They claim that, since the inspection of meal substitutes at the premises of NSA France was carried out by the DGCCRF before France transposed Directive 96/8, it follows directly from art 6 of that directive that the prohibition on trade in non-compliant products did not apply until after 31 March 1999, which is later than the establishment of the facts by the DGCCRF.

23. Suffice it to observe, once again, that the referring court has not submitted any question relating to the meal substitutes which are the subject of Directive 96/8, although the right to determine the questions to be put to the court devolves upon the national court alone<sup>8</sup>.

24. I therefore consider that it is not for me to take a view on the interpretation of that directive.

6 Emphasis added by the author.

7 See the judgments in Pubblico Ministero v Ratti Case 148/78 [1979] ECR 1629 (para 36), Société Civile Agricole du Centre d'Insémination de la Crespelle v Coopérative d'Élevage et d'Insemination Artificielle du Département de la Mayenne Case C-323/93 [1994] ECR I-5077 (para 31), R v Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, ex p Hedley Lomas (Ireland) Ltd Case C-5/94 [1996] All ER (EC) 493, [1996] ECR I-2553 (para 18) and European Commission v Germany Case C-102/96 [1998] ECR I-6871 (para 21).

8 See, inter alia, Società Agricola Fattoria Alimentare SpA v Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato Case C-337/88 [1990] ECR I-1 (para 20) and Re Kainuun Liikenne Oy Case C-412/96 [1998] ECR I-5141 (paras 23, 24).

a The question referred for a preliminary ruling

25. The referring court asks whether arts 28 and 30 EC are to be interpreted as prohibiting a member state from preventing the free movement and marketing of a food supplement lawfully sold in another member state.

b 26. Formulated in such absolute terms, the question calls for a negative answer. As the Greek government has most judiciously pointed out, the mere fact that a particular food supplement is freely marketed in other member states is not in itself sufficient for authorisation of its marketing to be imposed automatically, that is to say for that reason alone, in the member state concerned.

c 27. It is sufficient in that regard to refer to the judgment in Rewe-Zentral AG v Bundesmonopolverwaltung für Branntwein, known as the 'Cassis de Dijon' judgment<sup>9</sup>, where the court held, it is true, in the operative part, that '[t]he concept of "measures having an effect equivalent to quantitative restrictions on imports"' contained in art 30 of the EEC Treaty was to be understood as meaning that 'the fixing of a minimum alcohol content for alcoholic beverages intended for human consumption by the legislation of a Member State also falls within the prohibition laid down in that provision where the importation of alcoholic beverages lawfully produced and marketed in another Member State is concerned'. However, that was because the court had first established that the requirement in question did not serve a purpose in the general interest such as to take precedence over the requirements of the free movement of goods.

e 28. In para 8 of that judgment, the court held that obstacles to movement within the Community resulting from disparities between the national laws relating to the marketing of the products in question must be accepted in so far as those provisions may be recognised as being necessary in order to satisfy overriding requirements relating in particular to the effectiveness of fiscal supervision, the protection of public health, fair trading and consumer protection.

f 29. However, it must above all be borne in mind that, under art 30 EC—

g '[t]he provisions of Articles 28 and 29 shall not preclude prohibitions or restrictions on imports, exports or goods in transit justified on grounds of ... the protection of health and life of humans ... Such prohibitions or restrictions shall not, however, constitute a means of arbitrary discrimination or a disguised restriction on trade between Member States.'

h 30. In the present case, the prohibition on the marketing of the food supplements at issue appears to have been motivated specifically by a concern for 'the protection of health and life of humans' within the meaning of art 30 EC.

i 31. It is clear from the order for reference that criminal proceedings were brought against Mr Greenham and Mr Abel because 'the DGCCRF laboratory established the non-conformity ... of the food supplements JUICE + mélange de légumes and JUICE + mélange de fruits as the result of the addition of coenzyme Q10 and excessive amounts of several vitamins'. The referring court also makes it clear that 'the addition of [coenzyme Q10] is prohibited in food supplements'.

32. It is thus necessary to analyse in greater detail the conditions under which, according to the court's case law, a member state may under art 30 EC rely on the protection of the health and life of humans in imposing a restriction on the free movement of goods.

33. I shall subsequently consider, in the alternative, whether the absence of a nutritional need can justify an import prohibition. Finally, I shall present some observations on two other questions which have arisen in the course of the present proceedings.

1. The protection of the health and life of persons

34. It is clear from the court's case law<sup>10</sup> that, inasmuch as there are uncertainties in the present state of scientific research with regard to the harmfulness of food additives, it is for the member states, in the absence of full harmonisation, to decide what degree of protection of the health and life of humans they intend to assure, having regard for the requirements of the free movement of goods within the Community.

35. It is also clear from the court's case law, especially the judgments in the Sandoz case, cited above, Criminal proceedings against Motte<sup>11</sup>, Ministère public v Muller<sup>12</sup> and EC Commission v Germany, known as the 'Beer Purity Law' judgment<sup>13</sup>, that Community law does not preclude the adoption by the member states of legislation whereby the use of additives is subjected to prior authorisation granted by a measure of general application for specific additives, in respect of all products, for certain products only or for certain uses. This is also true of the fixing of a maximum level for the use of an additive in certain products. Such legislation meets a legitimate need of health policy, namely that of restricting the uncontrolled consumption of food additives.

36. Nevertheless, the principle of proportionality which underlies the last sentence of art 30 EC requires that the power of the member states to prohibit imports of products from other member states should be restricted to what is necessary to attain the objectives of protection being legitimately pursued<sup>14</sup>.

37. The case law of the court also makes clear that it is the responsibility of the competent national authorities to prove that a substance is harmful. It is for them to demonstrate, in each case, that their legislation is necessary in order effectively to protect the interests referred to in art 30 EC and, in particular, that the marketing of the product in question poses a risk to public health<sup>15</sup>. In so doing, they are to take account of the findings of international scientific research, and in particular of the work of the Community's Scientific Committee for Food, the Codex Alimentarius Committee of the FAO [Food

10 See, inter alia, Criminal proceedings against Sandoz BV Case 174/82 [1983] ECR 2445, Criminal Proceedings against Debus Joined Cases C-13/91 and C-113/91 [1992] ECR I-3617, Criminal Proceedings against Brandsma Case C-293/94 [1996] All ER (EC) 837, [1996] ECR I-3159, Criminal Proceedings against Harpegnies Case C-400/96 [1998] ECR I-5121.

11 Case 247/84 [1985] ECR 3887.

12 Case 304/84 [1986] ECR 1511.

13 Case 178/84 [1987] ECR 1227.

14 See Harpegnies' case, cited in footnote 10, above (para 34).

15 See Muller's case, cited in footnote 12, above (para 25), Commission v Germany Case 178/84, cited in footnote 13, above (para 46), Criminal proceedings against Bellon Case C-42/90 [1990] ECR I-4863 (para 16) and Debus' case, cited in footnote 10, above (paras 17, 18).

a and Agriculture Organisation (of the United Nations)] and the World Health Organisation, and of the eating habits<sup>16</sup> prevailing in the importing member state<sup>17</sup>.

38. In my opinion, this does not mean, however, that a member state is required to prove with complete certainty the existence of a serious risk. It is sufficient that it provide specific and plausible arguments that the protection of public health is jeopardised<sup>18</sup>.

b 39. There are areas in which scientific research is not yet sufficiently advanced for it to be possible to determine with certainty the quantities and concentrations at which certain substances might become harmful and the exact effects to which they might give rise.

c 40. Scientific uncertainty, inter alia in the field of vitamins<sup>19</sup>, has, moreover, led the court to allow the member states considerable latitude.

d 41. Thus, in the judgment in the Sandoz case, cited above, although it first (at para 18) set out the principle that 'national rules providing for ... a prohibition [on imports] are justified only if authorizations to market are granted when they are compatible with the need to protect health', the court subsequently recognised (at para 19) that '[s]uch an assessment is, however, difficult to make in relation to additives such as vitamins' and concluded, finally, (at para 20) that 'Community law permits national rules prohibiting without prior authorization the marketing of foodstuffs lawfully marketed in another Member State to which vitamins have been added', adding merely that 'the marketing [is to be] authorized when the addition of vitamins meets a real need, especially a technical or nutritional one'.

e 42. Since then, that prudent approach has been confirmed by the Commission and the Council. Common Position (EC) 18/2002 adopted on 3 December 2001 by the Council, with a view to adopting a Directive of the European Parliament and of the Council on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to food supplements<sup>20</sup>, reads as follows:

f 'Only vitamins and minerals normally found in, and consumed as part of, the diet should be allowed to be present in food supplements although this does not mean that their presence therein is necessary. Controversy as to the identity of those nutrients that could potentially arise should be avoided. Therefore it is appropriate to establish a positive list of those vitamins and minerals.' (See para (9) of the preamble.)

g And:

h 'Excessive intake of vitamins and minerals may result in adverse effects and therefore necessitate the setting of maximum safe levels for them in food supplements, as appropriate. Those levels must ensure that the i 16 The Greek government also pointed out that climatic conditions might also play a role; thus, vitamin E will be absorbed differently according to the amount of sun a country receives.

17 See the judgments in Motte's case, cited in footnote 11, above (para 24), Muller's case, cited in footnote 12, above (para 24); and Commission v Germany Case 178/84, cited in footnote 13, above (para 44).

18 See the opinion in European Commission v France Case C-24/00 (2001) Transcript (opinion), 26 June, (2004) Transcript (judgment), 5 February (para 131).

19 See the Sandoz case, cited in footnote 10, above, and Criminal proceedings against van Bennekom Case 227/82 [1983] ECR 3883 (paras 36–38).

20 OJ 2002 C90 E p 1.

normal use of the products under the instructions of use provided by the manufacturer will be safe for the consumer.' (See para (13) of the preamble.) a

43. Until that directive has been adopted and maximum limits set by the Commission under the relevant legislation, member states are obviously entitled to apply those criteria in their national legislation. b

44. In that context, reference can also be made, as has been done by several participants in the present proceedings, to the judgment of the Court of the European Free Trade Association (the EFTA Court) of 5 April 2001<sup>21</sup>, which appears to me to confirm the prudent approach advisable in the matter. That court held as follows:

'29. The national authority must address the issue of the protection of health and life of humans. A purely hypothetical or academic consideration will not suffice. It is not only the specific effects of the marketing of a single product with a set amount of additives that are relevant. It may be appropriate to take into account the aggregate effect of the presence in the market of a number of natural or artificial supply sources of a given nutrient, and of the possibility of future additional sources that can reasonably be foreseen. c

30. In many cases, the assessment of such questions will show that there is a great measure of scientific and practical uncertainty linked to the issue under consideration. A proper application of the precautionary principle presupposes, first, an identification of potentially negative health consequences arising, in the present case, from a proposed fortification, and, secondly, a comprehensive evaluation of the risk to health based on the most recent scientific information. d

31. When the insufficiency, or the inconclusiveness, or the imprecise nature of the conclusions to be drawn from those considerations make it impossible to determine with certainty the risk of hazard, but the likelihood of considerable harm still persists were the negative eventuality to occur, the precautionary principle would justify the taking of restrictive measures.' e

45. It follows from all the foregoing considerations that it is for the referring court to determine whether the competent national authorities have demonstrated, in light of prevailing national eating habits and of the results of international scientific research, whether prohibiting the addition of coenzyme Q10 and of excessive vitamin content (within the meaning of the applicable national legislation) in the food supplements at issue is necessary in order to protect the health and life of persons. f

46. In carrying out that assessment, the national court must take into consideration the fact that the national authorities are entitled to refer to the precautionary principle. That means that a member state may have recourse to art 30 EC where it has serious suspicions but no certainty as to the danger posed by a substance, but where serious harm could occur if the suspicion proved to be correct. g

47. Mr Greenham and Mr Abel also refer to several factual elements which they claim demonstrate that the prohibition at issue is not justified by the protection of public health, and they ask the court to find that such is the case. h a 48. However, such an assessment goes beyond the framework of the present reference, which concerns only the interpretation of the Community provisions on which the national court has put its question to this court. In any case, the referring court has not provided us with any information which would enable us to take a view on the question of whether, in concrete terms, the contested prohibition is justified by the protection of public health.

<sup>21</sup> EFTA Surveillance Authority v Norway E-3/00 [2001] 2 CMLR 1184. i

b
2. The absence of nutritional need

49. Until now, my analysis has dealt with the exception relating to the protection of the health and life of persons laid down in art 30 EC.

c 50. The Commission, however, also touches on the question whether a restriction on the free movement of a foodstuff may be justified by the absence of nutritional need relating to one or more of the substances incorporated in that foodstuff, and it proposes that the court should rule on that point in its reply to the question referred for a preliminary ruling.

d 51. Referring to the judgment of the EFTA Court, cited above, the Commission considers that only the existence of a risk to public health, and not the mere fact that the addition of the substances at issue do not respond to a nutritional need, can justify a restrictive measure such as that at issue in the main proceedings under art 30 EC.

e 52. I would note, in that regard, that the order for reference contains no indication that the prohibition on marketing the foodstuffs at issue was justified by the absence of a nutritional need for coenzyme Q10 or the vitamin content of those foodstuffs. It thus appears to me that it is not necessary for the court to deal with that problem in its judgment. For what it is worth, however, I should like to make the following observations on that matter.

53. In its judgment, cited above, the EFTA Court stated as follows:

f '27. The need to safeguard public health has been recognised as, and remains, a primary concern, and the level of protection chosen by the Contracting Parties should not be placed in question. However, the principle of proportionality must be respected.

g 28. In that process, the question of nutritional need with regard to additives to foodstuffs in any given population may have a proper place. Indeed, the most authoritative definition of "fortification and enrichment" is directly linked to this element (See Codex Alimentarius General Principles for the Addition of Essential Nutrients to Foods ...). However, under the requirement of proportionality, the need to safeguard public health must be balanced against the principle of the free movement of goods. The mere finding by a national authority of the absence of nutritional need will not justify an import ban, a most restrictive measure, on a product which is freely traded in other EEA States.'<sup>22</sup>

h 54. The EFTA Court thus accepts that nutritional need can play a role, but that that role is to be assessed in the context of the principle of proportionality.

55. In the case before it, the EFTA Court finally held that the Kingdom of Norway had failed to fulfil its obligations for the following two reasons:

i —its approach was inconsistent because, while prohibiting the marketing of 'corn flakes' fortified with iron, it permitted a type of cheese to which a sizeable amount of iron had been added to be sold freely in the country;

—it did not carry out a comprehensive assessment of the risk which the addition of iron to foodstuffs might entail. a

56. In its own case law, the Court of Justice has approached the problem of nutritional needs in two different contexts.

57. In EC Commission v France<sup>23</sup>, the court considered the case of a member state which had invoked public health grounds in order to prohibit the importation of a product<sup>24</sup>, its reasoning being that nutritional value for that product was lower or its fat content higher than another product already available on the market in question<sup>25</sup>. b

58. The court held that public health grounds could not be invoked in such a case, since—

'[i]t is plain that the choice of foodstuffs available to consumers in the Community is such that the mere fact that an imported product has a lower nutritional value does not pose a real threat to human health. Moreover, as the Commission has pointed out without being contradicted by the French Government, there are products on the market in France which are also of lower nutritional value or are composed substantially of the same fats used in milk substitutes yet there is no ban on marketing them.'<sup>26</sup> c

59. At issue in that case was a product obtained from natural substances whose nutritional value was simply lower than that of competing products. It was totally inconceivable that that could constitute a valid ground for prohibiting imports. d

60. In a whole series of other cases, in contrast, the court was confronted with chemical substances which had been added to foodstuffs on the ground that this met a real need, in particular a technological or dietary need. e

61. It should be recalled that, in particular in Debus' case, cited above, the court held that—

'Community law does not preclude the adoption by the Member States of legislation whereby the use of additives is subjected to prior authorization granted by a measure of general application for specific additives, in respect of all products, for certain products only or for certain uses. This is also true of the fixing of a maximum level for the use of an additive in certain products. Such legislation meets a legitimate need of health policy, namely that of restricting the uncontrolled consumption of food additives.'<sup>27</sup> f

62. It unquestionably follows from that case law that the member states are entitled to control and, in so far as is necessary, restrict the use of additives in foodstuffs and that they can do so by means of a system based on the principle that everything which is not authorised is prohibited. g

63. In addition, as regards chemical substances, it appears to follow from the court's case law that the existence of a genuine threat to public health is not h

<sup>23</sup> Case C-216/84 [1988] ECR 793. i

<sup>24</sup> It concerned a powdered milk substitute composed of vegetable fats.

<sup>25</sup> Classic powdered milk.

<sup>26</sup> See Commission v France, cited in footnote 23, above (para 15).

<sup>27</sup> See Debus' case, cited in footnote 10, above (para 14). My emphasis. See also the judgments cited above in the Sandoz case (para 17) and Commission v Germany Case 178/84 (para 42).

a the only factor which a member state can take into account. In para 17 of Debus<sup>28</sup> case, cited above, the court made clear that—

‘the use of a specific additive which is authorized in another Member State must be authorized in the case of a product imported from that Member State where ... the additive in question does not present a risk to b public health and meets a real need, especially a technological one.’<sup>28</sup>

64. In EC Commission v France<sup>29</sup>, concerning the addition of nitrate to cheese, the court held that—

‘an application to have an additive included on the list in question may be rejected by the competent administrative authorities only if the additive does not meet any genuine need, in particular a technological need, or presents a danger to public health.’<sup>30</sup>

c
65. The court therefore appears to consider that, even if a substance does not present a risk to public health, the marketing of the foodstuff in which it is incorporated can nevertheless be prohibited if that substance does not meet a genuine need.

d 66. There is no doubt that the concept of ‘real need’ also covers that of ‘nutritional need’. In para 20 of the judgment in the Sandoz case, cited above, the court explicitly referred to ‘a real need, especially a technical or nutritional one’<sup>31</sup>.

e 67. It also seems to me that the approach taken in Commission v France, cited above, according to which a health threat is not the only criterion to be taken into account, finds an echo in para (11) of the preamble to Common Position 18/2002, in which it is stated that ‘[t]he chemical substances used as sources of vitamins and minerals in the manufacture of food supplements should be safe and also be available to be used by the body’.

f 68. Finally, it should be observed that the concept of ‘nutritional need’ is no stranger to the positive law of the Community now in force. Article 1(3) of Commission Directive (EC) 2001/15 (on substances that may be added for specific nutritional purposes in foods for particular nutritional uses)<sup>32</sup> reads as follows:

g ‘The use of nutritional substances in foods for particular nutritional uses shall result in the manufacture of safe products that fulfil the particular nutritional requirements of the persons for whom they are intended as established by generally accepted scientific data.’<sup>33</sup>

h 69. The two texts which I have just cited tend to confirm the conclusion which I think can be drawn from the court’s judgment in Commission v France Case C-344/90, cited above: namely, that artificial substances incorporated in foodstuffs must not only be risk-free but must also serve a useful purpose.

70. That rather contradicts the argument of the Commission that the absence of nutritional need can never in itself justify a prohibition on imports.

i 28 My emphasis. See also the judgments in Muller’s case, cited in footnote 12, above (para 25), Commission v Germany Case 178/84, cited in footnote 13, above (para 44) and Bellon’s case, cited in footnote 15, above (para 14).

29 Case C-344/90 [1992] ECR I-4719.

30 See Commission v France, cited above (para 10). My emphasis.

31 My emphasis.

32 OJ 2001 L52 p 19.

33 My emphasis.

71. One has the distinct impression that, for the Community legislature, as for the court, the incorporation of chemical substances in foodstuffs must, as far as possible, be avoided, even if the harmfulness of a given substance is not proven. It is as if they were all potentially dangerous.

72. One might, therefore, be tempted to conclude that, until a positive list of authorised substances has been drawn up at Community level, national authorities are entitled to prohibit not only dangerous substances (including those to be treated as such in the application of the precautionary principle) but also those which can be proved not to satisfy any genuine nutritional need.

73. For my part, I would prefer an intermediate solution inspired by the Sandoz case, cited above, whereby, in the presence of scientific uncertainty as to the harmfulness of a 'nutrient'<sup>34</sup> and apart from cases where the precautionary principle might apply, member states must authorise the 'nutrient' in question when it meets a genuine nutritional need and may, conversely, prohibit it when it does not meet such a need.

3. Easily accessible procedure

74. Mr Greenham and Mr Abel also request the court to find that the national legislation at issue infringes arts 28 and 30 EC in that traders cannot obtain an authorisation under a procedure which is easily accessible and which can be concluded within a reasonable time.

75. It does indeed follow from the case law of the court that authorisation to market products is to be granted according to a procedure which is easily accessible to traders, can be completed within a reasonable period and which, if it leads to a rejection, enables that rejection to be challenged before the courts<sup>35</sup>.

76. Nevertheless, as can be inferred from the order for reference and as the French government confirms in the present case, Mr Greenham and Mr Abel marketed the products at issue without having first lodged an application which could have been investigated by the French competent authorities.

77. The detailed rules of the French authorisation procedure are thus not at issue in the main proceedings and it is therefore not necessary to go more closely into that question.

4. The mutual recognition clause

78. Finally, Mr Greenham and Mr Abel, referring to European Commission v France<sup>36</sup>, request the court to find that the French Republic has failed to include in its legislation any mutual recognition clause which would allow the marketing on French territory of food supplements freely marketed in other member states.

79. In that regard, I should like to refer to my opinion of 26 June 2001, cited above, where I concluded that arts 28 and 30 EC do not impose the inclusion of a mutual recognition clause in national legislation such as Decree No 73-138, which refers to 'all goods and foodstuffs intended for human consumption to which chemical products have been added'<sup>37</sup>.

<sup>34</sup> As opposed to an 'additive', the term 'nutrient' is used in Common Position 18/2002.

<sup>35</sup> See the judgments cited above in Muller's case (para 26), Bellon's case (paras 16, 17) and Commission v France Case C-344/90 (para 9).

<sup>36</sup> Case C-184/96 [1998] ECR I-6197.

<sup>37</sup> See paras 27-64.

a V—CONCLUSION

80. In the light of the foregoing considerations, I propose the following reply to the question on which the Tribunal de Grande Instance de Paris, seeks a preliminary ruling:

b Articles 28 and 30 EC are to be interpreted as precluding national legislation which prohibits the free movement and marketing of a food supplement lawfully sold in another member state, unless an overriding requirement can justify restricting or even prohibiting the marketing of the product. In that case, the measures taken must be necessary and proportionate to the objective. In assessing whether those measures can be justified on the ground of the protection of the health and life of persons

c laid down in art 30 EC, the national court must determine whether the national authorities have carried out a risk assessment relating to the substances at issue in accordance with the latest scientific information available and with the eating habits prevailing in the member state in question.

d 5 February 2004. The COURT OF JUSTICE (Sixth Chamber) delivered the following judgment.

1. By judgment of 19 February 2001, received at the Court of Justice of the European Communities on 27 February 2001, the Tribunal de Grande Instance de Paris (Regional Court, Paris) referred to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty)

e a question on the interpretation of arts 28 and 30 EC (formerly arts 30 and 36 of the EC Treaty).

2. That question was raised in the course of criminal proceedings against Mr Greenham and Mr Abel, joint directors of NSA France SARL (hereinafter NSA France), whose seat is in Paris, France, which distributes foodstuffs

f from NSA International, a company established in the United Kingdom.

LEGAL BACKGROUND

Community legislation

3. It is common ground that at the time of the facts which gave rise to the main proceedings there were no provisions of Community legislation laying

g down the conditions under which nutrients, such as vitamins and minerals, could be added to foodstuffs for daily consumption.

4. As regards foodstuffs intended for particular nutritional uses, some are now covered by directives adopted by the Commission of the European Communities under Council Directive (EEC) 89/398 (on the approximation of

h the laws of the member states relating to foodstuffs intended for particular nutritional uses) (OJ 1989 L186 p 27).

National legislation

5. Article L 213-1 of the French Code de la Consommation (Consumer

i Code), in the version applicable to the main proceedings provides:

'Anyone, whether or not a party to the contract, who by any means or conduct whatsoever, even through a third party, deceives or attempts to deceive a contracting party:

1. as to the nature, type, origin, material qualities, composition or content in active principles of any goods

2. as to the quantity of items delivered or as to their identity by delivering goods other than those specified as the subject-matter of the contract, or a

3. as to fitness for use, the risks inherent in the product's use, the checks made, the methods of use or the precautions to be taken

shall be liable to imprisonment for two years or to a fine of FRF 250 000 or to both.' b

6. The French legislation applicable to the marketing of food supplements and foodstuffs for daily consumption fortified with vitamins, minerals and other nutrients such as amino acids is the Decree of 15 April 1912 laying down administrative regulations for implementing the Law of 1 August 1905 to prevent deception in the sale of goods and adulteration of foodstuffs relating to victuals, and particularly meat, prepared meat products, fruit, vegetables, fish and preserved foods. c

7. Article 1 of the decree, as amended by Decree No 73-138 of 12 February 1973 (JORF of 15 February 1973, p 1728), provides:

'It shall be an offence to possess with a view to sale, to put on sale or to sell any goods or foodstuffs intended for human consumption to which chemical products have been added other than those whose use has been declared lawful by orders made jointly by the Minister for Agriculture and Rural Development, the Minister for the Economy and Finance, the Minister for Industrial and Scientific Development and the Minister for Public Health, on the advice of the Conseil supérieur d'hygiène publique de France (French Public Health Authority, the CSHPF) and the Académie nationale de médecine (National Academy of Medicine).' d

8. Decree No 99-242 of 26 March 1999 (JORF of 28 March 1999, p 4653) amended the Decree of 15 April 1912 by substituting the advice of the Agence Française de Sécurité Sanitaire des Aliments (French Food Safety Agency, AFSSA) for that of the CSHPF and the Académie Nationale de Médecine. e

9. Article 1 of Decree No 91-827 of 29 August 1991 on foodstuffs intended for particular nutritional uses (JORF of 31 August 1991, p 11424) provides:

'Foodstuffs are regarded as being intended for particular nutritional uses if, as a result of their particular composition or of a particular process in their manufacture, they are clearly different from foodstuffs for daily consumption, are suitable for the stated nutritional purpose and are marketed in such a way as to indicate that they fulfil that purpose.' f

10. Article 3 of the same decree reads as follows: g

'Joint orders made by the ministers responsible for consumer affairs, agriculture and health after obtaining the opinion of the [CSHPF], shall determine: h

(a) The list and conditions for use of substances with a nutritional purpose, such as vitamins, minerals, amino acids and other substances, which it is lawful to incorporate in foodstuffs intended for particular nutritional uses, as well as the standards of purity which are applicable to those substances ...' i

11. Decree No 97-964 of 14 October 1997 (JORF of 21 October 1997, p 15266), which supplements the Decree of 15 April 1912, defines, for the first

- a time, food supplements as 'products intended to be ingested in addition to the daily diet, in order to compensate for an actual or presumed insufficiency of daily intake'.

THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTION REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

- b 12. Mr Greenham and Mr Abel were prosecuted for having committed, in the course of 1998, two offences relating to the sale of foodstuffs.

13. First, they were charged with having displayed and put on sale allegedly adulterated foodstuffs by marketing products (food supplements 'Juice Plus + vegetable mixture' and 'Juice Plus + fruit mixture') to which had been added the substance 'coenzyme Q10', a nutrient whose addition is not authorised in France for human consumption, and vitamins in quantities exceeding that of the recommended daily intake or exceeding the safety limits laid down by the CSHPF.

- d 14. Secondly, they were prosecuted for having misled consumers, in particular as to the material quality of the products, by marketing meal substitutes 'Juice Plus + Lite, chocolate and vanilla flavour' which do not comply with the regulatory requirements applicable with regard to Commission Directive (EC) 96/8 (on foods intended for use in energy-restricted diets for weight reduction) (OJ 1996 L55 p 22), particularly because of an energy rating lower than the threshold set by the regulations and a deficiency of certain minerals.

- e 15. The charges were based on two samples taken on 23 March 1998 by the Directorate-General for Competition, Consumers and Prevention of Fraud from foodstuffs marketed in France by NSA France.

- f 16. Before the referring court, the defendants in the main proceedings argued, first, that the foodstuffs in question were already lawfully marketed in the other member states of the European Union when they took up their posts, and, secondly, that coenzyme Q10 is permitted in, among others, Spain, Italy, Germany and the United Kingdom. Therefore, the French authorities could not prohibit the free movement and the marketing of those foodstuffs in France.

- g 17. Since it considered that the outcome of the proceedings before it required an interpretation of arts 28 and 30 EC, the Tribunal de Grande Instance de Paris decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following question to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

'Must Articles 28 and 30 of the Treaty be interpreted as prohibiting a Member State from preventing the free movement and marketing of a food supplement lawfully sold in another Member State?'

- h THE QUESTION REFERRED

Observations submitted to the court

- i 18. The defendants in the main proceedings maintain that national legislation such as that at issue in the main proceedings, which precludes the free marketing of food supplements lawfully marketed in another member state although no serious health risk has been proved, constitutes a measure having equivalent effect to a quantitative restriction, contrary to arts 28 and 30 EC.

19. They submit that the French authorities have been unable to prove that the national legislation is necessary in order to avoid a serious risk to public health and that it cannot be replaced by a measure which is less restrictive of intra-Community trade, such as labelling.

20. In addition, they argue that, contrary to the requirements of Community law, traders cannot obtain authorisation to market those food supplements by a readily accessible procedure which can be completed within a reasonable time. a

21. The French government submits that a system prohibiting marketing without authorisation is compatible with Community law if it meets certain requirements laid down thereby. The authorisation procedure must be readily accessible, capable of being completed within a reasonable time and permit refusals to be challenged before the courts. b

22. It points out that in the main case no application for authorisation was submitted by NSA France, which, indeed, deliberately proceeded to market the products in question without having previously submitted an application which could have been examined by the French authorities.

23. The Greek government submits that the mere fact that a particular food supplement is freely marketed in other member states is not sufficient for its marketing to be permitted automatically in the member state concerned without undergoing the authorisation procedure provided for for that purpose by the rules in force in that member state. The relevant national provisions can and should lay down certain conditions for authorising the marketing of food supplements, whether they are produced in the member state concerned or imported from another member state. Such conditions can consist of a procedure for prior authorisation. c
d

24. Whilst refraining from taking a position on the question referred, the Spanish government observes that under its own food legislation none of the products which are the subject of the question referred is regarded as a foodstuff and that, therefore, they cannot be marketed freely on the Spanish foodstuffs market. Moreover, the addition of coenzyme Q10 is not provided for in that legislation. e

25. The Commission submits that the addition to foodstuffs of a particular nutrient allowed in another member state must be permitted in a product imported from that state provided that, taking account of the results of international scientific research and the nutritional habits in the member state where it is imported, the nutrient does not pose a risk for public health. f

26. According to the Commission, it is for the national court to decide whether the competent authorities of the member state concerned have evaluated the risks relating to the nutrients in question, thus enabling them to decide whether the legislation relating to such nutrients is necessary for the effective protection of public health. g

27. With regard to the main proceedings, it states that the referring judgment gives no indication as to either the safety limits fixed by the CSHPF for the consumption of vitamins or how those limits were established.

28. In relation to coenzyme Q10, the Commission submits that no information has been produced concerning the public health risks which the addition of that nutrient to a foodstuff could entail. h

Reply of the court

29. By its question, the referring court is asking, in essence, whether arts 28 and 30 EC must be interpreted as meaning that they preclude a member state from prohibiting the marketing without prior authorisation of foodstuffs lawfully manufactured and marketed in another member state, if nutrients such as vitamins or minerals have been added thereto other than those whose use has been declared lawful in the first member state. i

- a 30. It must be observed at the outset that, while the main proceedings concern charges relating both to food supplements and to meal substitutes, the question referred covers only food supplements to which have been added coenzyme Q10, whose addition is not authorised in France, and vitamins in quantities exceeding the safety limits laid down by the CSHPF or exceeding the recommended daily intake.
- b 31. The free movement of goods between member states is a fundamental principle of the EC Treaty which finds its expression in the prohibition, set out in art 28 EC, of quantitative restrictions on imports between member states and all measures having equivalent effect.
- c 32. The prohibition set out in art 28 EC on measures having an effect equivalent to restrictions covers all commercial rules enacted by the member states which are capable of hindering, directly or indirectly, actually or potentially, intra-Community trade (see in particular Procureur du Roi v Dassonville Case 8/74 [1974] ECR 837 (para 5) and European Commission v Denmark Case C-192/01 [2003] ECR I-9693 (para 39)).
- d 33. The file of the main proceedings seems to indicate that they concern foodstuffs imported from another member state where they are lawfully manufactured and/or marketed. It is, however, for the national court, which alone has jurisdiction to determine and evaluate the facts in the proceedings before it, to check that such is the case and that the rules and principles flowing from the free movement of goods are indeed to be applied to those proceedings (see, to that effect, Criminal proceedings against Rombi and Arkopharma SA Case C-107/97 [2000] ECR I-3367 (para 72)).
- e 34. National rules such as those at issue in the main proceedings, which prohibit the marketing of foodstuffs to which nutrients have been added, such foodstuffs being lawfully manufactured and/or marketed in the exporting member state but prohibited in the importing member state, or which require that such substances have been previously included on a national list provided for that purpose in order that the marketing of the foodstuffs to which they have been added may be authorised, can be justified, as a measure having equivalent effect to a quantitative restriction within the meaning of art 28 EC, in so far as they comply with the requirements of art 30 EC, as interpreted by the court.
- f 35. First, such rules must make provision for a procedure enabling economic operators to have a nutrient included on the national list of authorised substances. The procedure must be one which is readily accessible and can be completed within a reasonable time, and, if it leads to a refusal, the decision of refusal must be open to challenge before the courts (see to that effect EC Commission v France Case C-344/90 [1992] ECR I-4719 (para 9) and today's judgment in European Commission v France Case C-24/00 (2001) Transcript (opinion), 26 June, (2004) Transcript (judgment), 5 February (para 26)).
- g 36. Secondly, an application to obtain the inclusion of a nutrient on the national list of authorised substances may be refused by the competent national authorities only if such substance poses a genuine risk to public health (see Commission v Denmark, cited above (para 46)).
- h 37. It is of course for the member states, in the absence of harmonisation and to the extent that there is still uncertainty in the current state of scientific research, to decide on the level of protection of human health and life they wish to ensure and whether to require prior authorisation for the marketing of foodstuffs, taking into account the requirements of the free movement of goods within the Community (see Commission v Denmark, cited above (para 42)). a

38. That discretion relating to the protection of public health is particularly wide where it is shown that there is still uncertainty in the current state of scientific research as to certain nutrients, such as vitamins, which are not as a general rule harmful in themselves but may have special harmful effects solely if taken to excess as part of the general diet, the composition of which cannot be foreseen or monitored (see Criminal proceedings against Sandoz BV Case 174/82 [1983] ECR 2445 (para 17) and Commission v Denmark, cited above (para 43)). b

39. However, in exercising their discretion relating to the protection of public health, the member states must comply with the principle of proportionality. The means which they choose must therefore be confined to what is actually necessary to ensure the safeguarding of public health; they must be proportionate to the objective thus pursued, which could not have been attained by measures less restrictive of intra-Community trade (see the Sandoz case (para 18) and Commission v Denmark (para 45)). c

40. Furthermore, since art 30 EC provides for an exception, to be interpreted strictly, to the rule of free movement of goods within the Community, it is for the national authorities which invoke it to show in each case, in the light of national nutritional habits and in the light of the results of international scientific research, that their rules are necessary to give effective protection to the interests referred to in that provision and, in particular, that the marketing of the products in question poses a real risk to public health (see to that effect the Sandoz case (para 22), Criminal proceedings against van Bennekom Case 227/82 [1983] ECR 3883 (para 40) and Commission v Denmark (para 46)). d

41. A prohibition on the marketing of foodstuffs to which nutrients have been added must therefore be based on a detailed assessment of the risk alleged by the member state invoking art 30 EC (see Commission v Denmark (para 47)). e

42. A decision to prohibit the marketing of a fortified foodstuff, which is in fact the most restrictive obstacle to trade in products lawfully manufactured and marketed in other member states, can be adopted only if the alleged real risk for public health appears to be sufficiently established on the basis of the latest scientific data available at the date of the adoption of such decision. In such a context, the object of the risk assessment to be carried out by the member state is to appraise the degree of probability of harmful effects on human health from the addition of certain nutrients to foodstuffs and the seriousness of those potential effects (see Commission v Denmark (para 48)). f

43. It is clear that such an assessment of the risk could reveal that scientific uncertainty persists as regards the existence or extent of real risks to human health. In such circumstances, it must be accepted that a member state may, in accordance with the precautionary principle, take protective measures without having to wait until the existence and gravity of those risks are fully demonstrated (see to that effect R v Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, ex p National Farmers' Union Case C-157/96 [1998] ECR I-2211 (para 63)). However, the risk assessment cannot be based on purely hypothetical considerations (see Monsanto Agricoltura Italia SpA v Presidenza del Consiglio dei Ministri Case C-236/01 [2003] ECR I-8105 (para 106) and Commission v Denmark (para 49)). g

44. At the hearing, the French government stated that NSA France had been informed by letter of 21 October 1996 that the opinion of the CSHPF had not h

i

a been in favour of the addition of coenzyme Q10 to human food, following an application by another economic operator for authorisation to place on the market. According to that government, the opinion, dated 11 June 1996, is based on the absence of nutritional need as regards the addition of coenzyme Q10 and, above all, on the lack of toxicological data on the effects of that substance.

b 45. It also argued at the hearing that the French authorities' reasoning with regard to applications for authorisation concerning the addition of nutrients to foodstuffs is based on the conclusion that there is no reason to authorise the marketing of a foodstuff to which have been added such substances, which, even if at present they pose no danger to public health, are none the less capable of giving rise to such a risk in future, especially as such substances c bestow no nutritional benefit.

46. While it is true that the court has observed that, in a context of scientific uncertainty, the criterion of the nutritional need of the population of a member state can play a role in its detailed assessment of the risk which the addition of nutrients to foodstuffs may pose for public health, the absence
d of such a need cannot, by itself, justify a total prohibition, on the basis of art 30 EC, on marketing foodstuffs lawfully manufactured and/or marketed in other member states (see Commission v Denmark (para 54)).

47. Moreover, as noted in paras 41–43 of this judgment, a prohibition on marketing foodstuffs to which nutrients have been added must be based on a detailed assessment of the real risk to public health alleged by the national e authorities invoking art 30 EC, established on the basis of the most reliable scientific data available and the most recent results of international research (see Commission v Denmark (para 51)).

48. Where it proves to be impossible to determine with certainty the existence or extent of the alleged risk because of the insufficiency, inconclusiveness or imprecision of the results of studies conducted, but the
f likelihood of real harm to public health persists should the risk materialise, the precautionary principle justifies the adoption of restrictive measures (see Commission v Denmark (para 52)).

49. It is for the referring court to determine whether, in the legal and factual circumstances obtaining in the member state concerned, the prohibition on g marketing the foodstuffs in question satisfies the requirements of Community law in order that the restriction on the free movement of goods may be justified.

50. Having regard to all those considerations, the reply to the question referred must be that arts 28 and 30 EC must be interpreted as meaning that they do not preclude a member state from prohibiting the marketing without h prior authorisation of foodstuffs lawfully manufactured and marketed in another member state, where nutrients such as vitamins or minerals have been added thereto other than those whose use has been declared lawful in the first member state, provided that certain conditions are satisfied.

First, the prior authorisation procedure must be readily accessible and capable of being completed within a reasonable time and, if it leads to a i refusal, the decision of refusal must be open to challenge before the courts. Secondly, refusal to authorise marketing must be based on a detailed assessment of the risk to public health, based on the most reliable scientific data available and the most recent results of international research.

COSTS

51. The costs incurred by the French, Greek and Spanish governments and by the Commission, which have submitted observations to the court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the proceedings pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Sixth Chamber) in answer to the question referred to it by the Tribunal de Grande Instance de Paris by judgment of 19 February 2001, hereby rules:

Articles 28 and 30 EC must be interpreted as meaning that they do not preclude a member state from prohibiting the marketing without prior authorisation of foodstuffs lawfully manufactured and marketed in another member state, where nutrients such as vitamins or minerals have been added thereto other than those whose use has been declared lawful in the first member state, provided that certain conditions are satisfied.

First, the prior authorisation procedure must be readily accessible and capable of being completed within a reasonable time and, if it leads to a refusal, the decision of refusal must be open to challenge before the courts. Secondly, refusal to authorise marketing must be based on a detailed assessment of the risk to public health, based on the most reliable scientific data available and the most recent results of international research.

a Sniaze SA v European Commission (supported by Austria and others, intervening)
b (Case T-88/01)

COURT OF FIRST INSTANCE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (FIFTH CHAMBER, EXTENDED COMPOSITION)

JUDGES LINDH (PRESIDENT), GARCÍA-VALDECASAS, COOKE, MENGOSZI AND MARTINS RIBEIRO

c 17 JUNE 2004, 14 APRIL 2005

European Community – Procedure – Action for annulment – Admissibility – Individual concern – Meaning of individual concern – Whether action inadmissible – Article 230 EC (formerly EC Treaty, art 173).

d The applicant was a Spanish company which was in the business of, inter alia, producing and selling artificial and cellulose fibres. In July 2000, Commission Decision (EC) 2001/102 (on state aid granted by Austria to Lenzing Lyocell GmbH & Co KG (LLG)) was adopted (the decision). LLG was an Austrian company which produced lyocell, a fibre made from cellulose.

e Article 1<sup>a</sup> of the decision provided that the provision of certain guarantees did not constitute aid within the meaning of art 87(1) EC<sup>b</sup> (formerly art 92(1) of the EC Treaty). Article 2<sup>c</sup> provided that a guarantee amounting to €14.5m complied with guidelines approved by the Commission of the European Communities and art 3<sup>d</sup> stated that amounts of aid provided for land acquisition and equity capital was compatible with the common market.

f Subsequently, the applicant brought an action seeking annulment of arts 1 to 3 of the decision. The Commission and the interveners contended that the application should be dismissed as inadmissible.

g Held – Under the fourth paragraph of art 230 EC (formerly art 173 of the EC Treaty), a natural or legal person could institute proceedings against a decision addressed to another person only if that decision was of direct and individual concern to him. Persons other than those to whom a decision was addressed could claim to be concerned individually only if that decision affected them by reason of certain attributes peculiar to them or by reason of circumstances in which they were differentiated from all other persons, and by virtue of those factors distinguished them individually just as in the case of the person addressed.

h In the field of state aid, undertakings in competition with the undertaking in receipt of aid which had played an active role in the procedure in respect of an individual aid had been recognised as being individually concerned by the Commission decision closing that procedure,

i <sup>a</sup> Article 1 is set out at judgment para 12, below

<sup>b</sup> Article 87(1) provides, so far as material: ‘... any aid granted by a Member State or through State resources in any form whatsoever which distorts or threatens to distort competition by favouring certain undertakings or the production of certain goods shall, insofar as it affects trade between Member States, be incompatible with the common market.’

<sup>c</sup> Article 2 is set out at judgment para 12, below

<sup>d</sup> Article 3 is set out at judgment para 12, below

provided that their position on the market was substantially affected by the aid which was the subject of that decision. An undertaking could not therefore rely solely on its status as a competitor of the undertaking in receipt of aid but additionally had to show that having regard to the extent of any participation by it in the procedure and to the extent of the detriment to its market position, its circumstances distinguished it in a similar way to the undertaking in receipt of the aid. The court therefore had to consider to what extent the applicant's participation in the procedure and the effect of the aid on its market position were capable of distinguishing it. In the instant case, the applicant had played only a minor role in the course of the pre-litigation procedure. As regards the extent to which the applicant's market position was affected, it was not for the Community court, when considering whether the application was admissible, to make a definitive finding on the competitive relationship between the applicant and the undertaking in receipt of the aid. It was for the applicant to adduce pertinent reasons to show that the Commission's decision could adversely affect its legitimate interests by seriously jeopardising its position on the market in question. In the instant case, the applicant had not adduced pertinent reasons to show that the decision might adversely affect its legitimate interests by seriously jeopardising its position on the market. In the light of that failure, and the limited role played by the applicant in the course of the pre-litigation procedure, the applicant was not individually concerned by the decision. Consequently, the application would be declared inadmissible (see judgment paras 51, 54–60, 78–80, below). Cie française de l'azote (Cofaz) SA v EC Commission Case 169/84 [1986] ECR 391 considered.

Notes

For the powers of the Court of Justice of the European Communities, see 47 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2001 reissue) para 409.

For the EC Treaty, art 173 (now art 230 EC), see 50 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) Current Service (issue 88) 429.

Cases cited

Arbeitsgemeinschaft Deutscher Luftfahrt-Unternehmen v European Commission Case T-86/96 [1999] ECR II-179, CFI.

Association des Aciéries Européennes Indépendantes (EISA) v European Commission Case T-239/94 [1997] ECR II-1839, CFI.

Association of Sorbitol Producers within the EC (ASPEC) v European Commission Case T-435/93 [1995] ECR II-1281, CFI.

Associazione Italiana Tecnico Economica del Cemento (AITEC) v European Commission Joined cases T-447–449/93 [1995] ECR II-1971, CFI.

BP Chemicals Ltd v European Commission Case T-11/95 [1998] ECR II-3235, CFI.

Cie française de l'azote (Cofaz) SA v EC Commission Case 169/84 [1986] ECR 391, ECJ.

Comité d'entreprise de la Société française de production v European Commission Case T-189/97 [1998] ECR II-335, CFI; aff'd Case C-106/98 P [2000] ECR I-3659, ECJ.

Comité International de la Rayonne et des Fibres Synthétiques (CIRFS) v EC Commission Case C-313/90 [1993] ECR I-1125, ECJ.

Conseil national des professions de l'automobile (CNPA) v European Commission Case C-341/00 P [2001] ECR I-5263, ECJ.

- a Foreningen af Jernskibs- og Maskinbyggerier I Danmark, Skibsværftsforeningen v European Commission Case T-266/94 [1996] ECR II-1399, CFI.*
Germany v EC Commission Joined cases C-324/90 and C-342/90 [1994] ECR I-1173, ECJ.
- b Intermills (SA) v EC Commission Case 323/82 [1984] ECR 3809, ECJ.*
Italy v European Commission Case C-47/91 [1994] ECR I-4635, ECJ.
Kaysersberg SA v European Commission Case T-290/94 [1997] ECR II-2137, CFI.
Matra SA v EC Commission Case C-225/91 [1993] ECR I-3203, ECJ.
Neotype Techmashexport GmbH v EC Commission Joined cases C-305/86 and C-160/87 [1990] ECR I-2945, ECJ.
- c Plaumann & Co v EEC Commission Case 25/62 [1963] ECR 95, ECJ.*
Riviera Auto Service Établissements Dalmasso SA v European Commission Joined cases T-185/96, T-189/96 and T-190/96 [1999] ECR II-93, CFI.
Società 'Eridania' Zuccherifici Nazionali v EEC Commission Joined cases 10/68 and 18/68 [1969] ECR 459, ECJ.
- d Svenska Journalistförbundet (supported by Sweden) v EU Council (supported by France) Case T-174/95 [1998] All ER (EC) 545, [1998] ECR II-2289, CFI.*

Application

By application lodged at the Registry of the Court of First Instance of the European Communities on 17 April 2001, Sniace SA, a company established in Madrid, Spain, applied for the annulment of Commission Decision (EC)

- e 2001/102 (on state aid granted by Austria to Lenzing Lyocell GmbH & Co KG).* Sniace SA was represented by J Baró Fuentes, M Gómez de Liaño y Botella and F Rodríguez Carretero, lawyers. The Commission of the European Communities was represented by D Triantafyllou and J Buendía Sierra, acting as agents, with an address for service in Luxembourg. The Commission was supported by the Republic of Austria, represented by H Dossi and
- f M Burgstaller, acting as agents, with an address for service in Luxembourg; Lenzing Lyocell GmbH & Co KG, a company established in Heiligenkreuz im Lafnitztal, Austria; and Land Burgenland, Austria, represented by U Soltész, lawyer. The language of the case was Spanish. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.*

- g 14 April 2005. The COURT OF FIRST INSTANCE (Fifth Chamber, Extended Composition) delivered the following judgment.*

FACTS

- h 1. Sniace SA (hereinafter the applicant) is a Spanish company whose principal activities are the production and sale of artificial and synthetic fibres, cellulose, cellulose fibres (viscose staple fibres), continuous polyamide thread, unwoven felt and sodium sulphate, forestry and the co-production of electricity.*
- i 2. Lenzing Lyocell GmbH & Co KG (hereinafter LLG) is an Austrian company, a subsidiary of the Austrian company Lenzing AG, which produces, among other things, viscose fibres and modal. LLG's business is the production and sale of lyocell, a new type of fibre made from pure natural cellulose. It is also produced by the British company Courtaulds plc, which markets it under the name Tencel.*

3. In 1995, LLG started construction of a factory for the production of lyocell in the business park at Heiligenkreuz-Szentgotthárd, in a cross-border area between Austria and Hungary. The factory is located in the Austrian part of the area, in the province of Burgenland.

4. In 1995, the Austrian public body Wirtschaftsbeteiligungs AG (hereinafter the WiBAG) informed the Commission of the European Communities informally of its intention to grant state aid to LLG for the investment project. By letter of 30 August 1995, the Republic of Austria informed the Commission that the aid would be granted under regional aid scheme N 589/95, approved by the Commission by letter of 3 August 1995. By letter of 5 October 1995, the Commission informed the Republic of Austria that individual notification of the intended aid in the form of grants was unnecessary since they were covered by an approved aid scheme, whilst putting it on notice not to grant aid in the form of guarantees to LLG without previously informing the Commission of them. a

5. On 21 April 1997, the Austrian authorities sent the Commission application forms for co-financing under the European Regional Development Fund (ERDF) for two large-scale investment projects in the business park to be carried out by Business Park Heiligenkreuz GmbH (hereinafter BPH) and Wirtschaftspark Heiligenkreuz Servicegesellschaft mbH (hereinafter WHS). b

6. Because of information contained in those forms and in a contract made in 1995 between the province of Burgenland and LLG, the Commission decided to re-investigate the case concerning the aid granted to LLG. After a meeting and an exchange of letters with the Austrian authorities, it decided to enter that case on the register for non-notified state aid. Subsequently there were other meetings and exchanges of correspondence between the Commission and the Austrian authorities. c

7. By letter of 29 October 1998, the Commission informed the Austrian government of its decision of 14 October 1998 to initiate the procedure laid down in art 93(2) of the EC Treaty (now art 88(2) EC) in respect of various measures adopted by the Austrian authorities in favour of LLG (hereinafter the decision to initiate the procedure). The measures in question consisted of state guarantees for subsidies and loans amounting to €50.3m, an advantageous price of €4.4 per square metre for 120 hectares of industrial land and guarantees of fixed prices for basic communal services for 30 years. The Commission enjoined the Austrian government, in accordance with the principles stated by the court in Germany v EC Commission Joined cases C-324/90 and C-342/90 [1994] ECR I-1173, to furnish it with certain information in order that it might examine the compatibility of those measures with the common market. d

8. The Commission also enjoined it, in accordance with the principles stated by the court in its judgment of 5 October 1994 in Italy v European Commission Case C-47/91 [1994] ECR I-4635 (the Italgrani case) (paras 21–24), to provide it with a range of information intended to enable it to determine whether certain of the other measures adopted by the Austrian authorities in favour of LLG were covered by approved or existing aid schemes. The other member states and the parties concerned were given notice of the initiation of that procedure and were requested, by the publication of that letter in the Official Journal of the European Communities of 13 January 1999 (OJ 1999 C9 p 6), to submit any observations they might have. e

9. The Austrian government replied to that letter from the Commission by letters of 15 March and of 16 and 28 April 1999. The United Kingdom and other third parties concerned, among them (by letter of 12 February 1999) the applicant, also submitted their observations. f

10. After examining the information submitted to it by the Austrian authorities, the Commission, by letter of 14 July 1999, informed the Austrian g a government of its decision of 23 June 1999 to extend the procedure initiated under art 88(2) EC (hereinafter the decision to extend the procedure) to four other measures in favour of LLG. They are the following: ad hoc investment aid of €0.4m for the land purchase, the taking of an equity holding of €21.8m terminable only after 30 years and with a 1% per year return, aid of an unknown amount for the creation of company-specific infrastructure and b environmental aid, of €5.4m, possibly granted otherwise than in accordance with an existing aid scheme. The Commission invited the Austrian government to submit its observations. The other member states and interested parties were notified of the extension of the procedure and were requested to submit any observations by the publication of that letter in the Official Journal of the c European Communities of 4 September 1999 (OJ 1999 C253 p 4). The Austrian government submitted its observations by letter of 4 October 1999. The United Kingdom and other parties concerned, including (by letter of 4 October 1999) the applicant, also submitted their observations. The Austrian government provided additional information by letters of 25 February and 27 April 2000.

d 11. On 19 July 2000 the Commission adopted Decision (EC) 2001/102 (on state aid granted by Austria to LLG) (OJ 2001 L38 p 33) (hereinafter the contested decision).

12. The operative part of that decision is as follows:

Article 1

e The aid which Austria has granted to ... (LLG), Heiligenkreuz, through the provision of guarantees amounting to EUR 35,80 million (a guarantee by a consortium of commercial and public-sector banks amounting to EUR 21,8 million and three guarantees by the ... (WHS) amounting to EUR 1,4 million, EUR 10,35 million and EUR 2,25 million) and through a land price of EUR 4,4 per mFootnote reference, but no text associated with it. for the acquisition of 120 hectares of industrial land, through
f fixed-price guarantees by the Province of Burgenland for the provision of process utilities and through the provision of aid of an unknown amount in the form of the creation of company-specific infrastructure does not constitute aid within the meaning of Article 87(1) [EC].

Article 2

g The aid which Austria has granted to LLG through the provision of a guarantee amounting to EUR 14,5 million by [the] WiBAG complies with the guarantee guidelines approved by the Commission under [reference] number N 542/95.

h The environmental aid amounting to EUR 5,37 million complies with the environmental aid guidelines approved by the Commission under [reference] number N 93/148.

Article 3

i The individual aid which Austria has granted in the form of aid amounting to EUR 0,4 million for land acquisition and in the form of equity capital amounting to EUR 21,8 million is compatible with the common market.

Article 4

This Decision is addressed to the Republic of Austria.'

PROCEDURE

13. By application lodged at the Court Registry on 17 April 2001, the applicant brought this action.

14. By documents lodged at the Registry on 6 June, 16 and 26 July 2001 respectively, LLG, the Republic of Austria and the province of Burgenland applied for leave to intervene in this action in support of the form of order sought by the Commission. a

15. By letter of 16 October 2001, the applicant requested measures of organisation of procedure seeking the disclosure by the Commission of a series of documents referred to in its defence and in the contested decision, as well as of certain information, particularly on the market for the products in question. On 14 November 2001, as a measure of organisation of procedure, the Commission was requested to disclose some of those documents. It complied with that request within the period prescribed. b

16. By letter of 10 December 2001, the applicant requested that confidential treatment be accorded to certain information contained in Annexes 14 and 15 of its application with regard to LLG, the Republic of Austria and the province of Burgenland. c

17. By order of 18 February 2002, the President of the Fifth Chamber, Extended Composition, granted the applications for leave to intervene and for confidential treatment. d

18. On 21 May 2002, LLG and the province of Burgenland lodged a joint statement in intervention.

19. On 23 May 2002, the Republic of Austria lodged its statement in intervention.

20. The Commission and the applicant lodged their observations on the statements in intervention on 19 July and 6 September 2002, respectively. e

21. Upon hearing the report of the Judge-Rapporteur, the Court of First Instance (Fifth Chamber, Extended Composition) decided to open the oral procedure.

22. The parties presented oral argument and their answers to the questions put by the court at the hearing on 17 June 2004. f

FORMS OF ORDER SOUGHT BY THE PARTIES

23. The applicant claims that the court should:

—declare the action admissible and well founded;

—annul art 1 of the contested decision, inasmuch as the Commission decides therein that the provision of guarantees amounting to €35.8m does not constitute state aid within the meaning of art 87(1) EC (formerly art 92(1) of the EC Treaty); g

—annul art 2 of the contested decision, inasmuch as the Commission decides therein that the aid granted by the Republic of Austria to LLG through the provision of a guarantee of €14.5m by the WIBAG complies with the guarantee guidelines approved by the Commission under reference number N 542/95; h

—annul art 3 of the contested decision;

—alternatively, annul art 1 of the contested decision inasmuch as the Commission decides therein that the fixed price guarantees by the province of Burgenland for the provision of communal services and the provision of aid of an unknown amount in the form of the creation of company-specific infrastructure do not constitute state aid within the meaning of art 87(1) EC; i

—order the Commission to pay the costs.

24. In its reply, the applicant also claims that the court should annul art 2 of the contested decision, inasmuch as the Commission decides therein that the a environmental aid of €5.37m complies with the guidelines for the financing of environmental protection approved by the Commission under reference number N 93/148.

25. The Commission contends that the court should:

—reject the unsubstantiated pleas in law and the new pleas in law put forward by the applicant as inadmissible;

b —in any event, dismiss the action as unfounded in its entirety;

—order the applicant to pay the costs.

26. The interveners contend that the court should:

—dismiss the action as inadmissible and, in any event, as unfounded;

—order the applicant to pay the costs.

c

ADMISSIBILITY

Arguments of the parties

27. The interveners object to the admissibility of the action on the ground that the applicant is not individually concerned by the contested decision.

d 28. The Republic of Austria observes that, in the context of control of state aid, a Commission decision closing a procedure initiated pursuant to art 88(2) EC is of individual concern to the undertakings who were responsible for the complaint which led to that procedure and whose views were heard and determined the conduct of that procedure, provided, however, that their position on the market is substantially affected by the aid which is the subject of that decision (see Cie française de l'azote (Cofaz) SA v EC Commission Case 169/84 [1986] ECR 391 (paras 24, 25)).

e 29. It submits, first, that the fact that the applicant may be a party concerned for the purposes of art 88(2) EC cannot confer on it standing to bring proceedings against the contested decision. It notes that, according to the case law, a natural or legal person may be individually concerned by reason of its status as a party concerned only by a Commission decision refusing to open the examination stage provided for by art 88(2) EC (see BP Chemicals Ltd v European Commission Case T-11/95 [1998] ECR II-3235 (paras 88, 89)). In such a case, it can ensure that its procedural guarantees are complied with only if it is entitled to challenge that decision before the Community judicature (see the BP Chemicals case, cited above (para 89)). However, where, as in the present case, the Commission has adopted its decision at the end of the examination stage, the parties concerned have in fact availed themselves of their procedural guarantees, so that they can no longer be regarded, by virtue of that status alone, as being individually concerned by that decision.

f 30. The Republic of Austria adds that the applicant's participation in the procedure under art 88(2) EC does not suffice to distinguish it individually as it would the person to whom the contested decision is addressed (see Arbeitsgemeinschaft Deutscher Luftfahrt-Unternehmen v European Commission Case T-86/96 [1999] ECR II-179 (para 50)). It follows from the case law that, in state aid matters, participation in that procedure is only one of the factors capable of establishing that a natural or legal person is individually concerned by the decision which it seeks to have annulled (see the Cofaz case, cited above (para 25) and Comité d'entreprise de la Société française de production v European Commission Case T-189/97 [1998] ECR II-335 (para 44)).

g 31. Secondly, the Republic of Austria submits that the applicant is not entitled to base an argument on the fact that its interests are affected by the grant of the contested measures, as referred to in para 16 of the court's judgment in

SA Intermills v EC Commission Case 323/82 [1984] ECR 3809. The passage extracted from that judgment does not, in actual fact, concern the question of standing to bring proceedings. a

32. Thirdly, the Republic of Austria argues that the applicant has not shown that its position on the market may be substantially affected by the measures at issue. It points out that those measures refer exclusively to the construction of a factory to produce lyocell, a product which the applicant does not manufacture. It adds that there is no particular competitive relationship between that product and those of the applicant. It submits, more particularly, that the Commission correctly found, in the contested decision, that viscose fibres and lyocell were covered by two different markets. b

33. On that last point, the Republic of Austria contends, first, that, from purchasers' point of view, lyocell and viscose fibres cannot be substituted for each other. In support of that contention, it explains that lyocell has specific characteristics which distinguish it from viscose, like its high resistance in the dry state and, in dampness, its low shrinkage in water, its high absorbency of dyes, its softness to the touch, its similarity to silk and its miscibility with other textile fibres. Its specific 'surface characteristics' and its tendency to fibrillate permit the introduction of new products with new properties, such as the 'stonewashed' and 'peach skin' effects, which could not be obtained by using viscose fibres. In addition, in certain fields in which lyocell is used, such as denim, the use of viscose fibres is technically impossible. Lyocell's very high resistance permits exceptionally high productivity in spinning and weaving. Since lyocell costs more to produce, it is intended for segments of the market in which products are of higher quality and more expensive. The Republic of Austria refers also to certain findings made by the Commission in its Decision (EC) 2004/237 (declaring a concentration to be incompatible with the common market and the functioning of the EEA Agreement) (Case COMP/M.2187—CVC/Lenzing) (OJ 2004 L82 p 20). c
d
e

34. Secondly, the Republic of Austria asserts that the manufacturing processes of lyocell and viscose fibres are fundamentally different. Viscose manufacture requires a process of chemical conversion, whereas that of lyocell is obtained by a physical process, namely by the use of an aqueous solution of N-methyl-morpholine oxide (NMMO). It points out that lyocell's manufacturing process has required substantial research and that it is less harmful to the environment than that of viscose fibres, which requires substantial consumption of chemicals. It states that— f

'the new technology used in the manufacture of lyocell fibres is characterised ... by fewer manufacturing stages, shorter delays in the process, lower consumption of chemicals and closed manufacturing cycles.'
g
h

35. The Republic of Austria adds that the losses of market shares and the decrease in turnover relied upon by the applicant are attributable not to the grant of the contested measures to LLG, but to the financial and economic difficulties and to the over-indebtedness with which the applicant had to cope for several years from the early 1990s. It refers, in that regard, to Commission Decision (EC) 1999/395 (on state aid implemented by Spain in favour of Sniace SA, located in Torrelavega, Cantabria) (OJ 1999 L149 p 40). i

36. LLG and the province of Burgenland maintain that there is no competitive relationship between LLG and the applicant, since the applicant

a does not operate in the lyocell sector. In that regard, they rely on the same arguments as those presented by the Republic of Austria and reproduced above.

37. In its rejoinder, the Commission requests the court to examine, of its own motion, the question of the applicant's standing to bring proceedings, since it concerns an absolute bar to proceeding. It expresses serious doubt that b the applicant's competitive position is substantially affected by the measures at issue, since they are intended exclusively for the production of lyocell, which forms part of a different market from that of viscose. In that regard, it stresses, more particularly, that the price of lyocell is appreciably higher than that of viscose fibres and that those two types of fibre are not used in the same ways. c In addition, it points out that the applicant, in the observations which it submitted in the course of the pre-litigation procedure, confined itself to 'repeating doubts set forth in the decision [initiating the procedure]'.

38. The applicant submits, first, that it has been consistently held that an intervenor is not entitled to raise an objection of inadmissibility which was not formulated in the form of order sought by the defendant (see Kaysersberg SA v d European Commission Case T-290/94 [1997] ECR II-2137 (para 76) and Riviera Auto Service Établissements Dalmasso SA v European Commission Joined cases T-185/96, T-189/96 and T-190/96 [1999] ECR II-93 (para 25)). It leaves it to the court to decide whether it is appropriate to examine of its own motion the plea of inadmissibility alleging lack of standing to bring proceedings.

39. The applicant submits, next, that it is directly and individually concerned e by the contested decision.

40. As regards the requirement of being individually concerned, it asserts, first, that it participated actively in the pre-litigation procedure by submitting its written observations.

41. Secondly, it claims that it was disadvantaged by the grant of the measures at issue to LLG 'according to the court's case law, particularly in the judgment f in ... [the Intermills case]', cited above.

42. Thirdly, the applicant argues that the said measures cause it economic loss 'in terms of loss of market share, [of] lowering of turnover and [of] incorporeal assets'. To demonstrate the reality and extent of that loss, it refers to a note which is set out in Annex 14 to the application.

43. In that note, the applicant makes the following submissions: g

—the world and European viscose markets are characterised by a decrease in production capacity and consumption;

—that situation is 'incompatible with the creation of a new substitute industry benefiting from preferential European financing';

h —'... lyocell is used without distinction, with a varying competitive advantage, in place of traditional viscose fibre or as a substitute for it';

—LLG's supply of lyocell is equivalent to 3.5% of the European viscose market;

i —'there is no doubt that a supply equivalent to 3.5% of the market entails an even greater change in the prices, conditions, etc., where, by reason of its investment/writing-down costs, it can compete unfairly to the detriment of other fibres in a position of economic inferiority and liable therefore to result in losses, whereas lyocell fibre, which needs no writing down, may give rise to profits';

—the applicant consequently ceased to produce, and therefore to sell, the following quantities of viscose: ...<sup>1</sup> tonnes in 1997, ... tonnes in 1998, ... tonnes in 1999, ... tonnes in 2000, with a decrease of ... tonnes per year forecast from 2001; a

—that is equivalent to a loss of net revenue of: ... Spanish pesetas (ESP) in 1997, ESP ... in 1998, ESP ... in 1999, ESP ... in 2000, ESP ... according to its forecasts for 2001 and ESP ... according to forecasts for the period 2001–2007; b

—the supply of lyocell by LLG also led to a ‘change of at least ...% in the market price’, entailing the following losses for the applicant: ESP ... in 1997, ESP ... in 1998, ESP ... in 1999, ESP ... in 2000, ESP ... according to its forecasts for 2001 and ESP ... according to forecasts for the period 2002–2007;

—in addition, LLG annually puts on the market, ‘through special outlets which then sell at extremely low prices’, about 1,000 tonnes of ‘by-products’ (or ‘sub-standard products’), which has forced the applicant to lower its prices for ‘products of the same quality’; c

—that has entailed, for the applicant, a loss of revenue of ESP ... per year.

44. In its reply, the applicant refers to the fact that LLG manufactures and sells, under the trade mark ‘Pro-Viscose’, a product made up of a mixture of viscose and lyocell (hereinafter proviscose) and asserts that it is in competition with viscose. It submits that it is clear from a note attached to the reply that LLG has offered proviscose to several of the applicant’s customers ‘at a price comparable to that of traditional viscose’. d

45. In its observations on the statements in intervention, the applicant maintains that it is ‘incontestably’ a company competing with LLG. The viscose fibre which it produces is in direct competition with the products manufactured by LLG, namely lyocell, ‘sub-standards of lyocell’ and proviscose. In support of the latter assertion, it provides an expert report by an ‘independent consultant’, Mr F Marsal Amenós, as well as the evidence of an ‘independent trader’, the company Manfib Sas Lyocell is only an ‘improved viscose fibre’ which can be substituted ‘in most applications’ for the latter. The applicant recognises that lyocell fibres cost more than viscose fibres and argues that proviscose was created in order to ‘avoid that problem’. In that regard, it asserts that, in view of lyocell’s higher price, LLG has introduced on the market proviscose and a ‘sub-standard of lyocell (of lower quality)’ at ‘prices close to that of viscose’. It adds that lyocell fibres have attained a significant share, namely between 5 and 10%, of the European market for cut cellulose fibres, a market which was hitherto supplied exclusively by the European viscose producers. e

46. At the hearing, the applicant submitted that LLG had put ‘sub-standard lyocell’ on the market for certain applications (cigarette filters, wet wipes, chiffons, etc). It also stated that lyocell was a product of higher quality than viscose, particularly in terms of resistance, that it presented a certain number of technical characteristics and that the price of ‘pure lyocell’ was higher than that of viscose. As regards the latter point, the applicant stated that it is when it is mixed with other products that lyocell can be supplied at competitive prices compared to those of viscose. f

47. Finally, the applicant accepts that, according to the case law, the mere fact that a measure may exercise an influence on the competitive relationships existing on a given market cannot suffice to allow any trader in any competitive relationship whatever with the addressee of the measure to be regarded as g

<sup>1</sup> Confidential data omitted. i

- a* directly and individually concerned by that measure (see Società 'Eridania' Zuccherifici Nazionali v EEC Commission Joined cases 10/68 and 18/68 [1969] ECR 459 (para 7)). However, it stresses that, first, there is only a limited number of producers on the market for the products concerned (there are only five manufacturers in the market sector for 'commodity viscose staple fibres' and three in the market sector for 'spundyed viscose staple fibres') and, second,
- b* that the investment project will entail a significant increase in production capacity.
48. As regards the requirement of direct concern, the applicant submits that the contested decision has left intact all the effects of the contested measures, although it had sought from the Commission a decision eliminating or amending those measures (see the Cofaz case (para 30) and Associazione Italiana Tecnico Economica del Cemento (AITEC) v European Commission Joined cases T-447-449/93 [1995] ECR II-1971 (para 41)).
- c*

Findings of the court

49. Under the fourth paragraph of art 40 of the Statute of the Court of Justice, an application to intervene is to be limited to supporting the form of order sought by one of the parties. In addition, as provided in art 116(3) of the Rules of Procedure of the Court of First Instance, the intervener must accept the case as he finds it at the time of his intervention.
50. In the form of order sought, the Commission has confined itself to seeking the dismissal of the action on the substance and has not challenged the applicant's standing to bring proceedings.
- e*
51. As interveners, the Republic of Austria, LLG and the province of Burgenland are therefore not entitled to raise a plea of inadmissibility.
52. However, it is settled case law that, under art 113 of the Rules of Procedure, the court may at any time of its own motion consider whether there exists any absolute bar to proceeding with a case, including any raised by interveners (see Foreningen af Jernskibs- og Maskinbyggerier I Danmark, Skibsværftsforeningen v European Commission Case T-266/94 [1996] ECR II-1399 (para 40), Association des Aciéries Européennes Indépendantes (EISA) v European Commission Case T-239/94 [1997] ECR II-1839 (para 26) and Svenska Journalistförbundet (supported by Sweden) v EU Council (supported by France) Case T-174/95 [1998] All ER (EC) 545, [1998] ECR II-2289 (para 79); see also, to that effect, Neotype Techmashexport GmbH v EC Commission Joined cases C-305/86 and C-160/87 [1990] ECR I-2945 (para 18), Comité International de la Rayonne et des Fibres Synthétiques (CIRFS) v EC Commission Case C-313/90 [1993] ECR I-1125 (para 23) and Matra SA v EC Commission Case C-225/91 [1993] ECR I-3203 (para 13)).
- f*
- g*
- h* 53. In this case, the plea of inadmissibility invoked by the interveners raises the question whether there is an absolute bar to proceeding, so far as concerns the applicant's standing to bring proceedings (see, to that effect, Conseil national des professions de l'automobile (CNPA) v European Commission Case C-341/00 P [2001] ECR I-5263 (para 32) and the EISA case, cited above (para 27)). It can therefore be considered by the court of its own motion.
- i* 54. In that regard, it must be noted that, under the fourth paragraph of art 230 EC (formerly art 173 of the EC Treaty), a natural or legal person may institute proceedings against a decision addressed to another person only if that decision is of direct and individual concern to him. Since the contested decision was addressed to the Republic of Austria, it must be considered whether the applicant satisfies those two requirements.

55. As regards the question whether the applicant is individually concerned by the contested decision, it must be observed that, according to a consistent line of decisions, persons other than those to whom a decision is addressed may claim to be concerned individually only if that decision affects them by reason of certain attributes peculiar to them or by reason of circumstances in which they are differentiated from all other persons, and by virtue of these factors distinguishes them individually just as in the case of the person addressed (see Plaumann & Co v EEC Commission Case 25/62 [1963] ECR 95, Comité d'entreprise de la Société française de production v European Commission Case C-106/98 P [2000] ECR I-3659 (para 39) and Association of Sorbitol Producers within the EC (ASPEC) v European Commission Case T-435/93 [1995] ECR II-1281 (para 62)).

56. As regards, more particularly, the field of state aid, not only the undertaking in receipt of the aid but also the undertakings competing with it which have played an active role in the procedure initiated pursuant to art 88(2) EC in respect of an individual aid have been recognised as being individually concerned by the Commission decision closing that procedure, provided that their position on the market is substantially affected by the aid which is the subject of the contested decision (see the Cofaz case (para 25)).

57. An undertaking cannot therefore rely solely on its status as a competitor of the undertaking in receipt of aid but must additionally show that, having regard to the extent of any participation by it in the procedure and to the extent of the detriment to its market position, its circumstances distinguish it in a similar way to the undertaking in receipt of the aid (see the Comité d'entreprise case, cited above (para 41)).

58. In the present case, the court must therefore consider to what extent the applicant's participation in the procedure initiated under art 88(2) EC and the effect of the aid on its market position are capable of distinguishing it, in accordance with art 230 EC.

59. First, the court finds that the applicant played but a minor role in the course of the pre-litigation procedure. It lodged no complaint with the Commission. The conduct of the procedure was not largely determined by the observations which it submitted by its letters of 12 February and 4 October 1999 (see, to that effect, the Cofaz case (para 24)). Thus, in its observations of 12 February 1999, the applicant confines itself, in essence, to reproducing certain of the Commission's findings in the decision to initiate the procedure, commenting on them briefly, but without providing any specific evidence. Likewise, in its observations of 4 October 1999, it confines itself to asserting, without giving the least detail or any evidence, that the measures referred to in the decision to extend the procedure amount to state aid and that they should be declared incompatible with the common market.

60. Second, as regards the extent to which the applicant's position on the market was affected, it should be borne in mind, that, as stated in para 28 of the judgment in the Cofaz case, it is not for the Community court, when it is considering whether the application is admissible, to make a definitive finding on the competitive relationship between the applicant and the undertakings in receipt of the aid. In that context, it is for the applicant alone to adduce pertinent reasons to show that the Commission's decision may adversely affect its legitimate interests by seriously jeopardising its position on the market in question.

- a 61. In addition, in this case, the measures referred to in the contested decision concern exclusively a factory for the production of lyocell and it is common ground that the applicant neither manufactures that type of fibre nor foresees doing so in the future.
- b 62. However, the applicant relies on three arguments in an attempt to establish that its position on the market may be seriously jeopardised by the contested decision.
63. First, in its application, it alleges, in essence, that viscose and lyocell are in direct competition with each other.
- c 64. Without it being necessary, at the stage of considering admissibility, to rule definitively on the exact limits of the market for the products in question, it suffices to hold that that allegation is undermined by various evidence in the case file.
- d 65. First, lyocell has certain physical characteristics which differentiate it clearly from viscose fibre. The applicant thus observes expressly, in para 23 of its application, that 'lyocell is of natural origin and biodegradable; the solvent used is not toxic, can be recycled, complies with the standards on the absence of toxic substances, has high resistance as much in [cases of] conditioning [as when subject to] humidity and has a low shrinkage percentage'. Likewise, at the hearing, it recognised that lyocell had 'some advantages on the technical level', was of higher quality than viscose fibre and offered very high resistance. Furthermore, it did not dispute that lyocell was characterised by a tendency to fibrillation, which enabled the creation of fabrics which are full bodied and silky to the touch.
- e 66. As regards that last property of lyocell, the applicant confined itself to declaring that 'it [was] out of fashion and [was] ... no longer appreciated today' (para 26 of the application).
- f 66. The applicant's assertion that lyocell can be substituted for viscose 'in most applications' is not convincingly substantiated. In particular, the 'expert report' of the 'independent consultant' which it attached to its observations on the statements in intervention, in order to support that assertion, is hardly convincing. It is, in fact, only a single-page document, which contains only a few paragraphs and a highly superficial analysis of the question. The document contains, also, some obviously incorrect statements, such as the one about the great similarity between the manufacturing processes and between the properties of lyocell and viscose fibres (see para 65, above and para 69, below).
- g 67. As for the evidence of an 'independent trader', which the applicant also attached to its observations on the statements in intervention, it establishes at the very most that, for certain specific applications, certain customers of the applicant have woven into their products lyocell or proviscose in place of viscose.
- h 67. Furthermore, that assertion is contradicted by LLG's statement at a conference, which the applicant invokes in support of its argument (para 30 of and Annex 14 to the application) and according to which lyocell is 'an additional fibre whose applications are different'.
- i 68. Secondly, it is common ground that the price of lyocell is substantially higher than that of viscose fibres. That point was expressly admitted by the applicant, both in its pleadings (para 26 of the application and paras 77 and 78 of the applicant's observations on the statements in intervention) and at the hearing. Thus, it has, for example, recognised on several occasions that lyocell could be marketed at prices competitive to those of viscose fibres only if it was mixed with other products.

69. Finally, according to the applicant's own statements, the manufacturing processes of lyocell, on the one hand, and that of viscose fibres, on the other hand, differ to a great extent. Indeed, at para 23 of its application, it states that 'for [l]yocell ... a solvent is used for the cellulose paste (type NMMO), whereas the manufacturing process of traditional viscose involves stages of mercerisation and xanthogenation' and that 'by comparison with the manufacturing process of traditional viscose ... [l]yocell [is produced] by using a solvent rather than by following the traditional manufacturing stages of viscose'. Yet further, in para 36 of its reply, it argues that 'from the point of view of the manufacturing procedure, [it] agrees with the Commission when it states that lyocell is produced by procedures different from the traditional procedures for manufacturing viscose'.

70. In any event, even assuming that there is a direct competitive relationship between lyocell and viscose fibre, the applicant's statements in its pleadings and, more particularly, in the note in Annex 14 to its application, do not establish sufficiently that the contested decision is capable of significantly affecting its position on the market. The statements contained in that note are based, in fact, on completely unsupported assumptions, such as the fact that LLG's production of lyocell has, since 1997, completely replaced that of viscose and that it is intended exclusively for the European market. In addition, in that note, the applicant asserts that, because '[LLG's] supply is equivalent to 3.5% of the market', the applicant ceased, from 1997, to produce, and therefore to sell, certain quantities of viscose without substantiating its statement with any evidence and without even providing any explanation whatever on the method by which it calculated those quantities. Similarly, it must be observed that it adduces no evidence in support of its allegation that the 'supply led to a change of at least ...% in the market price'.

71. Secondly, the applicant invokes the existence of, besides 'pure lyocell' and proviscose, 'sub-standards of lyocell' which it also describes as lyocell of 'lower quality'. In the note in Annex 14 to its application, it states, in that regard, that LLG sells, through 'special outlets' and 'at extremely low prices', 1,000 tonnes of those 'by-products' per year, which has forced it to lower its prices by ESP ... per kg for 'products of the same quality'.

72. In that regard, it must be stated that the evidence in the file does not establish the existence of different qualities of lyocell. It must be pointed out, more particularly, that, in its pleadings, the applicant gives no detail as to what the expression 'sub-standards of lyocell' covers. It did not, moreover, seriously challenge the statement made on several occasions by LLG and the province of Burgenland at the hearing that inferior quality lyocell does not exist. As regards the evidence of an 'independent trader' annexed to the applicant's observations on the statements in intervention, it sheds no light on that point, the trader confining itself to noting that 'sub-standards' are part of 'LLG's modified fibres', like lyocell and proviscose.

73. Even assuming that LLG produces inferior quality lyocell which it sells at extremely low prices, the applicant has not at all substantiated its argument that, as a result, it had to lower its prices for 'products of the same quality'. Nor, moreover, does it substantiate in any way the quantities and price reduction upon which it relies.

74. Thirdly, in its reply and in its observations on the statements in intervention, the applicant places greater reliance on the competition which, it submits, exists between proviscose and viscose. It claims that its situation on the market is affected by the fact that LLG markets proviscose at prices

a competitive to those of viscose and that, having regard to the higher quality of the former, customers prefer it to the latter.

75. In that regard, it must be stated that the applicant again merely makes allegations which are insufficiently substantiated.

b 76. First, the note which it attaches to its reply in support of those allegations is not at all convincing, being merely a document drawn up by its internal services limited to setting out very general information obtained from conversations with some of its customers.

c 77. Second, even assuming that proviscose and viscose are used in the same applications and sold at comparable prices, it must be observed that the applicant gives no indication, not even a brief one, of the losses or other negative consequences which it has suffered as a result of LLG's supply of proviscose. Details are even more necessary in that regard since it is common ground that proviscose is a new product, which was not manufactured and put on the market until the year following that of the contested decision's adoption.

d 78. It follows from the foregoing considerations that the applicant has not adduced pertinent reasons to show the contested decision may adversely affect its legitimate interests by seriously jeopardising its position on the market.

79. In the light of that fact and of the limited role played by the applicant in the course of the pre-litigation procedure (see para 59, above), it must be held that the applicant is not individually concerned by the contested decision.

e 80. It follows that the application must be declared inadmissible without the need to consider whether the applicant is directly concerned by the contested decision.

f 81. As regards the request for measures of organisation of procedure submitted by the applicant on 16 October 2001, to the extent that it covers documents and information not covered by the measure of organisation of procedure ordered on 14 November 2001, there is no need to act on it, since the documents contained in the case file and the explanations given at the hearing are sufficient to enable the court to give judgment in these proceedings.

COSTS

g 82. Under art 87(2) of the Rules of Procedure, the unsuccessful party is to be ordered to pay the costs if they have been applied for in the successful party's pleadings. Since the applicant has been unsuccessful, and the Commission has applied for costs, the applicant must pay the costs incurred by the Commission in addition to its own costs.

h 83. The Republic of Austria must bear its own costs in accordance with the first subparagraph of art 87(4) of the Rules of Procedure. Under the third subparagraph of art 87(4) of the Rules of Procedure, LLG and the province of Burgenland must bear their own costs.

On those grounds, the Court of First Instance (Fifth Chamber, Extended Composition) hereby:

- i (1) Dismisses the action as inadmissible.
(2) Orders the applicant to bear its own costs and to pay those incurred by the Commission.
(3) Orders the interveners to bear their own costs.

Gillette Company and another v LA-Laboratories Ltd Oy

(Case C-228/03)

COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (THIRD CHAMBER)

JUDGES ROSAS (PRESIDENT OF THE CHAMBER), BORG BARTHET, VON BAHR, LÖHMUS AND Ó CAOIMH (RAPPORTEUR)

ADVOCATE GENERAL TIZZANO

21 OCTOBER, 9 DECEMBER 2004, 17 MARCH 2005

European Community – Trade marks – Infringement – Spare parts and accessories – Application of mark on labelling or packaging – Sticker affixed to packaging stating replaceable razor blades compatible with claimant companies' handle – Limitation of the effects of trade mark – Scope of limitation – Honest practices in industrial or commercial matters – Criteria for determining whether use of trade mark necessary to indicate intended purpose of product – Council Directive (EEC) 89/104, art 6(1)(c).

The claimant companies were the registered proprietors of the trade marks 'Gillette' and 'Sensor' which related to razors composed of a handle and a replaceable blade. The defendant company sold, inter alia, replaceable blades under the mark 'Parason Flexor'. The packaging of that product had a sticker affixed to it with the words: 'All Parason Flexor and Gillette Sensor handles are compatible with this blade.' Article 4 of the Finnish trade mark law provided, inter alia, that it was an unauthorised use, when putting on the market spare parts which were suited to a third party's product, to refer to that party's sign in a manner that was liable to create the impression that the product originated from the proprietor of the sign or that the proprietor had agreed to the use of the sign. The claimants' action in respect of infringement of their marks was successful at first instance. On appeal the Court of Appeal of Helsinki held that: (i) the new blades could be regarded as a spare part within art 4 of the Finnish trade mark law; (ii) the indication on the sticker could be useful to the consumer; and (iii) the packaging of the blades unequivocally indicated the origin of the product and could not have given the impression that there was a commercial connection between the claimants and the defendant. It therefore dismissed the claimants' action. On appeal, the Finnish Supreme Court, took the view that the case raised questions as to the interpretation of art 6(1)(c)<sup>a</sup> of First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks) in relation to: (i) the criteria for determining whether a product was comparable to a spare part or an accessory, (ii) the requirement that use of a mark belonging to another person had to be necessary in order to indicate the intended purpose of a product, and (iii) the concept of honest practices in industrial or commercial matters. Consequently, it referred a number of questions to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling.

Held – (1) The lawfulness or otherwise of the use of the trade mark under art 6(1)(c) depended on whether that use was necessary to indicate the

<sup>a</sup> Article 6(1)(c) is set out at judgment para 7, below

a intended purpose of a product. Use of the trade mark by a third party who was not its owner was necessary in order to indicate the intended purpose of a product marketed by that third party where such use in practice constituted the only means of providing the public with comprehensible and complete information on that intended purpose in order to preserve the undistorted system of competition in the market for that product. It was for the national court to determine whether, in the case in the main proceedings, such use was necessary, taking account of the nature of the public for which the product marketed by the third party in question was intended. Since art 6(1)(c) made no distinction between the possible intended purposes of products when assessing the lawfulness of the use of the trade mark, the criteria for assessing the lawfulness of the use of the trade mark with accessories or spare parts in particular were thus no different from those applicable to other categories of possible intended purposes for the products (see judgment paras 29, 30, 33, 35, 37–39, below).

(2) The condition of ‘honest use’ within the meaning of art 6(1)(c) constituted in substance the expression of a duty to act fairly in relation to the legitimate interests of the trade mark owner. The use of the trade mark would not be in accordance with honest practices in industrial and commercial matters if, for example: (i) it was done in such a manner as to give the impression that there was a commercial connection between the third party and the trade mark owner; (ii) it affected the value of the trade mark by taking unfair advantage of its distinctive character or repute; (iii) it entailed the discrediting or denigration of that mark; or (iv) where the third party presented its product as an imitation or replica of the product bearing the trade mark of which it was not the owner. The fact that a third party used a trade mark of which it was not the owner, in order to indicate the intended purpose of the product which it marketed, did not necessarily mean that it was presenting it as being of the same quality as, or having equivalent properties to, those of the product bearing the trade mark. Whether there had been such presentation depended on the facts of the case, and it was for the referring court to determine whether it had taken place by reference to the circumstances. Whether the product marketed by the third party had been presented as being of the same quality as, or having equivalent properties to, the product whose trade mark was being used was a factor which the referring court had to take into consideration when it verified that that use was made in accordance with honest practices in industrial or commercial matters (see judgment paras 42–49, below).

(3) Where a third party that used a trade mark of which it was not the owner marketed not only a spare part or an accessory but also the product itself with which the spare part or accessory was intended to be used, such use fell within the scope of art 6(1)(c) in so far as it was necessary to indicate the intended purpose of the product marketed by the latter and was made in accordance with honest practices in industrial and commercial matters (see judgment para 53, below).

Notes

For the exemption from infringement where use of a trade mark is necessary to indicate the intended purpose of a product, see 48 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2000 reissue) para 91.

Cases cited

Anheuser-Busch Inc v Budjovicky Budvar, narodn i podnik Case C-245/02 (2004) Transcript (opinion), 29 June, (2004) Transcript (judgment), 16 November, ECJ.

Ansul BV v Ajax Brandbeveiliging BV Case C-40/01 [2003] ECR I-2439, ECJ.

Arsenal Football Club plc v Reed Case C-206/01 [2003] All ER (EC) 1, [2003] Ch 454, [2003] 3 WLR 450, [2002] ECR I-10273, ECJ.

Bayerische Motorenwerke AG (BMW) v Deenik Case C-63/97 [1999] All ER (EC) 235, [1999] ECR I-905, ECJ.

Gerolsteiner Brunnen GmbH & Co v Putsch GmbH Case C-100/02 [2004] ECR I-691, ECJ.

Hoffman-La Roche & Co AG v Centrafarm Vertriebsgesellschaft Pharmazeutischer Erzeugnisse mbH Case 102/77 [1978] ECR 1139, ECJ.

Marca Mode CV v Adidas AG Case C-425/98 [2000] All ER (EC) 694, [2000] ECR I-4861, ECJ.

Merz & Krell GmbH & Co v Deutsches Patent- und Markenamt Case C-517/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 441, [2001] ECR I-6959, ECJ.

Parfums Christian Dior SA v Evora BV Case C-337/95 [1997] ECR I-6013, ECJ.

Philips Electronics NV v Remington Consumer Products Ltd Case C-299/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 634, [2003] Ch 159, [2003] 2 WLR 294, [2002] ECR I-5475, ECJ.

SA CNL-SUCAL NV v HAG GF AG Case C-10/89 [1990] ECR I-3711, ECJ.

Toshiba Europe GmbH v Katun Germany GmbH Case C-112/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 325, [2001] ECR I-7945, ECJ.

Reference

By decision of 23 May 2003, the Korkein Oikeus, Finland, referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities five questions (set out at judgment para 23, below) for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) concerning the interpretation of art 6(1)(c) of First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks). The reference was made in a dispute between, on the one hand, The Gillette Company and Gillette Group Finland Oy (Gillette Co, Gillette Group Finland and, collectively, the Gillette companies) and, on the other, LA-Laboratories Ltd Oy (LA-Laboratories), concerning the latter's use of the Gillette and Sensor marks on the packaging of its products. Observations were submitted on behalf of: Gillette Co and Gillette Group Finland Oy, by R Hilli and T Groop, Asianajajat; LA-Laboratories Ltd Oy, by L Latikka, Hallituksen Puheenjohtaja; the Finnish government by T Pynnä, acting as agent; the United Kingdom government, by C Jackson, acting as agent, assisted by M Tappin, Barrister; the Commission of the European Communities by M Huttunen and N B Rasmussen, acting as agents. The language of the case was Finnish. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General.

9 December 2004. The Advocate General (A Tizzano) delivered the following opinion<sup>1</sup>.

I—INTRODUCTION

1. This case concerns a reference for a preliminary ruling by the Suomen Korkein Oikeus (Finnish Supreme Court) on the interpretation of art 6(1)(c) of a First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks) (hereinafter Directive 89/104, or simply the directive)<sup>2</sup>. In summary, the national court is asking the court to determine in what circumstances the use of a third party's trade mark is to be considered lawful in terms of the directive.

<sup>1</sup> Original language: Italian.

b II—LEGISLATIVE BACKGROUND

The relevant Community law

2. The Community has intervened in the area of trade mark law, so far as concerns us here, by the adoption of Directive 89/104, which approximates the laws of the member states in various respects but stops short of full harmonisation.

c 3. The tenth recital of that directive states, inter alia, that the function of the protection afforded by the registered trade mark 'is in particular to guarantee the trade mark as an indication of origin'.

4. Next of relevance for the purposes of this case is art 5(1), which provides as follows:

d 'The registered trade mark shall confer on the proprietor exclusive rights therein. The proprietor shall be entitled to prevent all third parties not having his consent from using in the course of trade:

(a) any sign which is identical with the trade mark in relation to goods or services which are identical with those for which the trade mark is registered;

e (b) any sign where, because of its identity with, or similarity to, the trade mark and the identity or similarity of the goods or services covered by the trade mark and the sign, there exists a likelihood of confusion on the part of the public, which includes the likelihood of association between the sign and the trade mark.'

f 5. Also fundamental for present purposes is art 6(1), which reads as follows:

'The trade mark shall not entitle the proprietor to prohibit a third party from using, in the course of trade ...

(c) the trade mark where it is necessary to indicate the intended purpose of a product or service, in particular as accessories or spare parts;

g provided he uses them in accordance with honest practices in industrial or commercial matters.'

6. Finally, mention must be made of Council Directive (EEC) 84/450 (relating to the approximation of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions of the member states concerning misleading advertising)<sup>3</sup>, as amended by European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 97/55 (so as to include comparative advertising)<sup>4</sup> (hereinafter Directive 84/450 as amended and Directive 97/55, respectively), the purpose of which, according to art 1—

i 'is to protect consumers, persons carrying on a trade or business or practising a craft or profession and the interests of the public in general against misleading advertising and the unfair consequences thereof and to lay down the conditions under which comparative advertising is permitted.'

2 OJ 1989 L40 p 1.

3 OJ 1984 L250 p 17.

4 OJ 1997 L290 p 18.

7. Article 3a(1) of Directive 84/450 as amended is in the following terms:

'Comparative advertising shall, as far as the comparison is concerned, be permitted when the following conditions are met ...

(d) it does not create confusion in the market place between the advertiser and a competitor or between the advertiser's trade marks, trade names, other distinguishing marks, goods or services and those of a competitor;

(e) it does not discredit or denigrate the trade marks, trade names, other distinguishing marks, goods, services, activities, or circumstances of a competitor ...

(g) it does not take unfair advantage of the reputation of a trade mark, trade name or other distinguishing marks of a competitor or of the designation of origin of competing products;

(h) it does not present goods or services as imitations or replicas of goods or services bearing a protected trade mark or trade name.'

National law

8. In Finland, trade marks are regulated by the Tavaramerkkilaki (Finnish Law on Trade Marks, hereinafter the Tavaramerkkilaki)<sup>5</sup>.

9. Article 4(1) of the Tavaramerkkilaki sets out the exclusive right of the proprietor of a sign in the following terms:

'The right to a sign for a product under §§1 to 3 of this law means that no one other than its proprietor may use in the course of trade as a sign for his products a sign liable to be confused therewith, on the product or its packaging, in advertising or business documents or otherwise, including also use by word of mouth.'

10. Article 4(2) then specifies:

'It is regarded as unauthorised use for the purposes of the first subparagraph inter alia if a person, when putting on the market spare parts, accessories or the like which are suited to a third party's product, refers to that party's sign in a manner that is liable to create the impression that the product put on the market originates from the proprietor of the sign or that the proprietor has agreed to the use of the sign.'

11. According to the order for reference, that provision is to be understood as a qualification of the trade mark owner's exclusive right in that it is not an infringement for a party when marketing its own products to mention the trade mark of a third party in such a way as not to create the impression that the product put on the market originates from the proprietor of the sign or that the latter has consented to its use.

III—FACTS AND PROCEDURE

12. The Gillette Company of the United States is owner of the GILLETTE and SENSOR trade marks, both registered in Finland for various products including razors. Its Finnish subsidiary Gillette Group Finland Oy (the two companies will together be referred to as Gillette) holds the exclusive right to use those marks in Finland, where it markets various shaving products, including a razor, consisting of a handle and a replaceable blade, and blades sold separately.

<sup>5</sup> Law on Trade Marks No 1964/7 of 10 January 1964.

a 13. Products of the same kind—a razor consisting of a handle and a replaceable blade as well as blades sold separately—are also sold in Finland by the Finnish company LA-Laboratories Ltd Oy (hereinafter LA). LA has been marketing blades under the PARASON FLEXOR trade mark, on the packaging of which was placed a red sticker bearing the words ‘These blades fit all PARASON FLEXOR HANDLES and all GILLETTE SENSOR HANDLES’.

b 14. According to the order for reference, LA was not authorised by licence or other agreement to use Gillette’s trade marks.

c 15. Gillette thereupon brought proceedings against LA in the Helsingin Käräjäoikeus (Helsinki District Court), claiming that the defendant’s conduct infringed its registered trade marks GILLETTE and SENSOR. According to the plaintiff, LA’s conduct created the false impression that LA’s products were identical or similar to its own products or that LA was licensed or otherwise lawfully entitled to use the said trade marks.

d 16. That argument was accepted by the Helsingin Käräjäoikeus, which, by decision of 30 March 2000, held that by using the trade marks in question on its Parason Flexor razor blade packages, LA had infringed Gillette’s exclusive right under art 4(1) of the Tavaramerkkilaki.

e 17. The Helsingin Käräjäoikeus took the view that the case did not come within the exception provided for by art 4(2) of the Tavaramerkkilaki. That exception, which was subject to strict interpretation in the light of Directive 89/104, in particular art 6(1)(c), did not apply to the main product but only to spare parts, accessories and the like. In the view of the Käräjäoikeus, both the handle and the blade were main components of the razor and hence did not fall within the ambit of the exception.

f 18. The Finnish court therefore ordered LA not to continue or repeat the conduct in question, to remove from the packages the references to GILLETTE and SENSOR, to destroy the relevant stickers used in Finland, and to pay damages to Gillette.

g 19. LA appealed to the Helsingin Hovioikeus (Helsinki Court of Appeal) which by judgment of 17 May 2001 reversed the decision of the lower court in toto.

h 20. The appellate court first held that the blades constituted spare parts within the meaning of art 4(2) of the Tavaramerkkilaki. In any event, a consumer already in possession of a Gillette Sensor handle was informed by the sticker that this handle can be used not only with Gillette’s blades but with Parason Flexor blades too. The court also found that the packages of Parason razor blades were marked prominently with the PARASON and FLEXOR trade marks, showing clearly the origin of the products, whereas the GILLETTE and SENSOR marks appeared in small letters on relatively small stickers placed on the razor blade packages. That practice could not be regarded as exploiting the trade reputation of a third party’s trade mark or as creating the impression of a business connection between the owners of the different marks concerned. The appellate court therefore concluded that LA had used Gillette’s trade marks in a manner permitted by art 4(2) of the Tavaramerkkilaki.

i 21. Gillette appealed to the Korkein Oikeus, which then raised doubts as to the interpretation of art 6(1)(c) of Directive 89/104.

22. Accordingly, by order of 23 May 2003, it decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court of Justice:

'When applying Article 6(1)(c) of the First Council Directive 89/104/EEC to approximate the laws of the Member States relating to trade marks;

(1) What are the criteria

(a) on the basis of which the question of regarding a product as a spare part or accessory is to be decided, and

(b) on the basis of which those products to be regarded as other than spare parts and accessories which can also fall within the scope of the said subparagraph are to be determined?

(2) Is the permissibility of the use of a third party's trade mark to be assessed differently, depending on whether the product is like a spare part or accessory or whether it is a product which can fall within the scope of the said subparagraph on another basis?

(3) How should the requirement that the use must be "necessary" to indicate the intended purpose of a product be interpreted? Can the criterion of necessity be satisfied even though it would in itself be possible to state the intended purpose without an express reference to the third party's trade mark, by merely mentioning only for instance the technical principle of functioning of the product? What significance does it have in that case that the statement may be more difficult for consumers to understand if there is no express reference to the third party's trade mark?

(4) What factors should be taken into account when assessing accordance with honest commercial practice? Does mentioning a third party's trade mark in connection with the marketing of one's own product constitute a reference to the fact that the marketer's own product corresponds, in quality and technically or as regards its other properties, to the product designated by the third party's trade mark?

(5) Does it affect the permissibility of the use of a third party's trade mark that the economic operator who refers to the third party's trade mark also markets, in addition to a spare part or accessory, a product of his own which that spare part or accessory is intended to be used with?

23. In the ensuing proceedings, written observations were submitted by the appellant in the main proceedings, the United Kingdom government, the Finnish government and the Commission of the European Communities.

24. At the hearing on 21 October 2004, representations were made on behalf of the parties in the main proceedings, the Finnish government and the Commission.

IV—LEGAL ANALYSIS

Introduction

25. The essential function of a trade mark, according to the tenth recital to Directive 89/104 and settled case law, is that of guaranteeing the origin of goods<sup>6</sup>.

26. If that function is to be properly protected, a trade mark owner must be able to prevent unauthorised use by third parties liable to engender confusion among consumers and resulting in their mistakenly attributing a particular a product to the trade mark owner. Article 5(1) of the directive therefore gives the owner an exclusive right to the use of the mark.

<sup>6</sup> See, ex multis, Hoffman-La Roche & Co AG v Centrafarm Vertriebsgesellschaft Pharmazeutischer Erzeugnisse mbH Case 102/77 [1978] ECR 1139 (para 7), Arsenal Football Club plc v Reed Case C-206/01 [2003] All ER (EC) 1, [2002] ECR I-10273 (para 51), Ansul BV v Ajax Brandbeveiliging BV Case C-40/01 [2003] ECR I-2439 (para 36) and Anheuser-Busch Inc v Budjovický Budvar, národný podnik Case C-245/02 (2004) Transcript (opinion), 29 June, (2004) Transcript (judgment), 16 November (para 59).

27. That right is not absolute, however. Article 6 of the directive provides that in certain circumstances a trade mark may be lawfully affixed to products other than those of the trade mark owner.

b 28. In particular, according to that article, the use of a third party's trade mark is lawful where it: indicates the intended purpose of a product, is necessary to that end and is in accordance with honest practices in industrial or commercial matters (hereinafter also honest practices).

29. The reasons justifying that restriction on the exclusive use of the trade mark have been elucidated by the court. According to settled case law—

c 'by a limitation of the effects of the rights derived from Article 5 of Directive 89/104 by the proprietor of a trade mark, Article 6 of that directive seeks to reconcile the fundamental interests of trade-mark protection with those of free movement of goods and freedom to provide services in the common market in such a way that trade mark rights are able to fulfil their essential role in the system of undistorted competition
d which the Treaty seeks to establish and maintain ...'<sup>7</sup>

30. It can therefore be said that, in limiting the exclusive right provided for under art 5, art 6(1)(c) of Directive 89/104 seeks to balance the owner's interest in the trade mark being able to perform to the full its function of guaranteeing the product's origin against the interest of other traders in having full access e to the market, but leaving the door open—as would appear borne out by the broad reference to free movement in the court's statement quoted above and as we will see below—for other interests too to come into play.

The first and second questions

f 31. Following those preliminary observations, I now come to the questions referred by the national court.

32. By its first two questions, which I will consider together, the national court asks, in substance, what criteria are to be used, when applying art 6(1)(c) of Directive 89/104, to distinguish main products from accessories and spare parts, and to determine which other products, apart from spare parts and accessories, are capable of falling within the scope of that provision. This with g a view to ascertaining whether in the case of such other products the lawfulness or otherwise of affixing a third party's trade mark must be assessed differently than in the case of spare parts and accessories.

33. As we have seen, one of the conditions to be satisfied in order for a third party's trade mark to be lawfully placed on a product is that it must perform
h the function of indicating the intended purpose of the product, not its origin.

34. It seems to me that from that perspective the question of using a third party's trade mark to indicate intended purpose, without adding anything concerning origin, arises in substantially the same terms for every product or service.

i 35. Of course, the issue will arise more often for accessories and spare parts, which have to be used in conjunction with a main product that in most cases cannot be identified otherwise than by its trade mark. One need think only of an exhaust pipe or a bicycle rack specially designed for the Volkswagen Polo, to take the examples adduced by the United Kingdom government. But the same situation can also arise with two products that are capable of being used together but of which neither is the accessory or spare part of the other. Taking our cue again from the United Kingdom government, we may consider the example of a computer produced by company A and an operating system produced by company B which are mutually compatible. These are neither accessories nor spare parts because each product exists in its own right. And yet the producer in each case has a legitimate interest in informing the public that its product can have the other's product as its intended purpose.

<sup>7</sup> See Gerolsteiner Brunnen GmbH & Co v Putsch GmbH Case C-100/02 [2004] ECR I-691 (para 16) and cases cited there.

36. I therefore take the view that there are no goods or services excluded ex ante from the scope of art 6(1)(c) of the directive by virtue of the condition now under consideration. Thus, regardless of whether the item in question is a main product, an accessory, or a spare part, if using a third party's trade mark is necessary in order to indicate its intended purpose, this condition must be regarded as satisfied.

37. This interpretation appears to me to be borne out by other considerations. To begin with the letter of the provision in question, I note that the reference to accessories and spare parts is preceded by the expression 'in particular'. That suggests that the limitation of the exclusive right can also apply to products which are not accessories or spare parts, all the more so since, as the Commission points out, its original proposal for a directive specifically excluded that possibility but was subsequently amended in precisely that respect<sup>8</sup>.

38. In addition, as the United Kingdom government pointed out, the provision in question refers to the intended purpose not only of goods but also of services, for which it would be difficult to conceive of spare parts or accessories.

39. All this confirms, in my opinion, that for the purposes of the application of art 6(1)(c) of the directive, it is not necessary first to categorise an item as main product or accessory or spare part, because the fundamental factor in all cases is whether the use of the third party's trade mark is necessary in order to indicate the intended purpose of the product (or service) and does not give rise to confusion as to its origin.

40. But if that is so, it does not then appear to me necessary, for present purposes, for the court to decide the criteria to be used to identify main products and to distinguish them from accessories and spare parts, as the first question asks.

41. I therefore propose that the first and second questions should be answered to the effect that since all that needs to be established, for the purposes of the application of art 6(1)(c) of the directive, is whether the use of the third party's trade mark is necessary in order to indicate the intended purpose of the product (or service) and does not give rise to confusion as to its origin, the assessment of the lawfulness of the use of a third party's trade mark does not vary according to whether it is a main product or an accessory or spare part.

<sup>8</sup> Article 5 of the Proposal for a First Council Directive to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks, presented by the Commission on 25 November 1980, provided that '[t]he trade mark shall not entitle the proprietor thereof to prohibit a third party from using, in the course of trade ... (c) the trade mark for the purpose of indicating the intended purpose of accessories or spares parts ...' (OJ 1980 C351 p 1).

a The third question

42. By its third question, the national court asks in substance what factors should be taken into account in determining whether the use of a third party's trade mark is 'necessary', within the meaning of art 6(1)(c) of the directive, to indicate the intended purpose of a product.

b 43. In their observations to the court, the intervening parties support two very different interpretations of this condition that the use of a third party's trade mark must be necessary.

44. The United Kingdom government suggests that the condition should be considered satisfied if the use of the trade mark is an 'efficient and accurate means'<sup>9</sup> of informing potential purchasers as to the intended purpose of the product.

c 45. It argues that the purpose of the provision in question is to assist in promoting undistorted competition and that too strict an interpretation of the condition would have the effect of neutering the provision.

46. In the United Kingdom's view, if the condition that the use of a third party's trade mark must be necessary were interpreted as being satisfied only if no other way can be found of conveying the information needed by the potential purchaser to understand the intended purpose of the product, then in practice the provision might never apply. In virtually every case it would be possible to conceive of some way of indicating the intended purpose of the product other than by using the third party's trade mark, for example by using a picture or a technical description of the type of product it will fit.

e 47. This view is shared by the Finnish government and the Commission, who believe it is important also to take into account the characteristics of potential purchasers of the product carrying the third party's trade mark. What is 'necessary' to communicate varies according to whether the product is one aimed at final consumers or at other businesses. Only in the latter case could technical details adequately convey the information as to the intended purpose of the product, without it being 'necessary' therefore to use the third party's trade mark. For average consumers, however, the absence of the trade mark would make it more difficult to understand a product's intended purpose, unless there are technical standards which are universally known and which allow even the average consumer to understand easily the intended purpose of the product in question. A case in point, as was observed at the hearing, is that of tyres, where a system of easy-to-understand codes is used to let potential buyers know which models are right for their cars.

f 48. Quite the opposite view is taken by Gillette, which contends for a rigidly and exclusively economic interpretation of the condition in question. According to Gillette, the use of a third party's trade mark can be considered 'necessary' only if it is the sole means by which the user can market its own product on a sustainable economic basis.

h 49. Applying that interpretation to the case in hand, Gillette observes that LA's blades have as their intended purpose not only Gillette's handles but also LA's own handles and indeed, as emerged during the hearing, other makes of handle as well. It follows, in Gillette's view, that LA's blades would have access to the market and could be marketed on an economically viable basis even without it being stated on the packaging that they also fit the handles produced by Gillette.

i

<sup>9</sup> Footnote not relevant to the English version.

50. It would be different if it were not possible to indicate any intended purpose for LA's blades without mentioning the trade marks in question, because in that case there would be no demand for the blades and therefore no possibility whatsoever of trading viably. But such is not the case here, Gillette maintains, given that LA itself also produces handles, so that its blades would not be completely denied access to the market if the Gillette trade marks were not allowed to appear on their packaging. a

51. For my part, I have no difficulty accepting that the approach proposed by Gillette appears more in keeping with the letter of art 6(1)(c) of the directive, which refers to the use of the third party's trade mark not as 'efficient' but as 'necessary', and needless to say the two are not synonymous. b

52. Moreover, this seems to be borne out by a comparison of the final text of the provision and the Commission's original proposal<sup>10</sup>. The latter provided that third parties could use a third party's trade mark 'for the purpose of indicating the intended purpose of accessories or spare parts'<sup>11</sup>; the final version, as we have seen, is couched in more restrictive terms, providing that such use is permitted 'where it is necessary to indicate the intended purpose ...' c

53. That said, however, it has to be asked whether the matter can be disposed of by a semantic analysis of an isolated phrase of the provision in question or whether a more comprehensive approach is called for that takes fuller account of the meaning and scope of that provision and the purposes it seeks to achieve. d

54. More specifically, it has to be asked whether trade mark protection, which is inarguably the fundamental aim of the directive, is to be seen purely in terms of the trade mark proprietor's needs, and is therefore, as Gillette argues, subject only to such limits as are strictly economically necessary to permit other suppliers to have a viable presence in the market, or whether the exception introduced by art 6(1) is also premised on the importance of other needs. e

55. It seems to me in fact that that provision opens the door also to other values and interests which it does not expressly mention but which in the broader perspective it would be difficult to ignore. All the more so as they are referred to in the judgment quoted at para 29, above, where the court stated that art 6(1)— f

'seeks to reconcile the fundamental interests of trade-mark protection with those of free movement of goods and freedom to provide services in the common market in such a way that trade mark rights are able to fulfil their essential role in the system of undistorted competition which the Treaty seeks to establish and maintain ...' g

56. It is therefore, as the court points out, a matter of reconciling two different interests, both of which however are directed at ensuring a system of undistorted competition and thus, ultimately, the right of consumers to choose from a variety of interchangeable products. What this means, in other words, is that, as well as protecting the economic interests of the trade mark owner, the directive also seeks to ensure choice for consumers by allowing them not only to be sure about the origin of products but also to enjoy to the full the benefits resulting from competition between different products capable of satisfying the same need. h a 57. However, since the exception provided for by art 6(1) is meant to balance these different interests, it follows that, in the context of the more comprehensive analysis of the provision I mentioned above, one cannot simply rely on textual arguments derived from one phrase in that provision to give primacy to one of those interests and to discount the others, because the purpose of the provision, according to the court, is to reconcile all of them.

<sup>10</sup> See art 5(c), quoted in footnote 8, above.

<sup>11</sup> My emphasis. i

b 58. Moreover, an important testimony to the need to take into account, and as far as possible conciliate, the different requirements in play seems to me to be found, once more, in the case law of the court, in this instance in Bayerische Motorenwerke AG (BMW) v Deenik<sup>12</sup>, in which the court did indeed reconcile the requirement of protecting the trade mark owner with that of protecting the consumer even in terms of maximising competition and providing complete information.

c 59. I would recall, so far as concerns us here, that in that case the owner of a garage not part of the BMW network carried on business repairing BMW cars and described himself in advertisements as 'specialised in BMWs'. BMW claimed that such conduct was not within the exception in art 6(1)(c) of the directive and should therefore be held to be an infringement of BMW's exclusive right. In its view, since the trader could also carry on an economically viable business offering repair services without naming any specific make of car (and hence any trade mark), the use of the BMW trade mark did not satisfy the condition of necessity laid down by that provision.

d 60. But that interpretation of the condition in question, which is not in my view dissimilar to that contended for by Gillette in this case, does not seem to me to have met the court's favour. For instead of considering whether the garage owner's business would be commercially viable were he to drop the references to the BMW trade mark, the court focused solely on the need to provide his prospective customers with the fullest possible information.

e 61. Having first noted that 'the use [of the BMW mark] [was] intended to identify the goods in respect of which the service [was] provided [and was] necessary to indicate the intended purpose of the service', it went on to find that 'if an independent trader carries out the maintenance and repair of BMW cars or is in fact a specialist in that field, that fact cannot in practice be communicated to his customers without using the BMW mark'<sup>13</sup>.

f 62. In so doing, the court espoused the approach followed by Advocate General Jacobs in his opinion in that case<sup>14</sup>, when he noted that the issue in such circumstances was in effect whether a trader in the position described above was 'free to describe the nature of the services he is offering'<sup>15</sup>. The Advocate General went so far as to assert that 'to prevent such use of the mark would be an undue restriction on the trader's freedom'<sup>16</sup>.

g 63. It seems to me that the interpretation of the condition in question emanating from that case is less rigid than what Gillette seeks. The condition appears to be satisfied simply by the fact that the use of a third party's trade

12 Case C-63/97 [1999] All ER (EC) 235, [1999] ECR I-905.

13 See the BMW case (paras 59, 60).

i 14 In his opinion delivered on 2 April 1998, Advocate General Jacobs (at para 54) dismissed as 'unrealistic' the proposition that the garage owner could have provided his services without needing to name any specific make of car, observing that 'if [he] does in fact specialise in maintaining and repairing BMW cars it is difficult to see how he could effectively communicate that fact to his customers without using the sign BMW'.

15 See para 54 of the opinion.

16 See para 55 of the opinion.

mark is the only effective means of extending the range of products from which the prospective purchaser can choose. a

64. If that interpretation is transposed to the present case, it follows that, were the Gillette trade marks not to appear on LA's blade packages, consumers might have no other means of apprehending the objective fact that those products fit Gillette handles, and might thereby be denied information material to their purchasing decisions. Accordingly, if it were the only means of providing that information, the use of the Gillette trade marks should be considered 'necessary' within the meaning of the directive. b

65. It would naturally be for the national court to decide the issue, that is, to ascertain whether without the references to the Gillette trade marks on LA's blade packages, potential purchasers could be effectively informed by other means that those blades can be used with Gillette handles. The use of Gillette's trade marks might not be necessary, for example, if there were technical standards known to consumers indicating which handles fit which blades (as in the aforementioned case of tyres). c

66. That being so, and while stating my preference for the above approach, I must acknowledge that, besides the fact that it does not fully meet the objections of a general nature raised by Gillette (undue reduction of the trade mark owner's protection), it also leaves a large grey area as to its application. But this consequence, in my opinion, is difficult to avoid if the discussion of the test of necessity continues to be conducted in isolation from the remaining conditions set out in art 6(1), reducing it in effect, as I have said, to a semantic dispute about the relevant phrase in that provision. d

67. It is a different matter, however, if account is taken of the fact that that test does not represent the entirety of the provision in question, but is in fact accompanied by, and strictly correlated with, a clear condition as to the manner of use of the trade mark claimed to be necessary (ie in accordance with honest practices). In other words, the fact that the interpretation of that condition is the subject of a separate question referred for a preliminary ruling should not have the effect of splitting the issue in such a way as to lose sight of the direct link which exists between the different parts of the provision and which is therefore going to affect the interpretation of each of them. e

68. It seems to me that the grey area which, as I have said, is an inevitable concomitant of the test of necessity, can be resolved at the stage of examining the circumstances and manner of use of the trade mark, in the terms indicated by art 6(1). In this way too it is possible to meet legitimate concerns as to the damage that might be done to trade mark protection as a result of a less rigorous interpretation of the condition of necessity. f

69. The less rigorous that interpretation may be, the more stringent will be the scrutiny of the manner of use. At the same time, it is precisely on the more solid ground of that scrutiny that the actual 'necessity' of the use of the mark can be better assessed and such doubts as may always arise in the abstract in that regard dispelled. g

70. Besides, the court did not deal with the issue under consideration by separate and sequential tests, first 'measuring' the degree to which the use of the third party's trade mark was 'necessary' and then determining whether that use was in accordance with 'honest practices'. Instead it adopted a unitary approach, in which I would say that the emphasis was placed less on the issue of 'necessity' than on compliance with honest practices, on the basis that they h

i

a are decisive in avoiding any confusion as to the origin of the product and hence to the protection of the trade mark proprietor<sup>17</sup>.

71. It is therefore only with the above qualifications that I propose that the court should answer the third question to the effect that the use of a third party's trade mark is 'necessary' to indicate the intended purpose of a product if it constitutes the only means of providing consumers with complete b information as to the possible uses of the product in question.

The fourth question

72. We now come to the interpretation of the phrase 'honest practices in industrial or commercial matters', which by its fourth question the national c court asks the court to provide, in view of the fact that art 6(1) of Directive 89/104 makes the right of a third party to use a trade mark subject to compliance with those practices.

73. In this regard, I would note that, according to settled case law, '[t]he condition of "honest practice" constitutes ... the expression of a duty to act fairly in relation to the legitimate interests of the trade mark owner'<sup>18</sup>. That d being so, however, it still remains to ascertain the scope of that duty, given that it is not defined in Directive 89/104.

74. It seems to me that this can be done simply by consulting the relevant case law of the court, which provides the means by which to demarcate the scope of the duty in question. The court has explained that a third party cannot use a trade mark 'in a way that may create the impression that there is a e commercial connection between the other undertaking and the trade mark proprietor, and in particular that ... there is a special relationship between the two undertakings'<sup>19</sup>. It also noted that an undertaking using a third party's trade mark must not take 'unfair advantage of its distinctive character or f repute'. An advantage will be unfair, in particular, if it is the result of prospective buyers being led to believe that there is a connection between the trade mark proprietor and the undertaking that produced the product<sup>20</sup>.

75. But as the referring court itself, the United Kingdom government and the Commission suggest, useful guidance is provided not only by the case law but also by the Community provisions on misleading and comparative advertising, in particular Directive 84/450 as amended by Directive 97/55.

76. Recitals (13) to (15) of the latter directive indicate that the exclusive right
g conferred on the proprietor of a trade mark by art 5 of Directive 89/104 is not infringed where a third party uses the trade mark in compliance with the conditions laid down by Directive 97/55.

77. It follows that, if the message conveyed through the use of the trade mark is lawful for the purposes of the provisions on misleading and h comparative advertising, the 'honest practices' referred to in art 6(1) of Directive 89/104 can be regarded as having been observed.

78. In fact the conditions that are laid down by art 3a of Directive 84/450 as amended (inserted by art 1(4) of Directive 97/55) for comparative advertising to be lawful (and which are most relevant to the present case) do not differ

i 17 See the BMW case (paras 61 et seq) and the opinion in that case (paras 55, 56).

18 See the BMW case (para 61) and the Gerolsteiner Brunnen case (para 24).

19 See the BMW case (para 64).

20 See the BMW case (paras 52, 53). I must point out that this reasoning concerned art 7(2) of Directive 89/104; however, in paras 62 and 63, the court stated that the same considerations 'apply mutatis mutandis' to art 6(1).

substantially from those that can be inferred from the court's case law quoted above. Those conditions are that such advertising does not create confusion in the market place between the advertiser and a competitor (see sub-para (d)) and does not seek to take unfair advantage of the reputation of a trade mark of a competitor (see sub-para (g)). a

79. It follows therefore from the case law quoted above and from the provisions of Directive 84/450 that it is clearly unlawful to use a third party's trade mark in such a way as to create confusion among prospective purchasers as to the origin of the product. In particular, prospective purchasers must not be led to believe that the product is referable to the trade mark owner and therefore possesses the same quality as its products. b

80. The Finnish and United Kingdom governments contend, however, that when an undertaking places a third party's trade mark on its own product, it does not necessarily intend to represent that its own products and those of the trade mark proprietor are of equal quality. In the BMW case, the court effectively acknowledged the lawfulness of the use of a third party's trade mark on the part of a trader wishing to 'lend an aura of quality to his own business'.<sup>21</sup> c

81. As described at para 59, above, however, that case, to the extent that it is relevant here, concerned the carrying out of repairs on BMW cars. The subject matter of the trader's business consisted of products lawfully bearing the BMW trade mark; the 'aura of quality' that the trader derived from the subject matter of his own business was not unlawful as it was a reflection of the fact that he had the ability to work on products whose quality was guaranteed by the presence of the BMW mark. d

82. In the present case, by contrast, LA's blade production is a process that is already complete at the point when the information is conveyed that the blades can be used with the Gillette razors. Therefore, the fact that the two products are compatible should not have any bearing on consumers' judgment of the quality of LA's blades. If however the use of the trade mark led consumers to believe that the quality of both types of blade was the same, then the conclusion would have to be that the condition of compliance with honest practices was not met. e

83. It is therefore for the national court to determine whether the use of the Gillette trade marks on LA's blade packages is aimed solely at informing prospective buyers of the fact that LA's blades can be attached to Gillette's razor handles because the fittings are compatible, or whether it also implies that LA's blades have the same cutting characteristics, and are hence of the same quality, as the Gillette blades. f

84. The examination to be conducted by the national court for this purpose must consist of a global assessment 'taking into account all factors relevant to the circumstances of the case'.<sup>22</sup> That is what the court has stipulated in relation to the manner of assessment of the likelihood of confusion in determining the scope of the exclusive right enjoyed by the trade mark proprietor under art 5(1)(b) of Directive 89/104. Since however the determination of the honest practices condition will inevitably affect the scope of that exclusive right, by making it more or less extensive, it seems to me that g

h

i

21 See the BMW case (para 53).

22 See Marca Mode CV v Adidas AG Case C-425/98 [2000] All ER (EC) 694, [2000] ECR I-4861 (para 40).

a the assessment to be conducted by the national court as to whether that condition is satisfied must also obey the criterion stated above<sup>23</sup>.

85. On the basis of the foregoing, I therefore propose that the court answer the fourth question to the effect that a trader complies with 'honest practices in industrial or commercial matters' if by using a third party's trade mark it does not create the impression that there is a commercial connection between itself and the trade mark proprietor and does not take unfair advantage of the trade mark's distinctive character or repute. The fact that a trader also sells those products and places the third party's trade mark on them does not necessarily mean that it represents that its products are equal in quality to those of the trade mark proprietor. The trader's conduct must therefore be considered on the basis of a global assessment of all the relevant factors.

The fifth question

86. By its fifth question, the national court asks in substance whether the assessment of the lawfulness of the use of a third party's trade mark is affected by the fact that the trader who places a third party's trade mark on its own product also sells the type of product that the former is intended to be used with.

87. It seems to me that in order to answer that question there are two different aspects to consider separately, one concerning the requirement of necessity and the other concerning compliance with 'honest practices', which were considered in the analysis of the third and fourth questions respectively.

e 88. As regards the first aspect, I must say that if the economic approach to the condition of necessity advocated by Gillette had been accepted then the fact that, as well as the blades, LA also sells a razor handle that constitutes one of their possible intended purposes could have cast doubt on whether the condition was satisfied, since even without using the Gillette trade marks there would still be demand for LA's blades on the part of owners of LA's razor handle.

f 89. Since however, for the reasons given, I have come to the conclusion that the necessity condition is met if the use of a third party's trade mark on a product constitutes the only means of providing consumers with complete information as to the possible uses of the product in question, the assessment of the lawfulness of the use of the trade mark does not seem to me to be affected by the fact that the trader also sells a product which constitutes one of the possible intended purposes of the product on which it places the third party's trade mark.

g 90. As regards the aspect concerning 'honest practices', I will simply note, along with the United Kingdom, Finland and the Commission, that what is described in this question is just one of the factors, albeit an important one, that the national court has to take into account in assessing whether the use of the trade mark by the third party is in accordance with honest practices.

h 91. I therefore propose that the fifth question be answered to the effect that the fact that a trader who places a third party's trade mark on its own product also sells the type of product that the former is intended to be used with is an important factor in assessing the lawfulness of the use of the trade mark but does not alter the criteria applicable to that assessment. a

i

23 I would note as a preliminary point that the same approach was adopted by the court to determining whether the conditions set out by Directive 84/450, as amended, are met, when it stated that 'account should be taken of the overall presentation of the advertising at issue' (see Toshiba Europe GmbH v Katun Germany GmbH Case C-112/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 325, [2001] ECR I-7945 (para 60)).

V—CONCLUSION

92. In the light of the foregoing considerations I propose that the Court of Justice answer the questions of the Korkein Oikeus in the following terms: b

(1) since all that needs to be established, for the purposes of the application of art 6(1)(c) of Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks), is whether the use of the third party's trade mark is necessary in order to indicate the intended purpose of the product (or service) and does not give rise to confusion as to its origin, the assessment of the lawfulness of the use of a third party's trade mark does not vary according to whether it is a main product or an accessory or spare part; c

(2) the use of a third party's trade mark is necessary to indicate the intended purpose of a product if it constitutes the only means of providing consumers with complete information as to the possible uses of the product in question; d

(3) a trader complies with 'honest practices in industrial or commercial matters' if by using a third party's trade mark it does not create the impression that there is a commercial connection between itself and the trade mark proprietor and does not take unfair advantage of the trade mark's distinctive character or repute. The fact that a trader also sells those products and places the third party's trade mark on them does not necessarily mean that it represents that its products are equal in quality to those of the trade mark proprietor. The trader's conduct must therefore be considered on the basis of a global assessment of all the relevant factors; e

(4) the fact that a trader who places a third party's trade mark on its own product also sells the type of product that the former is intended to be used with is an important factor in assessing the lawfulness of the use of the trade mark but does not alter the criteria applicable to that assessment. f

17 March 2005. THE COURT OF JUSTICE (Third Chamber) delivered the following judgment.

1. This reference for a preliminary ruling concerns the interpretation of art 6(1)(c) of First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks) (OJ 1989 L40 p 1). g

2. The reference was made in a dispute between, on the one hand, the Gillette Company and Gillette Group Finland Oy (Gillette Co, Gillette Group Finland and, collectively, the Gillette companies) and, on the other, LA-Laboratories Ltd Oy (LA-Laboratories), concerning the latter's use of the Gillette and Sensor marks on the packaging of its products. h

LEGAL BACKGROUND

Community provisions

3. According to the first recital in the preamble to Directive 89/104, the trade mark laws at present applicable in the member states contain disparities which may impede the free movement of goods and freedom to provide services and may distort competition within the common market. According to that recital, it is therefore necessary, in view of the establishment and functioning of the internal market, to approximate the laws of member states. The third i

- a recital states that it does not appear to be necessary at present to undertake full-scale approximation of the trade mark laws of the member states.
4. The tenth recital of the directive states, inter alia, that the aim of the protection conferred by the registered trade mark is in particular to guarantee the trade mark as an indication of origin.
- b 5. Article 5(1) of the directive provides:
- ‘The registered trade mark shall confer on the proprietor exclusive rights therein. The proprietor shall be entitled to prevent all third parties not having his consent from using in the course of trade:
- c (a) any sign which is identical with the trade mark in relation to goods or services which are identical with those for which the trade mark is registered;
- (b) any sign where, because of its identity with, or similarity to, the trade mark and the identity or similarity of the goods or services covered by the trade mark and the sign, there exists a likelihood of confusion on the part of the public, which includes the likelihood of association between the sign and the trade mark.’
- d 6. Article 5(3)(a) and (b) of Directive 89/104 provide:
- ‘The following, inter alia, may be prohibited under paragraphs 1 and 2:
- (a) affixing the sign to the goods or to the packaging thereof;
- (b) offering the goods, or putting them on the market or stocking them
- e for these purposes ...’
7. Article 6 of that directive, headed ‘Limitation of the effects of a trade mark’ provides:
- ‘1. The trade mark shall not entitle the proprietor to prohibit a third party from using, in the course of trade ...
- f (c) the trade mark where it is necessary to indicate the intended purpose of a product or service, in particular as accessories or spare parts; provided he uses them in accordance with honest practices in industrial or commercial matters ...’
- g 8. Council Directive (EEC) 84/450 (relating to the approximation of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions of the member states concerning misleading advertising) (OJ 1984 L250 p 17), as amended by European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 97/55 (OJ 1997 L290 p 18) is designed, according to art 1 thereof, to protect consumers, persons carrying on a trade or business or practising a craft or profession and the interests of the public in
- h general against misleading advertising and the unfair consequences thereof and to lay down the conditions under which comparative advertising is permitted.
9. According to art 3a(1) of that directive:
- ‘Comparative advertising shall, as far as the comparison is concerned, be permitted when the following conditions are met ...
- i (d) it does not create confusion in the market place between the advertiser and a competitor or between the advertiser’s trade marks, trade names, other distinguishing marks, goods or services and those of a competitor;
- (e) it does not discredit or denigrate the trade marks, trade names, other distinguishing marks, goods, services, activities, or circumstances of a competitor ...

- (g) it does not take unfair advantage of the reputation of a trade mark, trade name or other distinguishing marks of a competitor or of the designation of origin of competing products; a
- (h) it does not present goods or services as imitations or replicas of goods or services bearing a protected trade mark or trade name.'

National provisions

10. In Finland, trade mark law is governed by the Tavaramerkkilaki (Law on Trade Marks) (Law No 7/1964 of 10 January 1964), as amended by Law No 39/1993 of 25 January 1993 (the Tavaramerkkilaki).

11. Article 4(1) of the Tavaramerkkilaki, concerning the content of the exclusive rights of the trade mark owner, provides: b

'The right under Articles 1 to 3 of this law to affix a distinctive sign on one's goods means that no one other than the proprietor of the sign may, in the course of trade, use as a sign for his products references which could create confusion, whether on the goods or their packaging, in advertising or business documents or otherwise, including by word of mouth ...' c

12. According to art 4(2): d

'It is regarded as unauthorised use for the purposes of the first subparagraph inter alia if a person, when putting on the market spare parts, accessories or the like which are suited to a third party's product, refers to that party's sign in a manner that is liable to create the impression that the product put on the market originates from the proprietor of the sign or that the proprietor has agreed to the use of the sign.' e

THE DISPUTE IN THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTIONS REFERRED

13. Gillette Co secured the registration in Finland of the trade marks Gillette and Sensor for products falling within Class 8 of the Nice Agreement Concerning the International Classification of Goods and Services for the Purposes of the Registration of Marks (Nice, 15 June 1957; UKTS 71 (1970); Cmnd 3466), as revised and amended, namely: hand tools and implements (hand-operated); cutlery; side arms; razors. Gillette Group Finland, which holds the exclusive right to use those marks in Finland, has been marketing razors in that member state, particularly razors composed of a handle and a replaceable blade and such blades on their own. f

14. LA-Laboratories also sells razors in Finland that are composed of a handle and a replaceable blade and blades on their own similar to those marketed by Gillette Group Finland. Those blades are sold under the mark Parason Flexor and their packaging has affixed to it a sticker with the words: 'All Parason Flexor and Gillette Sensor handles are compatible with this blade.' g

15. The order for reference shows that LA-Laboratories was not authorised by a trade mark licence or any other contract to use the marks of which Gillette Co is the proprietor. h

16. The Gillette companies brought an action before the Helsingin Käräjäoikeus, Finland (Court of First Instance of Helsinki) arguing that LA-Laboratories had infringed the registered marks Gillette and Sensor. According to them, the practices of LA-Laboratories created a link in the mind of consumers between the products marketed by the latter and those of the Gillette companies, or gave the impression that that company was authorised, by virtue of a licence or for another reason, to use the Gillette and Sensor marks, which was not the case. i a 17. In its judgment of 30 March 2000, the Helsingin Käräjäoikeus held that, under art 4(1) of the Tavaramerkkilaki, the Gillette companies held the exclusive right to affix the Gillette and Sensor marks to their products and their packaging, and to use those marks in advertising. Therefore, by mentioning those marks in an eye-catching manner on the packaging of its products, LA-Laboratories had infringed that exclusive right. The Helsingin Käräjäoikeus b further held that art 4(2) of the Tavaramerkkilaki, which provides for an exception to that principle of exclusivity, must be interpreted narrowly in the light of art 6(1)(c) of Directive 89/104. In its view, that provision does not relate to the essential parts of a product but only to spare parts, accessories and other similar parts, which are compatible with the manufactured product or c marketed by another person.

18. That court held that both the handle and the blade were to be regarded as essential parts of the razor and not as spare parts or accessories. It therefore held that the exception under art 4(2) of the Tavaramerkkilaki did not apply. On those grounds, that court decided to prohibit LA-Laboratories from pursuing or renewing the infringement of the Gillette companies' rights over d the Gillette and Sensor marks, and ordered that company, first, to remove and destroy the stickers used in Finland referring to those trade marks, and, second, to pay the Gillette companies a total of FIM 30,000 in damages for the harm suffered by them.

19. On appeal, the Helsingin Hovioikeus (Court of Appeal of Helsinki), by a decision of 17 May 2001, held, first, that, where a razor of the type currently at e issue in the main proceedings was composed of a handle and a blade, the consumer could replace that latter part by a new blade, sold separately. The latter, being in substitution for a former part of the razor, could therefore be regarded as a spare part within the meaning of art 4(2) of the Tavaramerkkilaki.

f 20. Secondly, that court held that the indication on the sticker affixed to the packaging of the razor blades marketed by LA-Laboratories, to the effect that, besides being compatible with handles of the Parason Flexor type, those blades were also compatible with handles marketed by the Gillette companies, could be useful to the consumer and that LA-Laboratories might therefore be able to demonstrate the need to mention the Gillette and Sensor trade marks on that g sticker.

21. Thirdly, the Helsingin Hovioikeus held that the packaging of razor blades marketed by LA-Laboratories visibly bore the Parason and Flexor signs, unequivocally indicating the origin of the product. It further held that the reference to the Gillette and Sensor marks in small standard lettering on h stickers of a relatively modest size affixed to the exterior of that packaging could not in any way have given the impression that there was a commercial connection between the Gillette companies and LA-Laboratories, and that the latter had therefore referred to those marks in circumstances allowed by art 4(2) of the Tavaramerkkilaki. The Helsingin Hovioikeus therefore annulled the judgment of the Helsingin Käräjäoikeus and dismissed the action brought by the Gillette companies.

i 22. The Gillette companies appealed to the Korkein Oikeus, which took the view that the case raised questions as to the interpretation of art 6(1)(c) of Directive 89/104 in relation to the criteria for determining whether, by its nature, a product is or is not comparable to a spare part or an accessory, in relation to the requirement that use of a mark belonging to another person must be necessary in order to indicate the intended purpose of a product, and in relation to the concept of honest practices in industrial or commercial matters, the interpretation of those provisions also having to take account of Directive 84/450. a

23. In those circumstances, the Korkein Oikeus decided to stay the proceedings and refer the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

'When applying Article 6(1)(c) of the First Council Directive 89/104/EEC to approximate the laws of the Member States relating to trade marks;

(1) What are the criteria b

(a) on the basis of which the question of regarding a product as a spare part or accessory is to be decided, and c

(b) on the basis of which those products to be regarded as other than spare parts and accessories which can also fall within the scope of the said subparagraph are to be determined?

(2) Is the permissibility of the use of a third party's trade mark to be assessed differently, depending on whether the product is like a spare part or accessory or whether it is a product which can fall within the scope of the said subparagraph on another basis? d

(3) How should the requirement that the use must be "necessary" to indicate the intended purpose of a product be interpreted? Can the criterion of necessity be satisfied even though it would in itself be possible to state the intended purpose without an express reference to the third party's trade mark, by merely mentioning only for instance the technical principle of functioning of the product? What significance does it have in that case that the statement may be more difficult for consumers to understand if there is no express reference to the third party's trade mark? e

(4) What factors should be taken into account when assessing use in accordance with honest commercial practice? Does mentioning a third party's trade mark in connection with the marketing of one's own product constitute a reference to the fact that the marketer's own product corresponds, in quality and technically or as regards its other properties, to the product designated by the third party's trade mark? f

(5) Does it affect the permissibility of the use of a third party's trade mark that the economic operator who refers to the third party's trade mark also markets, in addition to a spare part or accessory, a product of his own with which that spare part or accessory is intended to be used with? g

THE FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD QUESTIONS

24. In its first, second and third questions, which it will be convenient to examine together, the national court essentially asks what criteria must be used in interpreting the requirement that use by a third party of a trade mark of which he is not the owner must be necessary in order to indicate the intended purpose of a product, within the meaning of art 6(1)(c) of Directive 89/104. The court also asks, first, according to what criteria products must be regarded as accessories or spare parts within the meaning of that provision and, second, whether the criteria for assessing the lawfulness of the use of the trade mark in relation to those latter products are different from those applicable to other products. h

25. It should be noted as a preliminary point that trade mark rights are an essential element in the system of undistorted competition which the i

- a EC Treaty seeks to establish and maintain. Under such a system, an undertaking must be in a position to keep its customers by virtue of the quality of its products and services, something which is possible only if there are distinctive marks which enable customers to identify them (see, in particular, SA CNL-SUCAL NV v HAG GF AG Case C-10/89 [1990] ECR I-3711 (para 13), Merz & Krell GmbH & Co v Deutsches Patent- und Markenamt Case C-517/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 441, [2001] ECR I-6959 (para 21) and Arsenal Football Club plc v Reed Case C-206/01 [2003] All ER (EC) 1, [2002] ECR I-10273 (para 47)).

- b 26. In that context, the essential function of a trade mark is to guarantee the identity of origin of the marked goods or services to the consumer or end user by enabling him, without any possibility of confusion, to distinguish the goods or services from others which have another origin. For the trade mark to be able to fulfil its essential role in the system of undistorted competition which the Treaty seeks to establish and maintain, it must offer a guarantee that all the goods or services bearing it have been manufactured or supplied under the control of a single undertaking which is responsible for their quality (see, in particular, Hoffman-La Roche & Co AG v Centrafarm Vertriebsgesellschaft Pharmazeutischer Erzeugnisse mbH Case 102/77 [1978] ECR 1139 (para 7), Philips Electronics NV v Remington Consumer Products Ltd Case C-299/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 634, [2002] ECR I-5475 (para 30) and the Arsenal Football Club case (para 48)).

- c 27. Article 5 of Directive 89/104 defines the 'rights conferred by a trade mark', while art 6 contains rules on the 'limitation of the effects of a trade mark'.

- d 28. According to the first sentence of art 5(1) of Directive 89/104, the registered trade mark confers an exclusive right on its owner. In accordance with art 5(1)(a), the holder of that exclusive right shall be entitled to prevent all third parties not having his consent from using in the course of trade any sign which is identical with the trade mark in relation to goods or services which are identical with those for which the trade mark is registered. Article 5(3) of that directive sets out in a non-exhaustive way the types of use which the owner may prohibit under art 5(1).

- e 29. It is important to note that, by limiting the effects of the rights which a trade mark owner derives from art 5 of Directive 89/104, art 6 seeks to reconcile the fundamental interests of trade mark protection with those of free movement of goods and freedom to provide services in the common market in such a way that trade mark rights are able to fulfil their essential role in the system of undistorted competition which the Treaty seeks to establish and maintain (see, in particular, Bayerische Motorenwerke AG (BMW) v Deenik Case C-63/97 [1999] All ER (EC) 235, [1999] ECR I-905 (para 62) and Gerolsteiner Brunnen GmbH & Co v Putsch GmbH Case C-100/02 [2004] ECR I-691 (para 16)).

- f 30. Firstly, according to art 6(1)(c) of Directive 89/104, the trade mark owner may not prohibit a third party from using the mark in trade where it is necessary to indicate the intended purpose of a product or service, in particular as accessories or spare parts.

- g 31. It should be noted that that provision does not lay down criteria for determining whether a given intended purpose of a product falls within its scope, but merely requires that use of the trade mark be necessary in order to indicate such a purpose.

- h 32. Moreover, since the intended purpose of the products as accessories or spare parts is cited only by way of example, those doubtless being the usual situations in which it is necessary to use a trade mark in order to indicate the intended purpose of a product, the application of art 6(1)(c) of Directive 89/104 is, as the United Kingdom government and the Commission of the European Communities have rightly pointed out in their observations, not limited to those situations. Therefore, in the circumstances of the main proceedings, it is not necessary to determine whether a product must be regarded as an accessory or a spare part.

33. Secondly, it should be noted, on the one hand, that the court has already held that use of a trade mark to inform the public that the advertiser is specialised in the sale, or that he carries out the repair and maintenance, of products bearing that trade mark which have been marketed under that mark by its owner or with his consent, constitutes a use indicating the intended purpose of a product within the meaning of art 6(1)(c) of Directive 89/104 (see the BMW case (paras 54, 58–63)). That information is necessary in order to preserve the system of undistorted competition in the market for that product or service.

34. The same applies to the case in the main proceedings, the marks of which the Gillette Co is the owner being used by a third party in order to provide the public with comprehensible and complete information as to the intended purpose of the product which it markets, that is to say as to its compatibility with the product which bears those trade marks.

35. In addition, it is sufficient to note that such use of a trade mark is necessary in cases where that information cannot in practice be communicated to the public by a third party without use being made of the trade mark of which the latter is not the owner (see, to that effect, the BMW case (para 60)). As Advocate General Tizzano has pointed out in paras 64 and 71 of his opinion, that use must in practice be the only means of providing such information.

36. In that respect, in order to determine whether other means of providing such information may be used, it is necessary to take into consideration, for example, the possible existence of technical standards or norms generally used for the type of product marketed by the third party and known to the public for which that type of product is intended. Those norms, or other characteristics, must be capable of providing that public with comprehensible and full information on the intended purpose of the product marketed by that third party in order to preserve the system of undistorted competition on the market for that product.

37. It is for the national court to determine whether, in the circumstances of the case in the main proceedings, use of the trade mark is necessary, taking account of the requirements referred to in paras 33–36 of this judgment and of the nature of the public for which the product marketed by LA-Laboratories is intended.

38. Thirdly, art 6(1)(c) of Directive 89/104 makes no distinction between the possible intended purposes of products when assessing the lawfulness of the use of a trade mark. The criteria for assessing the lawfulness of the use of a trade mark with accessories or spare parts in particular are thus no different from those applicable to other categories of possible intended purposes.

39. Having regard to the above considerations, the answer to the first, second and third questions must be that the lawfulness or otherwise of the use of the trade mark under art 6(1)(c) of Directive 89/104 depends on whether that use is necessary to indicate the intended purpose of a product.

Use of the trade mark by a third party who is not its owner is necessary in order to indicate the intended purpose of a product marketed by that third a party where such use in practice constitutes the only means of providing the public with comprehensible and complete information on that intended purpose in order to preserve the undistorted system of competition in the market for that product.

b It is for the national court to determine whether, in the case in the main proceedings, such use is necessary, taking account of the nature of the public for which the product marketed by the third party in question is intended.

c Since art 6(1)(c) of Directive 89/104 makes no distinction between the possible intended purposes of products when assessing the lawfulness of the use of the trade mark, the criteria for assessing the lawfulness of the use of a trade mark with accessories or spare parts in particular are thus no different from those applicable to other categories of possible intended purposes of the products.

THE FOURTH QUESTION

d 40. In the first part of its fourth question, the national court seeks interpretation of the requirement in art 6(1)(c) of Directive 89/104 that use of the trade mark by a third party within the meaning of that provision must be in accordance with honest practices in industrial or commercial matters. In the second part of that question, the national court asks whether use of the trade mark by a third party constitutes an indication that the products marketed by the latter are equivalent, both in their quality and their technical or other characteristics, to the products bearing that trade mark.

e 41. As regards the first part of that question, the Court of Justice has consistently held that the condition of 'honest use' within the meaning of art 6(1) of Directive 89/104 constitutes in substance the expression of a duty to act fairly in relation to the legitimate interests of the trade mark owner (see the BMW case (para 61) and the Gerolsteiner Brunnen case (para 24)). Such an obligation is similar to that imposed on the reseller where he uses another's trade mark to advertise the resale of products covered by that mark (see Parfums Christian Dior SA v Evora BV Case C-337/95 [1997] ECR I-6013 (para 45) and the BMW case (para 61)).

f 42. In that regard, use of the trade mark will not comply with honest practices in industrial or commercial matters where, first, it is done in such a manner that it may give the impression that there is a commercial connection between the reseller and the trade mark proprietor (see the BMW case (para 51)).

g 43. Nor may such use affect the value of the trade mark by taking unfair advantage of its distinctive character or repute (see the BMW case (para 52)).

h 44. In addition, as the United Kingdom government and the Commission have rightly pointed out in their observations, use of the trade mark will not be in accordance with art 6(1)(c) of Directive 89/104 if it discredits or denigrates that mark.

i 45. Finally, where the third party presents its product as an imitation or replica of the product bearing the trade mark of which it is not the owner, such use of that mark does not comply with honest practices within the meaning of art 6(1)(c).

46. It is for the national court to determine whether, in the case in the main proceedings, the use made of the trade marks owned by Gillette Co has been made in accordance with honest practices, taking account, in particular, of the conditions referred to in paras 42–45 of this judgment. In that regard, account should be taken of the overall presentation of the product marketed by the third party, particularly the circumstances in which the mark of which the third party is not the owner is displayed in that presentation, the circumstances in which a distinction is made between that mark and the mark or sign of the third party, and the effort made by that third party to ensure that consumers distinguish its products from those of which it is not the trade mark owner. a

47. Concerning the second part of that question, as the United Kingdom government has rightly pointed out in its observations, the fact that a third party uses a trade mark of which it is not the owner in order to indicate the intended purpose of its product does not necessarily mean that it is presenting that product as being of the same quality as, or having equivalent properties to, those of the product bearing the trade mark. Whether there has been such a presentation depends on the facts of the case, and it is for the referring court to determine whether it has taken place by reference to the circumstances. b

48. Moreover, whether the product marketed by the third party has been represented as being of the same quality as, or having equivalent properties to, the product whose trade mark is being used is a factor which the referring court must take into consideration when it verifies that such use is made in accordance with honest practices in industrial or commercial matters. c

49. Having regard to the above considerations, the answer to the fourth question must be that the condition of 'honest use' within the meaning of art 6(1)(c) of Directive 89/104, constitutes in substance the expression of a duty to act fairly in relation to the legitimate interests of the trade mark owner. d

Use of the trade mark will not be in accordance with honest practices in industrial and commercial matters if, for example: e

—it is done in such a manner as to give the impression that there is a commercial connection between the third party and the trade mark owner;

—it affects the value of the trade mark by taking unfair advantage of its distinctive character or repute;

—it entails the discrediting or denigration of that mark;

—or where the third party presents its product as an imitation or replica of the product bearing the trade mark of which it is not the owner. f

The fact that a third party uses a trade mark of which it is not the owner in order to indicate the intended purpose of the product which it markets does not necessarily mean that it is presenting it as being of the same quality as, or having equivalent properties to, those of the product bearing the trade mark. Whether there has been such a presentation depends on the facts of the case, and it is for the referring court to determine whether it has taken place by reference to the circumstances. g

Whether the product marketed by the third party has been presented as being of the same quality as, or having equivalent properties to, the product whose trade mark is being used is a factor which the referring court must take into consideration when it verifies that such use is made in accordance with honest practices in industrial or commercial matters. h

THE FIFTH QUESTION

50. By its fifth question, the referring court asks whether a trade mark owner's inability, pursuant to art 6(1)(c) of Directive 89/104, to prohibit a third party from using the trade mark applies where that third party markets not only a spare part or accessory but also the product itself with which the spare part or accessory is intended to be used. i

51. As the Finnish and United Kingdom governments have pointed out in their observations, there is nothing in the directive to prevent a third party a from relying on art 6(1)(c) in such a case. However, that third party's use of the trade mark must be necessary in order to indicate the intended purpose of the product which it markets and must be made in accordance with honest practices in industrial and commercial matters.

b 52. Whether use of a trade mark by a third party in the circumstances described above is necessary in order to indicate the intended purpose of the product which it markets and whether it is made in accordance with honest practices in industrial and commercial matters is a question of fact which it is for the national court to assess by reference to the individual circumstances of each case.

c 53. Having regard to the above considerations, the answer to the fifth question must be that, where a third party that uses a trade mark of which it is not the owner markets not only a spare part or an accessory but also the product itself with which the spare part or accessory is intended to be used, such use falls within the scope of art 6(1)(c) of Directive 89/104 in so far as it is necessary to indicate the intended purpose of the product marketed by the latter and is made in accordance with honest practices in industrial and commercial matters.

COSTS

e 54. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the referring court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. The costs incurred in submitting observations to the Court of Justice, other than those of the said parties, are not recoverable.

On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Third Chamber) hereby rules:

f (1) The lawfulness or otherwise of the use of the trade mark under art 6(1)(c) of First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks) depends on whether that use is necessary to indicate the intended purpose of a product.

g Use of the trade mark by a third party who is not its owner is necessary in order to indicate the intended purpose of a product marketed by that third party where such use in practice constitutes the only means of providing the public with comprehensible and complete information on that intended purpose in order to preserve the undistorted system of competition in the market for that product.

It is for the national court to determine whether, in the case in the main proceedings, such use is necessary, taking account of the nature of the public for which the product marketed by the third party in question is intended.

h Since art 6(1)(c) of Directive 89/104 makes no distinction between the possible intended purposes of products when assessing the lawfulness of the use of the trade mark, the criteria for assessing the lawfulness of the use of the trade mark with accessories or spare parts in particular are thus no different from those applicable to other categories of possible intended purposes for the products.

i (2) The condition of 'honest use' within the meaning of art 6(1)(c) of Directive 89/104, constitutes in substance the expression of a duty to act fairly in relation to the legitimate interests of the trade mark owner.

The use of the trade mark will not be in accordance with honest practices in industrial and commercial matters if, for example:

—it is done in such a manner as to give the impression that there is a commercial connection between the third party and the trade mark owner;

—it affects the value of the trade mark by taking unfair advantage of its distinctive character or repute; a

—it entails the discrediting or denigration of that mark;

—or where the third party presents its product as an imitation or replica of the product bearing the trade mark of which it is not the owner.

The fact that a third party uses a trade mark of which it is not the owner in order to indicate the intended purpose of the product which it markets does not necessarily mean that it is presenting it as being of the same quality as, or having equivalent properties to, those of the product bearing the trade mark. Whether there has been such presentation depends on the facts of the case, and it is for the referring court to determine whether it has taken place by reference to the circumstances. b

Whether the product marketed by the third party has been presented as being of the same quality as, or having equivalent properties to, the product whose trade mark is being used is a factor which the referring court must take into consideration when it verifies that that use is made in accordance with honest practices in industrial or commercial matters. c

(3) Where a third party that uses a trade mark of which it is not the owner markets not only a spare part or an accessory but also the product itself with which the spare part or accessory is intended to be used, such use falls within the scope of art 6(1)(c) of Directive 89/104 in so far as it is necessary to indicate the intended purpose of the product marketed by the latter and is made in accordance with honest practices in industrial and commercial matters. d

e

EU-Wood-Trading GmbH v Sonderabfall-Management-
Gesellschaft Rheinland-Pfalz mbH

(Case C-277/02)

COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (FIRST CHAMBER)

JUDGES JANN (PRESIDENT OF THE CHAMBER) ROSAS, SILVA DE LAPUERTA, LENAERTS AND SCHIEMANN (RAPPORTEUR)

ADVOCATE GENERAL LÉGER

27 MAY, 23 SEPTEMBER, 16 DECEMBER 2004

European Community – Environment – Waste – Shipment of waste – Member state of dispatch objecting to planned shipment of waste on basis that recovery operation in member state of destination not capable of being carried out without endangering human health and environment – Member state of destination raising no objections to planned shipment – Concept of ‘shipment’ of waste – Whether member state of dispatch entitled to raise objections based on considerations relating not to transport of waste but to its recovery in another member state – Council Regulation (EEC) 259/93, art 7(4)(a), indents 1, 2.

The claimant undertaking notified the German competent authorities of its intention to ship a quantity of waste to an undertaking established in Italy, where the waste was to be recovered. The documents annexed to the notification included, inter alia, statements certifying that the Italian competent authorities had no objections to the import of the waste. However, on the basis that the proposed recovery operation could not be carried out without endangering human health and the environment, the competent authority of dispatch objected to the planned shipment under art 7(4)(a)<sup>a</sup> of Council Regulation (EEC) 259/93 (on the supervision and control of shipments of waste within, into and out of the European Community). Reliance was placed on: (i) the first indent of that provision, which provided that an objection might be raised in ‘accordance with [Council Directive (EEC) 75/442 (on waste)], in particular Article 7 thereof’; and (ii) the second indent of that provision, which provided that an objection might be raised because the planned shipment was ‘not in accordance with national laws and regulations relating to environmental protection, public order, public safety or health protection’. On appeal in proceedings brought by the claimant challenging the decision, issues arose concerning whether the competent authority of dispatch could raise objections based on the first and second indents of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation which related not to the transport of the waste, but to its recovery in another member state. Taking the view that the outcome of the action before it depended on an interpretation of Community law, the national court decided to stay the proceedings and refer a number of questions for preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) to the Court of Justice of the European Communities.

<sup>a</sup> Article 7(4)(a) is set out at judgment para 16, below

Held – (1) A competent authority of dispatch or destination could rely on the first indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation to raise objections to a shipment of waste for recovery based on considerations connected not only to the actual transport of the waste in each competent authority's area of jurisdiction, but also to the recovery planned for that shipment. Interpreted according to the framework of the environmental policy pursued by the Community and in the light of the notification procedures established by other provisions of the regulation (which enabled member states to be duly informed not only of the type and movements of the waste, but also of its disposal or recovery), the concept of a 'shipment' of waste was to be perceived in its entirety, from the point of departure in the member state of dispatch to the end of its processing in the member state of destination. Accordingly, it was clear that the regulation, taken as a whole, permitted all the competent authorities responsible for the control of shipments of waste to take account of matters connected not only to the transport of that waste, but also to the conditions in which the waste was recovered. Further, the first indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation was to be interpreted as enabling the competent authorities of dispatch and destination to raise objections under the directive not only based on art 7 thereof, but also on the basis of the directive's other provisions. Therefore, the competent authorities of dispatch and destination might raise objections to a shipment of waste for recovery on the ground that the planned recovery disregarded the requirement to ensure that the waste was recovered or disposed of without endangering human health and without the use of processes or methods capable of harming the environment (see judgment paras 31–43, below). a
b
c
d
e

(2) For the purposes of the first indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation, provided that it complied with the principle of proportionality, a competent authority of dispatch might, in assessing the effects on health and the environment of the recovery envisaged at the destination, rely on its own criteria concerning the recovery of waste even where those criteria were stricter than those in force in the state of destination. Such an interpretation was evident from the fact that the regulation formed part of the environmental policy of the Community, the objectives of which might be undermined if a competent authority of dispatch was to be prevented from relying on its own high standards of environmental protection to oppose a shipment of waste where its recovery in another member state might harm human health or the environment. Any conflict between positions taken by the competent authorities of dispatch and destination was inherent in the system established by the regulation, and any such divergence was not contrary to the principle of co-operation. However, having regard to the principle that waste for recovery was to be able to move freely between the member states for processing, opposition by the competent authority of dispatch on the basis of the application of its national waste recovery standards had to comply with the principle of proportionality. In that regard, the risks had to be measured on the basis of relevant scientific research. It was for the national court seised of an action challenging the opposition of the competent authority of dispatch to assess whether those national standards had been applied in circumstances contrary to the principle of proportionality (see judgment paras 45–53, below). f
g
h
i

(3) A competent authority of dispatch could not rely on the second indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation to raise an objection to a shipment of waste based on the fact that the planned recovery in the member state of destination did not comply with the national laws and regulations for the protection of the

- a* environment, public order, public safety or health protection. Having regard to the other provisions of art 7(4), which did not permit the competent authorities of transit of a shipment of waste to rely on the first indent of art 7(4)(a) and, accordingly, to check that the waste would be processed in compliance with the directive, by providing in the second indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation that the competent authorities might raise objections to a planned shipment if it did not comply with national laws and regulations, the Community legislature had sought to safeguard, at each stage of the shipment, the efficacy of each member state's own provisions with regard to waste which was within the territory of that state. Therefore, those provisions which governed shipment covered only operations relating to that shipment which occurred during that time when it was within the respective territory of each of the competent authorities concerned (see judgment paras 56–60, below).

Notes

- d* For the European legislation on the transport of waste, see 38 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 39.

Cases cited

- Abfall Service AG (ASA) v Bundesminister für Umwelt, Jugend und Familie* Case C-6/00 [2002] QB 1073, [2002] 3 WLR 665, [2002] ECR I-1961, ECJ.
- e* ADM Ölmühlen v Bundesanstalt für landwirtschaftliche Marktordnung (BALM) Case C-339/92 [1993] ECR I-6473, ECJ.
- Chemische Afvalstoffen Dusseldorp BV v Minister van Volkshuisvesting, Ruimtelijke Ordening en Milieubeheer* Case C-203/96 [1999] All ER (EC) 25, [1998] ECR I-4075, ECJ.
- f* DaimlerChrysler AG v Land Baden-Württemberg Case C-324/99 [2002] QB 1102, [2002] 3 WLR 694, [2001] ECR I-9897, ECJ.
- Deutsche Paracelsus Schulen für Naturheilverfahren GmbH v Grabner* Case C-294/00 [2002] ECR I-6515, ECJ.
- European Commission v Denmark* Case C-192/01 [2003] ECR I-9693, ECJ.
- European Commission v Germany* Case C-228/00 [2003] ECR I-1439, ECJ.
- g* European Commission v Germany Case C-389/00 [2003] ECR I-2001, ECJ.
- European Commission v Italy* Case C-365/97 [1999] ECR I-7773, ECJ.
- European Commission v Luxembourg* Case C-458/00 [2003] ECR I-1553, ECJ.
- European Parliament v EU Council* Case C-187/93 [1994] ECR I-2857, ECJ.
- Hahn (Criminal proceedings against)* Case C-121/00 [2002] ECR I-9193, ECJ.
- h* Käserer Champignon Hofmeister GmbH & Co KG v Hauptzollamt Hamburg-Jonas Case C-210/00 [2002] ECR I-6453, ECJ.
- Maizena Gesellschaft mbH v Bundesanstalt für landwirtschaftliche Marktordnung (BALM)* Case 137/85 [1987] ECR 4587, ECJ.
- Oliehandel Koewit BV v Minister van Volkshuisvesting, Ruimtelijke Ordening en Milieubeheer* Joined cases C-307–311/00 [2003] ECR I-1821, ECJ.
- i* Procureur de la République v Association de Défense des Brûleurs d'Huiles Usagées Case 240/83 [1985] ECR 531, ECJ.
- Questore di Verona v Zenatti* Case C-67/98 [1999] ECR I-7289, ECJ.
- R (on the application of British American Tobacco (Investments) Ltd (supported by Japan Tobacco Inc and anor intervening)) v Secretary of State for Health* Case C-491/01 [2002] ECR I-11453, ECJ.

R v Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, ex p National Farmers' Union a Case C-157/96 [1998] ECR I-2211, ECJ.

Siomab SA v Institut bruxellois pour la gestion de l'environnement Case C-472/02
(2004) Transcript (opinion), 15 July, (2004) Transcript (judgment), 19 October, ECJ.

Snellers Autos BV v Algemeen Directeur van de Dienst Wegverkeer Case C-314/98 b
[2000] ECR I-8633, ECJ.

Van der Veldt (Criminal proceedings against) Case C-17/93 [1994] ECR I-3537, ECJ.

Reference

By decision of 3 July 2002, the Oberverwaltungsgericht Rheinland-Pfalz, Germany referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for c a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) five questions (set out at judgment para 29, below) concerning the interpretation of the first and second indents of art 7(4)(a) of Council Regulation (EEC) 259/93 (on the supervision and control of shipments of waste within, into and out of the European Community), as amended by Commission Decisions (EC) 98/368 and (EC) 1999/816. Those questions were submitted in the course of d an action between EU-Wood-Trading GmbH, established in Bürstadt, Germany (hereinafter EU-Wood-Trading) against Sonderabfall-Management-Gesellschaft Rheinland-Pfalz mbH, regarding objections raised by the latter against the shipment of 3,500 tonnes of wood waste which EU-Wood-Trading was envisaging making to Italy. Observations were submitted on behalf of: e EU-Wood-Trading GmbH, by T Pschera and B Enderle, Rechtsanwälte; Sonderabfall-Management-Gesellschaft Rheinland-Pfalz mbH, by C v der Lühe, Rechtsanwalt; the Danish government, by J Molde, acting as agent; the Austrian government, by E Riedl, acting as agent; the Commission of the European Communities, by U Wölker and M Konstantinidis, acting as f agents. The language of the case was German. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General.

23 September 2004. The Advocate General (P Léger) delivered the following opinion<sup>1</sup>.

1. The present case is one that again concerns interpretation of Council Regulation (EEC) 259/93<sup>2</sup>, which lays down the conditions and procedural g rules to which shipments of waste between member states are subject. The matter at issue is whether and to what extent the competent administrative authority of the country from which the shipment of waste is to be effected, called 'the competent authority of dispatch', is entitled to object to such a shipment where the conditions in which the waste in question is to be h recovered in the country of destination do not satisfy the standards or national legislation applicable in its own state, which are more stringent than those applicable in the member state of destination.

2. This case should therefore lead the court to define the powers of the competent authority of dispatch in the context of the waste shipment procedure and, perhaps, whether the free movement of waste for recovery, provided for by the regulation, precludes that authority from applying the i

<sup>1</sup> Original language: French.

<sup>2</sup> On the supervision and control of shipments of waste within, into and out of the European Community (OJ 1993 L30 p 1), as amended by Commission Decision (EC) 98/368 (OJ 1998 L165 p 20) (the regulation).

a health and environmental protection standards in force in its own state where they are higher than those in force in the member state of destination.

3. Before setting out the factual background to the dispute in the main proceedings, I will briefly summarise the development and principles of Community environmental policy and the provisions of secondary legislation which are most relevant for the purposes of answering the questions referred by the national court.

I—COMMUNITY LAW

A—Community environmental policy

c 4. Environmental protection has recently been progressively enshrined in Community law. Indeed, that concept was absent, or largely so, from the original treaties<sup>3</sup>. It was a judicial creation of the court, which in its judgment in Procureur de la République v Association de Défense des Brûleurs d'Huiles Usagées of 7 February 1985<sup>4</sup> held that it constituted 'one of the Community's essential objectives', thereby conferring upon it the status of an imperative requirement that could justify national measures detrimental to the free movement of goods. In 1987, with the entry into force of the Single European Act 1986 (EC 12 (1986); Cmnd 9578; OJ 1987 L169 p 1), Community activity in the field of environmental protection was given a legal basis in primary law, when arts 130r, 130s and 130t were inserted into the EC Treaty<sup>5</sup>. The Treaty on European Union, signed at Maastricht on 7 February 1992, elevated that activity to the status of a policy in its own right. The Treaty of Amsterdam, which entered into force on 1 May 1999, further strengthened the position of that policy as a priority by including in art 6 EC (formerly art 3c of the EC Treaty) the principle that environmental requirements should be integrated into other Community policies. That article was created for that purpose and was incorporated into the part of the Treaty containing the principles on which the Community is based.

f 5. Community policy on the environment must contribute to the pursuit of four objectives, which are listed in art 174 EC. The first relates to the quality of the environment from three aspects: namely preserving, protecting and improving it. The second objective is the protection of human health. The third is the prudent and rational utilisation of natural resources. The fourth is the promotion of measures at international level to deal with regional or worldwide environmental problems.

g 6. The policy is based on the following four principles: the precautionary principle, which allows immediate measures to be adopted where there is a serious and irreversible threat of harm to the environment; the principle of preventive action, which recommends that the creation of pollution or damage should be prevented, from the outset, by the adoption of measures that will eradicate a known risk; the principle that environmental damage should as a priority be rectified at source, meaning that action must be taken in respect of the actual object that is having a direct or indirect impact on the environment, which is in Community legislation on shipments of waste expressed in the

i 3 Of the Treaties of Rome, the EC Treaty included no provision specific to the environment and the Euratom Treaty contained a chapter on the protection of the health of workers and the general public against the dangers arising from ionising radiations. The ECSC Treaty included, for its part, art 55 relating to occupational safety.

4 Case 240/83 [1985] ECR 531 (para 13).

5 Articles 130r and 130s of the EC Treaty became, after amendment, arts 174 and 175 EC respectively, and art 130t of the EC Treaty became art 176 EC.

principles of 'self-sufficiency and proximity'; and the 'polluter pays' principle, which requires the person who creates a pollution risk or causes pollution to bear the costs of prevention or compensation. a

7. It should also be pointed out that Community activities in the environmental field must aim at a high level of protection. That requirement, contained in art 2 EC (formerly art 2 of the EC Treaty) since the Treaty of Amsterdam, is restated in several articles of the EC Treaty<sup>6</sup>. b

8. Finally, Community powers in the environmental field are not exclusive. Firstly, they are subject to the subsidiarity principle. Secondly, the member states and the Community have joint powers. Accordingly, under art 176 EC, where the Community has adopted environmental protection measures, the member states may maintain and even adopt more stringent protective measures. Those joint powers are also to be seen in the safeguard clauses, which allow a member state, where the Community has adopted harmonisation measures relating to the establishment and functioning of the internal market, to maintain derogating national provisions justified by the requirements referred to in art 30 EC (formerly art 36 of the EC Treaty) or relating to environmental protection, or even to adopt derogating national provisions, provided that the latter are based on new scientific evidence<sup>7</sup>. c

9. In future, the principles framing environmental law could be accorded increased importance, since the Draft Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe, adopted by the heads of state and government of the member states on 18 June 2004, lays down among the objectives of the European Union the sustainable development of Europe, and even of the earth, as well as a high level of protection and improvement of the quality of the environment<sup>8</sup>. The Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union (OJ 2000 C364 p 1), proclaimed on 7 December 2000 at Nice and reproduced in Pt II of the aforementioned Draft Treaty, provides, for its part, that— d

[a] high level of environmental protection and the improvement of the quality of the environment must be integrated into the policies of the Union and ensured in accordance with the principle of sustainable development.<sup>9</sup> e

It is also appropriate to point out that environmental protection is a feature of the constitutions of several member states<sup>10</sup>. f

B—Community legislation on shipments of waste g

1. The directive

10. Council Directive (EEC) 75/442<sup>11</sup>, the applicable provisions of which were adopted on the basis of art 130s of the Treaty, which enables the Council of the European Union to adopt measures to implement Community policy on h

6 Article 2 EC, art 95(3) EC (formerly art 100a(3) of the EC Treaty), and art 174(2) EC.

7 See art 95(4) and (5) EC. See also the safeguard clause provided for in the second paragraph of art 174(2) EC.

8 See arts 3 and 4.

9 See art 37. i

10 See, in particular, the Kingdom of Belgium, the Hellenic Republic, the Kingdom of Spain, the Republic of Finland and the Republic of Hungary. I would also add that the French National Assembly has just approved the attachment of a charter for the environment to its constitution.

11 On waste (OJ 1975 L194 p 39), as amended by Council Directive (EEC) 91/156 (OJ 1991 L78 p 32) and by Commission Decision (EC) 96/350 (adapting Annexes IIA and IIB to Council Directive (EEC) 75/442 on waste) (OJ 1996 L135 p 32) (the directive).

a the environment, seeks to ensure a high level of environmental protection<sup>12</sup>. It states that in order to achieve that aim the member states must, in addition to taking action to ensure the responsible removal and recovery of waste, take measures to restrict the production of waste particularly by promoting clean technologies and products which can be recycled and re-used<sup>13</sup>. It is also designed to reduce movements of waste by establishing an integrated and adequate disposal network to enable the Community to become self-sufficient in disposing of the waste it produces and the member states to move towards that aim too.

b 11. The first paragraph of art 4 provides:

c 'Member States shall take the necessary measures to ensure that waste is recovered or disposed of without endangering human health and without using processes or methods which could harm the environment ...'

12. Article 7 states that in order to attain the objectives referred to in art 4 in particular the member states are to be required to draw up as soon as possible one or more waste management plans.

d 13. It also provides that the undertakings which carry out waste disposal and recovery must be authorised and inspected<sup>14</sup>.

2. The regulation

e 14. The regulation was also adopted on the basis of art 130s of the Treaty. It replaces Council Directive (EEC) 84/631<sup>15</sup> in order to implement within the Community, in particular, the Basel Convention on the Control of Transboundary Movements of Hazardous Wastes and their Disposal of 22 March 1989<sup>16</sup>. Its purpose is to establish a harmonised set of procedures whereby movements of waste can be limited in order to secure protection of the environment<sup>17</sup>.

f 15. Title II of the regulation lays down the procedure applicable to shipments of waste between member states. Chapter A of Title II, containing arts 3 to 5, covers waste for disposal and Chapter B of the same title, containing arts 6 to 11, deals with waste for recovery. The rules applicable to shipments for the purposes of recovery are less restrictive than those relating to shipments for the purposes of disposal. That difference in the rules governing waste for disposal and waste for recovery is explained by the Community legislature's h 13 See the fourth recital in the preamble to Directive 91/156.

12 See the first and fourth recitals in the preamble to Directive 91/156.

14 See the ninth recital in the preamble to, and arts 9 to 14 of, Directive 91/156.

15 On the supervision and control within the European Community of the transfrontier shipment of hazardous waste (OJ 1984 L326 p 31).

i 16 Hereinafter the Basel Convention. That convention, to which the member states are also parties, was drawn up in the context of the United Nations Environment Programme. It was approved on behalf of the Community by Council Decision (EEC) 93/98 (OJ 1993 L39 p 1). The text of that convention is attached to the decision. The Basel Convention is based on the following principles: firstly, reducing the generation of wastes to a minimum (see art 4(2)(a)), secondly, reducing transboundary movement of wastes to a minimum (see art 4(2)(d)), thirdly, self-sufficiency, each party undertaking to dispose of wastes in the state in which they were generated (see art 4(2)(b)), and, fourthly, the sound management of wastes, that is to say ensuring the protection of human health and the environment (see art 2(8)).

17 See the judgment in European Parliament v EU Council Case C-187/93 [1994] ECR I-2857 (para 26).

wish to ensure priority for recovery<sup>18</sup>. Moreover, the control procedures relating to waste for recovery are not applicable, in principle, to waste falling within the scope of the green list, included as Annex II to the regulation, which is regarded as not presenting a risk to the environment. The concepts of waste disposal and recovery are defined by the directive, to which the regulation expressly refers<sup>19</sup>.

16. The regulation requires any natural or legal person who wishes to ship waste from one member state to another for the purposes of disposing of or recovering it, called 'the notifier', to give notice of his planned shipment to the competent authority of destination, the competent authorities of dispatch and of transit, and the consignee of the waste<sup>20</sup>. However, each member state may provide that it is for the competent authority of dispatch to make that notification in the place of the notifier<sup>21</sup>.

17. According to the ninth recital in the preamble to the regulation, the purpose of such notification is to enable the various competent authorities—

'to be duly informed in particular of the type, movement and disposal or recovery of the waste, so that these authorities may take all necessary measures for the protection of human health and the environment, including the possibility of raising reasoned objections to the shipment.'

To that effect, art 7(4) of the regulation, which, it should be borne in mind, is one of the provisions relating to shipments for the purposes of recovery, provides:

'(a) The competent authorities of destination and dispatch may raise reasoned objections to the planned shipment:

—in accordance with Directive 75/442/EEC, in particular Article 7 thereof, or

—if it is not in accordance with national laws and regulations relating to environmental protection, public order, public safety or health protection, or —if the notifier or the consignee has previously been guilty of illegal trafficking ... or—if the shipment conflicts with obligations resulting from international conventions concluded by the Member State or Member States concerned, or—if the ratio of the recoverable and non-recoverable waste, the estimated value of the materials to be finally recovered or the cost of the recovery and the cost of the disposal of the non-recoverable fraction do not justify the recovery under economic and environmental considerations.

(b) The competent authorities of transit may raise reasoned objections to the planned shipment based on the second, third and fourth indents of (a).'

<sup>18</sup> See the judgment of the court in Chemische Afvalstoffen Dusseldorp BV v Minister van Volkshuisvesting, Ruimtelijke Ordening en Milieubeheer Case C-203/96 [1999] All ER (EC) 25, [1998] ECR I-4075 (para 33).

<sup>19</sup> See art 2(i) and (k).

<sup>20</sup> See arts 3(1) and 6(1).

<sup>21</sup> See arts 3(8) and 6(8).

a II—FACTS AND PROCEDURE IN THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS

18. On 23 November 1999, EU-Wood-Trading GmbH<sup>22</sup>, established in Frankfurt am Main, Germany, notified the Sonderabfall-Management-Gesellschaft Rheinland-Pfalz mbH, the competent authority of dispatch, of its plan to ship 3,500 tonnes of wood waste to Italy: in particular, painted and treated wood from demolitions, furniture wood and carpenters' waste. The planned shipment of the waste was for the purposes of recovery, and the waste was to be transformed into chipboard. According to an analysis carried out in mid-November 1999, the lead content of the wood waste was 47 mg per kilogram of dry material<sup>23</sup>.

19. The competent authority of dispatch, which was required under its national law to forward notifications of planned shipments, notified the competent authority of destination of the plan at issue on 1 February 2000. The latter raised no objection to that plan. However, the competent authority of dispatch itself raised an objection to it on 17 January 2000. That objection was based on the provisions of the first indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation, on the one hand, and the second indent thereof, on the other.

20. On the basis, initially, of that first indent, the competent authority of dispatch took the view that the planned shipment contravened art 4 of the directive, which states that waste must be recovered or eliminated without endangering human health, on the ground that the lead content of that waste exceeded the guide value laid down in the guidelines issued by the Rheinland-Pfalz Ministry of the Environment relating to operations involving recovery. The use of such wood waste in the manufacture of chipboard would thus lead to an increase of lead in the closed substance cycle and endanger the health of workers responsible for carrying out operations involving recovery and users of that chipboard.

21. Then on the basis of the second indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation, the competent authority of dispatch took the view that the planned shipment contravened a provision of national law relating to environmental and health protection<sup>24</sup>, which prohibits any recovery of waste which leads to an increase in the concentration of pollutants in the closed substance cycle.

22. Wood Trading formally opposed that objection, relying on its submission of another analysis of the waste in question in which the lead content was calculated to be 23 mg per kilogram of dry material and the arsenic content to be 3.4 mg per kilogram of dry material. The competent authority of dispatch stood by its objection, taking the view that the two grounds for refusal of the shipment of wood waste at issue still applied on account of the arsenic content of the waste.

23. Following dismissal of the action by the Verwaltungsgericht (Administrative Court) Mainz, Wood Trading appealed to the referring court, seeking a declaration that the objection raised by the competent authority of dispatch was unlawful. It argued that art 7(4)(a) of the regulation allows that authority to raise objections only on grounds based on the conditions of transportation of the waste and not on the conditions of its recovery in the state of destination. According to Wood Trading, to accept the contrary would be to allow one member state to assume the position of guardian of the environment in another member state, thereby contravening the principle of mutual trust among member states. Only the competent authority of destination is therefore entitled to raise objections based on the part of the shipment which affects its state. Furthermore, such an objection by the competent authority of dispatch, in so far as it goes beyond the exhaustive provisions of the regulation, constitutes an unlawful restriction on the free movement of goods. Wood Trading also argued that neither may such an objection be based on the provisions of art 176 EC, under which measures adopted by the Council pursuant to art 175 EC are not to prevent any member state from maintaining or introducing more stringent protective measures, since such measures may be adopted only in order to protect national interests.

<sup>22</sup> Hereinafter Wood Trading.

<sup>23</sup> At the material time, that type of waste was included in the amber list, attached as Annex III to the regulation, under the heading AC 170, with the result that its shipment for the purposes of recovery was subject to the mandatory control procedure provided for by the regulation.

<sup>24</sup> That is, according to the decision for reference, art 5(3) of the Gesetz zur Förderung der Kreislaufwirtschaft und Sicherung der umweltverträglichen Beseitigung von Abfällen of 27 September 1994 (BGB1 I, p 2705).

24. The competent authority of dispatch contends in defence that the term 'shipment' referred to in art 7(4)(a) of the regulation covers not only the transportation of the waste but also each stage in its shipment until its final destination, so that all the relevant authorities have the power to ensure that the recovery poses no risk for health or the environment. It also argues that the transformation of such waste into chipboard poses a health and environmental risk in Germany on the ground that the chipboard could be imported into that country. Furthermore, that authority argues that it follows from case law, in particular the judgment in Abfall Service AG (ASA) v Bundesminister für Umwelt, Jugend und Familie<sup>25</sup>, that the procedure for recovery is also subject to control by the competent authorities of dispatch.

III—THE QUESTIONS REFERRED

25. It is in the light of the above considerations that the Oberverwaltungsgericht (Higher Administrative Court) Rheinland-Pfalz, Germany decided to stay proceedings and refer the following five questions to the Court of Justice:

'(1) Under the first indent of Article 7(4)(a) of [the r]egulation ... can an objection to the shipment of waste for recovery be raised on the ground that the planned recovery contravenes the requirement arising from the first paragraph of Article 4 of [the d]irective ... for waste to be recovered in a manner which is compatible with health and environmental imperatives?

(2) If so, can such an objection be raised not only by the [competent] authority of destination but also by the [competent] authority of dispatch?

(3) If so, is the [competent] authority of dispatch entitled to base its assessment of whether the planned recovery of the waste at the place of destination is compatible with health and environmental imperatives on the standards applicable in the State of dispatch even where they are higher than the standards applicable in the State of destination?

(4) Under the second indent of Article 7(4)(a) of [the r]egulation ... can an objection to the shipment of waste for recovery be raised on the ground that the planned recovery contravenes national laws and regulations relating to environmental protection, public order, public safety or health protection?

(5) If so, can the [competent] authority of dispatch raise such an objection on the ground that the recovery contravenes national laws and regulations in force at the place of dispatch?

<sup>25</sup> Case C-6/00 [2002] QB 1073, [2002] ECR I-1961.

a IV—ASSESSMENT

26. Three questions are encompassed by the five referred by the national court, which all relate to the interpretation of the provisions of the first and second indents of art 7(4)(a). They are, firstly, whether those provisions allow objections to be raised to a shipment of waste based on the planned recovery in the state of destination (first and second questions referred), secondly, whether the competent authority of dispatch is entitled to raise such objections (second question and first part of the fifth question referred) and, thirdly, whether that authority is entitled to raise such objections under the rules applicable in its own state, even where they are stricter than those applicable in the state of destination (third question and last part of the fifth question referred).

c 27. I shall begin by considering the first and fourth questions referred, which relate to whether it is possible to raise objections based on the recovery.

A—Whether it is possible to raise objections based on the recovery

d 28. By its first and fourth questions, the national court asks essentially whether art 7(4)(a) of the regulation is to be interpreted as meaning that objections to a shipment of waste for recovery relating to the conditions in which that recovery is to be effected may be based, on the one hand, on the first indent of that provision, on the ground that the planned recovery contravenes the requirement arising from the first sentence of art 4 of the directive, which states that waste must be recovered without endangering human health and without harming the environment and, on the other hand, on the second indent of that provision, on the ground that the planned recovery contravenes national laws and regulations relating to environmental protection, public order, public safety or health protection.

f 29. With regard to the first indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation, the national court raises that question because that provision refers specifically only to art 7 of the directive, which requires the member states to draw up waste management plans and which itself refers to movements of waste.

g 30. With regard to the second indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation, it explains that its doubts are based on the wording of that provision, from which it may be inferred that objections may be based only on the transportation of waste. It also points out that art 7(4)(b) of the regulation authorises the competent authorities of transit to raise objections only on the basis of the second, third and fourth indents of art 7(4)(a). That could mean that the second indent does not allow objections to be raised on the basis of the conditions of recovery of waste, since those authorities would on the face of it have no interest in raising such objections.

h 31. The national court also points out that, in the Dusseldorp case<sup>26</sup>, cited above, the court held, with regard to a shipment of waste for the purposes of recovery, that—i '[i]t was in order to encourage such recovery in the Community as a whole, in particular by eliciting the best technologies, that the Community legislature stipulated that waste of that type should be able to move freely between member states for processing, provided that transport poses no threat to the environment.'<sup>27</sup>

26 Paragraph 33.

27 National court's emphasis.

32. First of all, it seems appropriate to state my position on the interpretation of that paragraph of the judgment in the Dusseldorp case, cited above. I do not take the view that in that paragraph the court meant to state that an objection to a shipment of waste for recovery could be raised only on grounds relating to the conditions in which that waste is to be transported. The case in the main proceedings which gave rise to that judgment was concerned with a provision in a Netherlands waste management plan stipulating that exports of oil filters to another member state for recovery there were prohibited if the processing of those filters abroad was not of a higher quality than that performed in the Netherlands. For the purposes of ascertaining whether such a rule was compatible with Community law, the Raad van State (Council of State) (Netherlands) asked the court whether the principles of self-sufficiency and proximity, as contained in that waste management plan, could be applied to shipments of waste for recovery. Following an examination of the relevant provisions of the directive and the regulation, the court held that those principles were applicable only to shipments of waste for the purposes of disposal. It explained the grounds for that difference in the rules governing waste for disposal and waste for recovery, pointing out in particular that the principle of priority for recovery applies only to the latter. It is in that context that it made the point referred to by the national court with regard to the Community legislature's reason for wishing to encourage the movement of waste for recovery.

33. It seems to me that by adding the sentence stating that such movement could be encouraged only 'provided that transport poses no threat to the environment' the court simply wished to point out that such free movement was not unconditional and that it was subject to safety requirements. It would not be justified, in my view, to infer from the fact that that sentence mentions only the safety of 'transport' that the relevant competent authorities are precluded from raising objections to a planned shipment of waste on the basis of the conditions in which its recovery is planned, although that was not the question referred by the Raad van State.

34. I shall now consider the two provisions at issue.

1. First indent of art 7(4)(a)

35. Like all the interveners, with the exception of Wood Trading, I take the view that the first indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation must be interpreted as meaning that that provision allows objections to be raised relating to the conditions in which the recovery is to be effected in the state of destination. That interpretation follows, in my view, from the wording of that provision and is supported by both the structure and the objectives of the regulation of which it forms a part.

36. With regard to the wording of that provision, it must be borne in mind that the first indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation states that the competent authorities of destination and dispatch may raise reasoned objections to the planned shipment 'in accordance with [the d]irective ... in particular Article 7 thereof'. Admittedly, the expression 'in accordance with [the d]irective' is not, in the present case, very explicit and it is true that only art 7 of the directive is referred to specifically. Nevertheless, it seems to me that the most logical interpretation of that provision is that objections may be raised 'on the basis of the directive'. Moreover, use of the adverbial phrase 'in particular' before referring to art 7 means that the reference to that article is purely for guidance and that such objections may also be based on the other provisions of the a directive. In other words, the provision to be interpreted ought to be understood, in my view, as meaning that objections to a planned shipment may be raised if such a shipment does not comply with the requirements of the directive. That analysis is also supported by most of the other language versions of that provision<sup>28</sup>.

b 37. Moreover, we have seen that art 4 of the directive provides:

‘Member States shall take the necessary measures to ensure that waste is recovered or disposed of without endangering human health and without using processes or methods which could harm the environment ...’

c The inference to be drawn from a reading of that article of the directive in conjunction with the first indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation is therefore that the latter provision allows objections to be raised to a planned shipment if the conditions in which the waste is to be recovered are capable of harming human health or the environment.

d 38. That interpretation is supported by the structure of the regulation. For example, we have seen that any planned shipment of waste for recovery, with the exception, in principle, of waste falling within the scope of the green list included as Annex II to the regulation, must be the subject matter of a notification to the competent authorities of dispatch, destination and transit. We also know that it is on the basis of that notification that those authorities may raise an objection to such a shipment on the grounds exhaustively listed in art 7(4) of the regulation<sup>29</sup>. Consideration of art 6 of the regulation, para (5) of which sets out the information which must be contained in the consignment note supporting that notification, shows that, in addition to information relating to the composition and amount of waste to be recovered<sup>30</sup>, and the arrangements for transporting it<sup>31</sup>, the notifier must furnish certain details relating to the conditions in which that waste is to be recovered<sup>32</sup>. That information therefore covers the entire waste treatment process planned by the notifier until such time as the waste no longer poses a threat to health or to the environment. The Community legislature therefore intended that prior to carrying out the planned shipment all the competent authorities should be informed of the planned recovery process up until its completion<sup>33</sup>. I can see no use for such information other than to allow the competent authorities to assess the conditions in which the recovery is to be effected and, where

g 28 For example, ‘conformément à la directive 75/442/CEE et notamment à son article 7’ in French; ‘gemäß der Richtlinie 75/442/EWG, insbesondere auf Artikel 7’ in German; ‘con arreglo a lo dispuesto en la Directiva [75]/442/CEE, en particular su artículo 7’ in Spanish; ‘conformemente alla direttiva 75/442/CEE, in particolare all’articolo 7, oppure’ in Italian, etc.

h 29 See the judgment of the court in DaimlerChrysler AG v Land Baden-Württemberg Case C-324/99 [2002] QB 1102, [2001] ECR I-9897 (para 50).

30 See the first indent of art 6(5).

31 See footnote above (second and third indents).

i 32 Those details are set out in the fourth to the eighth indents of art 6(5) of the regulation. The notifier must state the identity of the consignee of the waste, the location of the recovery centre and the type and duration of the authorisation under which the centre operates; the recovery operations in Annex IIB to the directive; the planned method of disposal for the residual waste after recycling has taken place, and the amount of the recycled material in relation to the residual waste, as well as the estimated value of the recycled material. Moreover, the fourth indent states that ‘[t]he centre must have adequate technical capacity for the recovery of the waste in question under conditions presenting no danger to human health or to the environment’.

33 For the purposes of ensuring that the waste treatment process will be completed without harming health or the environment, art 27 of the regulation provides that all shipments of waste falling within the scope of that regulation are to be subject to the provision of a financial guarantee or

necessary, to object to such a shipment if they take the view that the conditions of its recovery could harm human health or the environment. a

39. In support of that analysis, it must also be pointed out that the regulation contains several provisions which unambiguously confirm that the competent authorities are entitled to review the conditions in which waste is to be recovered and to object to a planned shipment on grounds relating to the planned recovery<sup>34</sup>. Accordingly, the fifth indent of art 7(4)(a) itself contains a ground for objection which expressly relates to the recovery of waste<sup>35</sup>. Similarly, art 26(1)(e) provides that any shipment of waste which results in disposal or recovery in contravention of Community or international rules constitutes illegal traffic<sup>36</sup>. b

40. Finally, it is appropriate to refer to the objectives of the regulation, set out in the ninth recital in the preamble thereof. According to that recital, the purpose of notification of a planned shipment is to inform the competent authorities not only of movements of waste, but also of the disposal and recovery of it, so that those authorities may take all necessary measures for the protection of human health and the environment. That recital thereby confirms that the Community legislature, by harmonising the conditions and procedural rules to which transboundary movements of waste in the Community are subject, did not aim to ensure the protection of health and the environment solely in the context of the transportation of waste, but also aimed to attain that objective in the context of the treatment of waste by disposal or recovery. Pursuit of that objective would thus be compromised if the competent authorities were precluded from raising an objection to a shipment of waste for recovery where they establish, following notification of a planned shipment, that the planned recovery may harm human health or the environment. c

2. Second indent of art 7(4)(a) d

41. Interpretation of this provision raises more difficulties. Like Wood Trading, the Commission of the European Communities shares the doubts e

---

insurance covering costs for disposal and recovery, that guarantee being returned when proof has been furnished that the waste has reached its destination and has been disposed of or recovered in an environmentally sound manner. f

<sup>34</sup> For example, art 9 of the regulation provides that the competent authorities having jurisdiction over specific recovery facilities may decide, notwithstanding art 7, that they will not raise objections concerning shipments of certain types of waste to a specific recovery facility. See also art 34 of the regulation. g

<sup>35</sup> According to that provision, an objection may be raised 'if the ratio of the recoverable and non-recoverable waste, the estimated value of the materials to be finally recovered or the cost of the recovery and the cost of the disposal of the non-recoverable fraction do not justify the recovery under economic and environmental considerations'. h

<sup>36</sup> At the hearing, the parties were invited to give their views on the issue of whether the provisions of art 26(1)(e) of the regulation are also applicable in circumstances such as those in the main proceedings. Like the majority of them, with the exception of Sonderabfall-Management-Gesellschaft Rheinland-Pfalz mbH, I take the view that that is not so. In the judgment in the ASA case, cited above, the court held that art 26 of the regulation is one basis on which the competent authorities may be required to raise an objection to a planned shipment on the ground of an incorrect classification (para 41). In the light of the order of 27 February 2003 in Oliehandel Koeweit BV v Minister van Volkshuisvesting, Ruimtelijke Ordening en Milieubeheer Joined cases C-307-311/00 [2003] ECR I-1821, the same art 26 must also be applied where the treatment of waste at issue was covered by a measure of secondary legislation. However, where the objection of the competent authority of dispatch is based on the grounds for refusal expressly referred to by art 7(4) of the regulation, as in the present case, or on art 4(3) thereof, I take the view that the provisions of art 26 of the regulation are irrelevant. i

a expressed by the national court and takes the view that, in the light of the wording of the second indent of art 7(4)(a) and the content of art 7(4)(b) of the regulation, the second indent of art 7(4)(a) cannot serve as the legal basis for an objection to the planned recovery in the state of destination. That is not my view. Like the Danish and Austrian governments and Sonderabfall-Management-Gesellschaft Rheinland-Pfalz mbH, I consider that the second b indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation also allows the competent authorities to raise an objection to a shipment of waste for recovery, that is to say, where the planned recovery contravenes national laws and regulations relating to environmental protection, public order, public safety or health protection.

42. Firstly, in my view there is nothing in the wording of that provision c which makes it possible to exclude that interpretation. It should be borne in mind that the second indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation states that—

[t]he competent authorities of destination and dispatch may raise d reasoned objections to the planned shipment ... if it is not in accordance with national laws and regulations relating to environmental protection, public order, public safety or health protection.'

With regard, firstly, to the term 'shipment', I have already pointed out, in my assessment of the first indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation, why, in my view, that provision must not be interpreted as meaning that the objections listed in that article should relate solely to the transportation of waste. I then pointed e out that the second indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation refers in very general terms to national laws and regulations relating to environmental protection, public order, public safety or health protection, without specifying that those national laws and regulations could be applied only to the transportation of waste and not to its recovery.

43. Secondly, it seems to me that the argument based on art 7(4)(b) of the f regulation, which, it should be borne in mind, states that the competent authorities of destination and dispatch may raise reasoned objections to a planned shipment of waste only on the basis of the provisions of the second, third and fourth indents of art 7(4)(a), and therefore not the first and fifth indents thereof, is not conclusive. Admittedly, we have seen that the fifth indent includes a ground for objection expressly relating to the recovery of waste and g I have pointed out how the first indent also allowed an objection to be raised based on the planned recovery. Nevertheless, for the following reasons I am not convinced that art 7(4)(b) of the regulation demonstrates that the provisions of the second indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation do not also allow objections to be raised to the planned recovery.

44. Firstly, I do not concur with the view that the competent authorities
h of transit do not have the same interest as the other competent authorities in raising objections based on the conditions of recovery. Pollution recognises no frontiers. Any air or water pollution resulting from the recovery of waste effected in the state of destination in conditions harmful to the environment could therefore affect the state or states through which the waste is to be i transported as much as the state of dispatch, possibly more so in view of their closer geographical proximity to the state of destination. That is why I take the view that limiting, in art 7(4)(b) of the regulation, the grounds for objection which may be raised by the competent authorities of transit may be the result not of the fact that those authorities have less interest in the recovery being effected in a way which is not harmful to human health or the environment, but rather of the Community legislature's aim to give those authorities less responsibility for monitoring the carrying out of that recovery.

45. In other words, under art 7(4)(b) of the regulation the states of transit should have less responsibility for monitoring shipments of waste for recovery than the competent authorities of dispatch and destination<sup>37</sup>. The fact that the grounds for objection which may be raised by the authorities of transit do not include those referred to in the first and fifth indents of art 7(4)(a) could therefore mean that the authorities of transit, unlike the competent authorities of dispatch and destination, are not bound to ensure that the waste will be treated in accordance with the directive in the state of destination (first indent) or that the recovery is actually justified under economic and environmental considerations (fifth indent). Nevertheless, that does not necessarily mean that the states of transit are precluded from raising an objection to a shipment of waste for recovery if the planned recovery is not in accordance with national laws and regulations relating to environmental protection, public order, public safety or health protection. To that extent, the second indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation thus allows the competent authorities of dispatch, destination and transit to raise objections to a shipment of waste on the basis of the planned recovery.

46. Moreover, it is common ground that the system established by the regulation provides that before any planned shipment of waste for recovery falling within its scope is carried out all the competent authorities of the relevant states, including the competent authorities of transit, must be notified thereof and that all those authorities must receive the same information<sup>38</sup>. By establishing such a system, the Community legislature intended to enable each of those authorities to assess the entire operation and not only that part which takes place within their own states. In other words, it is for each authority to ensure that the planned shipment of waste, taken as a whole, that is to say from the point of departure of the waste in the state of dispatch until the completion of its treatment in the state of destination, will not harm health or the environment. Therefore, it is only logical that the competent authorities of transit also should be able to raise an objection to a shipment of waste relating to the planned recovery on the basis of the second indent of art 7(4)(a).

47. For that reason, I take the view that an objection to a planned shipment of waste relating to its recovery may also be raised on the basis of the second indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation.

48. In the light of the foregoing, I propose that the court should answer the first and fourth questions referred to the effect that art 7(4)(a) of the regulation must be interpreted as meaning that objections to a shipment of waste for recovery relating to the conditions in which that recovery is to be effected may be based, on the one hand, on the first indent of that provision, on the ground that the planned recovery contravenes the requirement arising from art 4 of the directive that waste must be recovered without endangering human health and without harming the environment and, on the other hand, on the second indent of that provision, on the ground that the planned recovery contravenes national laws and regulations relating to environmental protection, public order, public safety or health protection.

<sup>37</sup> The responsibility of the competent authority of destination stems logically from the fact that recovery takes place within its territorial jurisdiction. That of the competent authority of dispatch stems from the fact that the waste was produced within its jurisdiction. I will return to that point under heading B of this opinion.

<sup>38</sup> See art 6 of the regulation.

a B—Whether it is possible for the competent authority of dispatch to raise objections relating to the planned recovery

49. By its second question and the first part of the fifth question referred, the national court asks whether the provisions of the first and second indents of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation are to be interpreted as meaning that the competent authority of dispatch may raise an objection to a shipment of waste relating to the conditions in which that recovery is to be effected.

b 50. In contrast to Wood Trading, but like the other interveners, I take the view that the competent authority of dispatch has the power to raise an objection relating to the planned recovery in the state of destination. That view is supported, firstly, by the wording of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation which expressly provides that '[t]he competent authorities of destination and dispatch may raise reasoned objections to the planned shipment' on the grounds set out in that provision. The above wording thus confers on those two authorities, without drawing any distinction between them and in unequivocal terms, the power to raise objections to a planned shipment of waste on the grounds set out in that provision and, in particular, on those provided for in the first and second indents thereof.

c 51. That literal interpretation is also supported by the system established by the regulation. We have seen that the regulation lays down that all the relevant competent authorities must assess each planned shipment as a whole, from the departure of the waste from the state of dispatch to the completion of its treatment in the state of destination. In order to ensure the protection of human health and the environment, the Community legislature preferred to establish a system in which all the competent authorities are involved in the supervision of the planned shipment, thereby running the risk that those authorities may make different assessments of the same planned shipment<sup>39</sup>, rather than to limit the control to be effected by each of them to the part of the shipment which is to take place in its own national territory. According to the logic underlying the system established by the regulation, any transboundary movement of waste within the Community which falls within its scope is a matter for all of the relevant competent authorities. It is therefore inherent in that system that the competent authority of a member state must assess whether the planned shipment could harm health and the environment in the territory of another member state. The competent authority of dispatch is therefore entitled to object to a shipment of waste where the planned recovery is capable of adversely affecting the protection of health or the environment, even though that recovery is to take place in the territory of the member state of destination.

f 52. The competent authority of dispatch's power is also supported within the system established by the regulation, if support were needed, by the fact that the state in whose territory the waste is generated has special responsibility with regard to its treatment. That special responsibility may be the corollary of the obligation imposed on the member states both by international conventions and by Community rules designed to reduce the generation of waste to a minimum<sup>40</sup>. That responsibility is, for example, reflected in the principle of self-sufficiency with regard to waste for disposal. It is not discharged until the waste has been treated in accordance with the requirements for protecting human health and the environment. Accordingly, the state dispatching the waste is required to take the waste back where it cannot be disposed of or recovered in the state of destination in accordance with the prescribed conditions<sup>41</sup>. Responsibility is also expressly laid down by the regulation in respect of shipments of waste to destinations outside the Community for the purposes of disposal or recovery there<sup>42</sup>. a

39 The court held that the risk of different assessments regarding classification of the planned shipment is inherent in the system established by the regulation (see the judgment in the ASA case, cited above (para 44) and the order in the Oliehandel Koeweit case, cited above (para 102)).

40 See art 4(2)(a) of the Basel Convention and the fourth recital in the preamble to the directive.

53. Furthermore, I am inclined to consider that the competent authority of dispatch is not merely able but rather obliged to raise such an objection where it takes the view that the planned recovery in the state of destination could harm human health or the environment. Indeed, I do not take the view that, by stating in art 7(4)(a) of the regulation that the competent authorities of destination and dispatch 'may raise reasoned objections' to the planned shipment as provided for by that provision, the legislature intended to confer on those authorities power merely to be exercised by them at their discretion in particular cases in which the planned shipment may harm human health or the environment. I must say that it would be difficult to justify the obligatory nature of a refusal in some of the situations set out in the five indents of that provision in the light of the objectives of the regulation<sup>43</sup>. b

54. However, the regulation includes other provisions which make it possible to take the view that the obligation for the competent authorities to object to a shipment of waste which could harm human health or the environment is mandatory in nature. For example, leaving aside art 26 of the regulation, art 30 thereof provides: 'Member States shall take the measures needed to ensure that waste is shipped in accordance with the provisions of this Regulation.' Similarly, art 34(1) provides that irrespective of the point of disposal or recovery of the waste, the producer of that waste is to take all the necessary steps to dispose of or recover or to arrange for disposal or recovery of the waste so as to protect the environment, and art 34(2) provides that it is for the member states to take all necessary steps to ensure that the obligations laid down in para (1) are carried out. It therefore seems logical to me, in the light of those provisions, which are drafted in mandatory terms, to take the view that the competent authorities of dispatch and destination are actually required to object to a shipment of waste on the basis of the provisions of the first and second indents of art 7(4)(a) where they take the view that the planned shipment could harm human health or the environment. c

55. That interpretation is also supported by the objective of the regulation. We have seen that, as follows from the ninth recital in its preamble and as the court has stated several times, the fundamental objective of the regulation is to ensure compliance with the requirements for protecting human health and the environment<sup>44</sup>. The court did not adopt a different position in the judgment in the Dusseldorp case, cited above, since it held that waste for recovery should be able to move within the Community provided that it poses no threat to the d

41 See art 25 of the regulation. e

42 See arts 14(2)(b) and 16(3)(b) of the regulation. f

43 For example, the third indent refers to cases where the notifier or the consignee has previously been found guilty of illegal trafficking; similarly, the fifth indent refers to cases where the planned recovery is not justified under economic and environmental considerations. g

44 See the judgments in Parliament v Council, cited above (para 18) and in European Commission v Germany Case C-389/00 [2003] ECR I-2001 (para 34). h a environment<sup>45</sup>. The regulation therefore seeks to ensure that no shipment of waste is carried out which might jeopardise the pursuit of those objectives. The obligation thereby imposed on the competent authorities to object to a shipment of waste which could harm human health or the environment also corresponds to that laid down in art 4 of the directive, which is binding on the member states as to that same objective<sup>46</sup>. It is not logical, in my view, in the light of the fact that art 4 of the directive requires the member states to take the necessary measures to ensure that waste is recovered or disposed of without harming human health or the environment, to interpret the contested provisions of the regulation as granting the competent authorities of dispatch and destination a mere power, free of any obligation.

c 56. Moreover, as we shall see under heading C of this opinion, national rules which may legitimately serve as the basis for an objection by the competent authority of dispatch to a planned shipment of waste for recovery must, in my view, respect the principle of proportionality, and must therefore not go beyond what is necessary for the protection of human health and the environment. Furthermore, any risk assessment should be made on a scientific rather than an arbitrary basis. It is also in the light of those conditions that I take the view that a competent authority of dispatch which establishes on the basis of such rules that a planned recovery could harm human health or the environment should be required to object to it under the provisions of the first and second indents of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation.

e 57. Requiring the competent authority of dispatch and the competent authority of destination to do so would also be in line with the court's body of case law relating to compliance with the requirements of the regulation. Indeed, it follows from that case law that, where the general scheme of the regulation is infringed because the classification of the planned shipment is incorrectly classified, it falls to each competent authority, in particular the competent authority of dispatch, to object to that shipment<sup>47</sup>. Similarly, the court has held that where a shipment of waste results in disposal or recovery in contravention of specific Community rules laying down the conditions of disposal of a hazardous product, the member states have circumscribed powers, that is to say they are required under art 26 of the regulation to take any appropriate legal action to prohibit and punish such traffic<sup>48</sup>.

g 58. I therefore propose that the answer to the second question and the first part of the fifth question referred for a preliminary ruling should be that the provisions of the first and second indents of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation must be interpreted as meaning that the competent authority of dispatch must raise an objection to a shipment of waste relating to the conditions in which that recovery is to be effected where it takes the view that the planned recovery in the state of destination could harm human health or the environment.

i

45 See para 33.

46 See the judgment in European Commission v Italy Case C-365/97 [1999] ECR I-7773 (para 67).

47 See the judgments in the ASA case, cited above (para 40), European Commission v Germany Case C-228/00 [2003] ECR I-1439 (para 33) and in European Commission v Luxembourg Case C-458/00 [2003] ECR I-1553 (para 21).

48 See the order in the Oliehandel Koeweit case, cited above (para 117).

C—The right of the competent authority of dispatch to base such objections on the rules applicable in its own state a

59. By its third question and the last part of the fifth question referred, the national court essentially asks whether the first and second indents of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation are to be interpreted as meaning that the competent authority of dispatch may base its objection to the planned recovery in the state of destination on the standards or on the national laws and regulations applicable in its own state, even where they are stricter than those applicable in the state of destination. b

60. As the starting point for my reasoning, I shall work on the assumption that, as in the circumstances of this case, the conditions of recovery of the waste in question have not been harmonised at Community level. In such a situation, each member state must, under art 4 of the directive, take the necessary measures under national law to ensure that waste is recovered without endangering human health and without using processes or methods which could harm the environment. Although it is binding on the member states as to the objective to be achieved, that article does not specify the actual content of the measures which must be taken and it leaves to the member states a margin of discretion in assessing the need for such measures<sup>49</sup>. c
Furthermore, under their original powers in the field of environmental protection, member states may have adopted rules or legislation concerning the conditions in which particular kinds of waste are to be recovered. The questions referred by the national court therefore seek to ascertain whether the competent authority of dispatch is entitled to base an objection to a planned shipment on its national rules, even where they are stricter than those applicable in the state of destination. d

61. In the light of the arguments put forward in the context of examining the preceding questions and the answers which I have proposed to the court, I take the view that it is in fact where the standards of protection applicable in the member state of dispatch are higher than those applicable in the state of destination that the competent authority of dispatch must be able to raise an objection to the planned shipment on the basis of its national rules. It is actually in such circumstances that the power thus granted to the competent authority of dispatch is most useful, since if the planned recovery also proved to be contrary to the rules applicable in the state of destination, the competent authority of that state would itself have to object to it. It is therefore where, as in the present case, the recovery of the waste at issue would be authorised under the rules of the state of destination but is prohibited by those applicable in the state of dispatch that the regulation should allow the highest standards of protection to prevail. e

62. Such an interpretation of the provisions of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation is also supported by the objectives of Community environmental policy, of which the regulation forms part<sup>50</sup>. We have seen that that policy aims to achieve a high level of protection. The importance of that objective is reflected, on the one hand, by the fact that it is set out in art 2 EC, and in later articles of the Treaty, as well as in the directive which constitutes the basic text relating to waste management, and even in the fifth recital in the preamble to the regulation. It is also included in the provisions of art 176 EC, which confers on the member states, even following the adoption of Community measures, the f
g
h
i

49 See the judgment in Commission v Italy, cited above (para 67).

50 See the judgment in Parliament v Council, cited above (para 23).

a right to adopt more stringent protective measures, and measures providing for a safeguard clause. The fact that the planned recovery is authorised in the state of destination cannot therefore prevent the competent authority of dispatch from objecting to it where the latter takes the view that such recovery is contrary to its national rules. The fact that the regulation seeks to attain a high level of protection justifies, on the contrary, allowing the competent authority
 b of dispatch to rely on its stricter national rules for the purposes of assessing whether the planned recovery could harm human health or the environment. I concur, in that respect, with the position of the Danish and Austrian governments that were this not so it would encourage shipments of waste to be made the treatment centres subject to the least stringent rules, thereby c leading to a downward trend in the conditions of recovery of the waste in question.

63. Nevertheless, as I have pointed out, that right of the competent authority of dispatch cannot be unconditional. It must be taken into account that the regulation provides that waste must be able to move freely within the Community<sup>51</sup>. Such freedom of movement is intended to give effect to the principle laid down in the regulation of giving priority to the recovery of waste. The difference in arrangements thus established in the regulation between waste for disposal, which in principle must be disposed of near to where it is produced, and waste for recovery is justified by the fact that the latter serves a useful purpose. It may replace other materials and provide, for example, the raw material for certain industries, thereby making it possible to d conserve natural resources<sup>52</sup>.

64. Moreover, as the national court points out, the court has held that the regulation lays down all the conditions and the procedural rules to which shipments of waste in the Community are subject, so that any national measure relating to such shipments must be assessed in the light of the provisions of the regulation and not the provisions of arts 28 to 30 EC (formerly arts 30 to 36 of the EC Treaty)<sup>53</sup>. Under the general principle of proportionality, it is therefore important that national measures adopted on the basis of the provisions of the first and second indents of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation are appropriate to achieve the objectives of protection pursued and do not go beyond what is necessary to achieve them<sup>54</sup>. It follows that that condition would not be satisfied if the protection of human health and the f environment could be as effectively ensured by less restrictive measures. It is for the national court before which the action to challenge the objection raised by the competent authority of dispatch is heard to ascertain whether the principle of proportionality is respected<sup>55</sup>.

h

51 See the judgment in the Dusseldorp case, cited above (para 33).

52 See the order in the Oliehandel Koeweit case, cited above (para 97).

53 See the judgment in the DaimlerChrysler case, cited above (paras 41–43).

54 See, to that effect, the judgments in Maizena Gesellschaft mbH v Bundesanstalt für landwirtschaftliche Marktordnung (BALM) Case 137/85 [1987] ECR 4587 (para 15), ADM Ölmühlen v Bundesanstalt für landwirtschaftliche Marktordnung (BALM) Case C-339/92 [1993] ECR I-6473 (para 15), Käserer Champignon Hofmeister GmbH & Co KG v Hauptzollamt Hamburg-Jonas Case C-210/00 [2002] ECR I-6453 (para 59) and R (on the application of British American Tobacco (Investments) Ltd (supported by Japan Tobacco Inc and anor intervening)) v Secretary of State for Health Case C-491/01 [2002] ECR I-11453 (para 122).

55 See the judgment in Snellers Autos BV v Algemeen Directeur van de Dienst Wegverkeer Case C-314/98 [2000] ECR I-8633 (para 59).

65. In the present case, the national court has not raised any question on that point. Nor has it supplied a great deal of information on the provisions of national law on the basis of which the competent authority of dispatch objected to the shipment at issue or on the reasons leading to the adoption of those provisions. None the less, I take the view that providing the following information will also help to resolve the dispute in the main proceedings.

66. Firstly, as the Commission has stated, it would seem to be essential that the rules applied by the competent authority of dispatch should be based on a scientific assessment of the risk. It would be contrary to the regulation for the competent authority of dispatch to prevent a shipment of waste which could be effectively recovered in the state of destination in accordance with its law on the basis of general considerations or a purely hypothetical risk assessment<sup>56</sup>. With regard to the recovery of waste, whether there is any risk to human health or the environment should be assessed, as in matters relating to the free movement of foodstuffs<sup>57</sup>, in the light of international scientific research and the work of the Community's scientific committees<sup>58</sup>. Nevertheless, that requirement cannot preclude the application of the precautionary principle, which also constitutes one of the principles upon which environmental law is based. Accordingly, in the event that such an assessment reveals that there remains scientific uncertainty as to the existence or extent of genuine risks to public health, a member state must be able, in accordance with the precautionary principle, to take protective measures without having to wait until the reality and seriousness of those risks become fully apparent<sup>59</sup>.

67. Secondly, in order to check compliance with the principle of proportionality, the competent authority of dispatch must assess, in every case, whether the planned recovery in the state of destination, although regulated by more flexible rules, is none the less capable of providing protection comparable to that pursued by its national rules. That could be so, in the circumstances at issue, if, for example, the methods of producing chipboard used by the undertaking which was to be the consignee of the waste in Italy were as effective in protecting the workers responsible for that recovery and removing the arsenic from that chipboard or reducing the arsenic content below the threshold set by the German rules.

68. Unlike Wood Trading, I do not take the view that such an assessment is unfeasible in practice. We have seen that the consignment note which supports the notification and which must be forwarded to the competent authority of dispatch and the other competent authorities must contain a number of details relating to the recovery arrangements. Furthermore, under art 6(4) and (6) of the regulation, the competent authority of dispatch may ask the notifier for additional information and documents, and the contract concluded with the undertaking which is to be the consignee for recovery of the waste. Moreover,

<sup>56</sup> See, to that effect, the judgment in European Commission v Denmark Case C-192/01 [2003] ECR I-9693 (para 48).

<sup>57</sup> See the judgment in Criminal proceedings against Hahn Case C-121/00 [2002] ECR I-9193 (para 40).

<sup>58</sup> In that regard, it is appropriate to point out that the conditions governing the use of arsenic for preserving wood are, following a risk assessment referred to the Scientific Committee on Toxicity, Ecotoxicity and the Environment, the subject matter of very restrictive measures in Commission Directive (EC) 2003/2 (relating to restrictions on the marketing and use of arsenic (tenth adaptation to technical progress of Council Directive (EEC) 76/769)) (OJ 2003 L4 p 9).

<sup>59</sup> See, to that effect, the judgments in R v Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, ex p National Farmers' Union Case C-157/96 [1998] ECR I-2211 (para 63) and Commission v Denmark, cited above (para 49).

a the notifier, who must have concluded that contract, should logically be able to demonstrate that the planned recovery fulfils the requirements laid down by the rules applicable in the state of dispatch. In that regard, it should be possible, where necessary, for an exchange of views to take place between the competent authority of dispatch and the notifier. Such checks and an exchange of views could take place all the more easily where, as in the present case, the state of dispatch has provided, under arts 3(8) and 6(8) of the regulation, that notification of the planned shipment to the other relevant authorities and the consignee is to be made by the competent authority of dispatch, since in that case the authority would have an additional period of time in which to forward it<sup>60</sup>.

c 69. At the end of this analysis, it is again appropriate to add that the answer which I propose to provide to the questions examined would not, on the face of it, be any different if the recovery of the waste in question had been the subject matter of a harmonisation measure at Community level and if, under art 176 EC, the member state of dispatch had maintained or adopted more stringent protective measures. In such a situation, the competent authority of dispatch could also, in my view, raise an objection to a planned shipment which contravened its national rules provided, in that case too, that it respected the principle of proportionality.

d 70. In the light of all those considerations, I propose that the answer to the third question and the last part of the fifth question referred should be that the first and second indents of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation must be interpreted as meaning that the competent authority of dispatch may base its objection to the planned recovery in the state of destination on the standards or on the national laws and regulations applicable in its own state, even where they are stricter than those applicable in the state of destination, provided that it respects the principle of proportionality.

f V—CONCLUSION

71. In the light of the foregoing considerations, I propose that the Court of Justice should give the following answers to the questions referred by the Oberverwaltungsgericht Rheinland-Pfalz:

g ‘(1) Article 7(4)(a) of Council Regulation (EEC) No 259/93 of 1 February 1993 on the supervision and control of shipments of waste within, into and out of the European Community, as amended by Commission Decision 98/368/EC of 18 May 1998, must be interpreted as meaning that objections to a shipment of waste for recovery relating to the conditions in which that recovery is to be effected may be based, on the one hand, on the first indent of that provision, on the ground that the planned recovery contravenes the requirement arising from Article 4 of Council Directive 75/442/EEC on waste of 15 July 1975, as amended by Council Directive 91/156/EEC of 18 March 1991, and by Commission Decision

i <sup>60</sup> In the present case, the competent authority of dispatch received the consignment note on 23 November 1999 but did not forward it to the competent authority of destination until 1 February 2000. I have not found in the order for reference any explanation for the delay by the competent authority of dispatch in making that notification. As stated in my opinion of 15 July 2004 in Siomab SA v Institut bruxellois pour la gestion de l’environnement Case C-472/02 (2004) Transcript (opinion), 15 July, (2004) Transcript (judgment), 19 October, the period within which the competent authority of dispatch must forward the notification to the other competent authorities and the consignee should not exceed the period allotted to the competent authority of destination by art 7(2) of the regulation.

96/350/EC of 24 May 1996, that waste must be recovered without endangering human health and without harming the environment and, on the other hand, on the second indent of that provision, on the ground that the planned recovery contravenes national laws and regulations relating to environmental protection, public order, public safety or health protection. a

(2) The competent authority of dispatch must raise an objection to a shipment of waste relating to the conditions in which that recovery is to be effected where it takes the view that the planned recovery in the State of destination could harm human health or the environment. b

(3) The competent authority of dispatch may base that objection on the standards or on the national laws and regulations applicable in its own State, even where they are stricter than those applicable in the State of destination, provided that it respects the principle of proportionality.' c

16 December 2004. The COURT OF JUSTICE (First Chamber) delivered the following judgment.

1. The request for a preliminary ruling concerns the interpretation of the first and second indents of art 7(4)(a) of Council Regulation (EEC) 259/93 (on the supervision and control of shipments of waste within, into and out of the European Community) (OJ 1993 L30 p 1), as amended by Commission Decisions (EC) 98/368 (OJ 1998 L165 p 20) and (EC) 1999/816 (OJ 1999 L316 p 45) (hereinafter the regulation). d

2. That request was submitted in the course of an action between EU-Wood-Trading GmbH, established in Bürstadt, Germany (hereinafter EU-Wood-Trading) against Sonderabfall-Management-Gesellschaft Rheinland-Pfalz mbH, regarding objections raised by the latter against the shipment of 3,500 tonnes of wood waste which EU-Wood-Trading was envisaging making to Italy. e

LEGAL FRAMEWORK

Community legislation

3. The essential objective of Council Directive (EEC) 75/442 (on waste) (OJ 1975 L194 p 39), as amended by Council Directive (EEC) 91/156 (OJ 1991 L78 p 32) and by Commission Decision (EC) 96/350 (OJ 1996 L135 p 32) (hereinafter the directive) is the protection of human health and the environment against harmful effects caused by the collection, transport, treatment, storage and tipping of waste. In particular, the fourth recital in the preamble to that directive states that the recovery of waste and the use of recovered materials should be encouraged in order to conserve natural resources. f

4. Article 1(e) of the directive defines 'disposal' as 'any of the operations provided for in Annex II, A' and art 1(f) defines 'recovery' as 'any of the operations provided for in Annex II, B'.

5. The first subparagraph of art 4 of the directive provides:

'Member States shall take the necessary measures to ensure that waste is recovered or disposed of without endangering human health and without using processes or methods which could harm the environment, and in particular: i

- without risk to water, air, soil and plants and animals,
- without causing a nuisance through noise or odours, a —without adversely affecting the countryside or places of special interest.’

6. Under art 7(1) of the directive the competent authorities designated by the member states must, in order to attain the objectives referred to in, among others, art 4, draw up as soon as possible one or more waste management plans. Under art 7(3) member states may take the measures necessary to prevent movements of waste which are not in accordance with their waste management plans.

b 7. The regulation governs, in particular, the supervision and control of shipments of waste between member states.

8. The ninth recital in the preamble to the regulation states:

c ‘... shipments of waste must be subject to prior notification to the competent authorities enabling them to be duly informed in particular of the type, movement and disposal or recovery of the waste, so that these authorities may take all necessary measures for the protection of human health and the environment, including the possibility of raising reasoned objections to the shipment ...’

d 9. Article 2 of the regulation provides:

‘For the purposes of this Regulation ...

e (b) competent authorities means the competent authorities designated by either the Member States in accordance with Article 36 or non-Member States;

(c) competent authority of dispatch means the competent authority, designated by the Member States in accordance with Article 36, for the area from which the shipment is dispatched ...

f (d) competent authority of destination means the competent authority, designated by the Member States in accordance with Article 36, for the area in which the shipment is received ...

(e) competent authority of transit means the single authority designated by Member States in accordance with Article 36 for the State through which the shipment is in transit ...

g (g) notifier means any natural person or corporate body to whom or to which the duty to notify is assigned, that is to say the person ... who proposes to ship waste or have waste shipped ...

(i) disposal is as defined in Article 1(e) of Directive 75/442/EEC ...

(k) recovery is as defined in Article 1(f) of Directive 75/442/EEC ...’

h 10. Title II of the regulation, entitled ‘Shipments of waste between Member States’, contains, among other things, two separate chapters, one dealing with the procedure which applies to shipments of waste for disposal (Chapter A, arts 3 to 5) and the other dealing with the procedure which applies to shipments of waste for recovery (Chapter B, arts 6 to 11).

i 11. Under the provisions of art 6(1) of the regulation, where the waste producer or holder intends to ship waste for recovery listed in Annex III to the regulation (amber waste list) from one member state to another and/or pass it in transit through one or several other member states, he shall notify the competent authority of destination and send copies of the notification to the competent authorities of dispatch and transit and to the consignee.

12. Under art 6(3) of the regulation, notification is to be effected by means of the consignment note which is to be issued by the competent authority of dispatch. Article 6(5) specifies the information which the notifier must supply on the consignment note, among which is information concerning the operations involving recovery as contained in Annex IIB to the directive. a

13. Under art 6(6) of the regulation, the notifier must conclude a contract with the consignee for the recovery of the waste and a copy of this contract must be supplied to the competent authority at its request.

14. Under art 6(8) of the regulation, a competent authority of dispatch may, in accordance with national legislation, decide to transmit the notification itself instead of the notifier to the competent authority of destination, with copies to the consignee and to the competent authority of transit. b

15. Article 7(2) of the regulation lays down the time limit and the rules and procedures with which the competent authorities of destination, dispatch and transit must comply to object to notified planned shipments of waste for recovery. That provision provides, in particular, that objections must be based on art 7(4). c

16. Article 7(4) of the regulation provides:

‘(a) The competent authorities of destination and dispatch may raise reasoned objections to the planned shipment: d

—in accordance with Directive 75/442/EEC, in particular Article 7 thereof, or

—if it is not in accordance with national laws and regulations relating to environmental protection, public order, public safety or health protection, or —if the notifier or the consignee has previously been guilty of illegal trafficking. In this case, the competent authority of dispatch may refuse all shipments involving the person in question in accordance with national legislation, or e

—if the shipment conflicts with obligations resulting from international conventions concluded by the Member State or Member States concerned, or f

—if the ratio of the recoverable and non recoverable waste, the estimated value of the materials to be finally recovered or the cost of the recovery and the cost of the disposal of the non recoverable fraction do not justify the recovery under economic and environmental considerations.

(b) The competent authorities of transit may raise reasoned objections to the planned shipment based on the second, third and fourth indents of (a).’ g

17. Article 26 of the regulation provides:

‘1. Any shipment of waste effected ...

(c) with consent obtained from the competent authorities concerned through falsification, misrepresentation or fraud; or ... h

(e) which results in disposal or recovery in contravention of Community or international rules ...

shall be deemed to be illegal traffic.’

18. Under art 30(1) of the regulation: i

‘Member States shall take the measures needed to ensure that waste is shipped in accordance with the provisions of this Regulation. Such measures may include inspections of establishments and undertakings, in accordance with Article 13 of Directive 75/442/EEC, and spot checks of shipments.’

a 19. Article 34 of the regulation provides:

‘1. Without prejudice to the provisions of Article 26 and to Community and national provisions concerning civil liability and irrespective of the point of disposal or recovery of the waste, the producer of that waste shall take all the necessary steps to dispose of or recover or to arrange for disposal or recovery of the waste so as to protect the quality of the environment ...

b 2. Member States shall take all necessary steps to ensure that the obligations laid down in paragraph 1 are carried out.’

20. Article 36 of the regulation provides:

c ‘Member States shall designate the competent authority or authorities for the implementation of this Regulation. A single competent authority of transit shall be designated by each Member State.’

National legislation

d 21. Paragraph 5(3) of the Gesetz zur Förderung der Kreislaufwirtschaft und Sicherung der umweltverträglichen Beseitigung von Abfällen (Law to promote recycling and to ensure environmentally friendly waste disposal) of 27 September 1994 (BGBl 1994 I, p 2705) (hereinafter the Law of 27 September 1994) prohibits any recovery of waste which leads to an increase in the concentration of pollutants in the closed substance cycle.

e 22. For the Land Rhineland-Palatinate, Sonderabfall-Management-Gesellschaft Rheinland-Pfalz mbH is responsible for organising the disposal of toxic waste.

THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

f 23. On 23 November 1999, EU-Wood-Trading notified Sonderabfall-Management-Gesellschaft Rheinland-Pfalz mbH, as competent authority of dispatch, of its intention to transport 3,500 tonnes of wood waste to the undertaking Frati Luigi de Pomponesco, established in Italy.

g 24. According to that notification, the waste in question consisted, particularly, of treated or painted wood from demolitions, from furniture or from joinery off-cuts. It was intended that it be recovered for the production of chipboard panels.

h 25. The documents annexed to the notification included a description of the recovery operation, statements certifying that the Italian authorities of destination had no objections to the import of that used wood and a laboratory report in which an analysis of the waste showed a lead content of 47 mg per kilogram of dry material.

i 26. By decision of 17 January 2000, the competent authority of dispatch objected to that shipment under the first and second indents of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation. The objection was based on the fact that, in view of the lead content of the waste in question, which exceeded a reference value fixed in a guideline of the Environment Ministry of the Land Rhineland-Palatinate, the recovery of that waste could not be carried out without endangering human health and harming the environment, contrary to the requirements both of the Directive and of the Law of 27 September 1994.

27. EU-Wood-Trading lodged an opposition with the competent authority of dispatch against those objections and produced another analysis of the waste showing, per kilogram of dry material, a lead content of 23 mg and an arsenic content of 3.4 mg. That opposition was rejected on 5 July 2000. a

28. The action brought against that decision by EU-Wood-Trading before the Verwaltungsgericht (Administrative Court) Mainz, Germany was dismissed by judgment of 16 October 2001. EU-Wood-Trading appealed against that judgment to the Oberverwaltungsgericht (Higher Administrative Court) Rheinland-Pfalz. It claimed, in essence, that the competent authority of dispatch could not raise, against a shipment of waste for recovery, objections which relate, not to the transport of that waste, but to its recovery in another member state. b

29. In those circumstances, the Oberverwaltungsgericht Rheinland-Pfalz, considering that the outcome of the action before it depended on an interpretation of Community law, decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling: c

‘(1) Under the first indent of Article 7(4)(a) of Council Regulation (EEC) No 259/93 ... can an objection to the shipment of waste for recovery be raised on the ground that the planned recovery contravenes the requirement arising from the first paragraph of Article 4 of Directive 75/442 ... for waste to be recovered in a manner which is compatible with health and environmental imperatives? d

(2) If so, can such an objection be raised not only by the authority of destination but also by the authority of dispatch?

(3) If so, is the authority of dispatch entitled to base its assessment of whether the planned recovery of the waste at the place of destination is compatible with health and environmental imperatives on the standards applicable in the State of dispatch even where they are higher than the standards applicable in the State of destination? e

(4) Under the second indent of Article 7(4)(a) of Regulation No 259/93, can an objection to the shipment of waste for recovery be raised on the ground that the planned recovery contravenes national laws and regulations relating to environmental protection, public order, public safety or health protection? f

(5) If so, can the authority of dispatch raise such an objection on the ground that the recovery contravenes national laws and regulations in force at the place of dispatch?’ g

THE QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

The first and second questions

30. By its first and second questions, which it is appropriate to consider together, the referring court is asking, in essence, whether the objections to a shipment of waste which the competent authorities of dispatch and destination are entitled to raise under the first indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation can be based on considerations connected not only to the actual transport of the waste in each competent authority's area of jurisdiction, but also to the recovery planned for that shipment. h

31. It must be noted at the outset that the regulation does not define the term ‘shipment’. Since other provisions of the regulation, particularly art 7(3), use the expression ‘transport of waste’, the term ‘shipment’ in art 7(4) of the regulation cannot necessarily be confined to the transport of the waste. i

32. It is appropriate, therefore, to place the term ‘shipment’ in its context and to interpret it according to the spirit and purpose of the provisions in question

a in order to determine whether they permit the raising of objections to a shipment of waste based on the recovery planned in the state of destination.

33. It must be observed, as a preliminary point, that the question of shipments of waste is regulated by harmonisation at Community level by the regulation, in order to ensure the protection of the environment (see DaimlerChrysler AG v Land Baden-Württemberg Case C-324/99 [2002] QB 1102, b [2001] ECR I-9897 (para 42)).

34. The conditions and procedures laid down by the regulation were adopted with a view to ensuring the protection of the environment, taking account of objectives falling within the scope of environmental policy such as the principles of proximity, priority for recovery and self-sufficiency at Community and national levels. In particular, they enable the member states, for the c purposes of implementing those principles, to take measures to prohibit generally or partially or to object systematically to and oppose shipments of waste which are not in conformity with the directive. The regulation falls within the framework of the environmental policy pursued by the Community and cannot be regarded as seeking to implement the free movement of waste d within the Community (see European Parliament v EU Council Case C-187/93 [1994] ECR I-2857 (paras 22, 23)).

35. In the Community system thus established by the regulation, it is clear that the objectives with which the Community legislature invested it seeking the protection of health and the environment could be compromised if, having regard to its purpose, the shipment of waste between member states was not e perceived in its entirety, that is to say from the point of departure of the waste in the state of dispatch to the end of its processing in the state of destination.

36. In that regard, it is clear from the ninth recital in the preamble that the regulation establishes a procedure of prior notification of shipments of waste to the competent authorities enabling them to be duly informed not only of the type and movements of the waste but also of its disposal or recovery, so f that those authorities may take all necessary measures for the protection of human health and the environment, including the possibility of raising reasoned objections.

37. For that purpose, the notifier must, under art 6(5) of the regulation, supply in the consignment note in support of the notification information relating not only to the composition and quantity of the waste for recovery and g the details of its transport, but also to the conditions in which that waste is to be recovered. The Community legislature therefore intended that all the competent authorities be informed of the whole process of treatment of the waste up to the point when it no longer poses a risk to health or the environment.

h 38. Moreover, the regulation contains provisions, other than those at issue in the main action, the implementation of which implies that the authorities with power to control the shipment of waste for recovery may take into account factors relating to its recovery. Thus, the fifth indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation gives lack of justification of the recovery by economic and environmental considerations as a ground of objection to such a shipment.

i Likewise, the combined provisions of arts 26(1)(e) and (5) of the regulation provide that the member states are to take all appropriate legal action to prohibit and penalise the illegal traffic constituted by any waste shipment which results in disposal or recovery in contravention of Community or international rules.

39. From those considerations, it is clear that the regulation, taken as a whole, permits all the competent authorities responsible for the control of shipments of waste to take account of matters connected not only to the transport of that waste but also to the conditions in which the waste is recovered. a

40. As regards the first indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation, it is appropriate, first, to observe, as did Advocate General Léger in para 36 of his opinion, that those provisions, which provide that the competent authorities of destination and of dispatch may raise reasoned objections to the planned shipment 'in accordance with Directive (EEC) 75/442, in particular Article 7 thereof', must be interpreted as enabling those authorities to raise such objections on the basis of the directive and, in particular, art 7 thereof. b

41. The use of the words 'in particular' before the mention of art 7 of the directive implies that the reference to that article is purely as an example, so that objections may also be raised on the basis of the directive's other provisions. Therefore, the fact that art 7(3) of the directive provides that the member states may take the measures necessary to prevent 'movements' of waste which are not in accordance with their waste management plans cannot limit to the transport alone of such waste the considerations on which the competent authorities may base objections which they raise under the first indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation. c

42. Finally, since under art 4 of the directive the member states are to take the measures necessary to ensure that waste is recovered or disposed of without endangering human health and without the use of processes or methods capable of harming the environment, the provisions of the first indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation must be interpreted as authorising the competent authorities of destination and of dispatch to raise objections to a shipment of waste for recovery on the ground that the planned recovery disregards the requirements arising from art 4 of the directive. d

43. In view of the foregoing, the reply to the first and second questions must be that the first indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation is to be interpreted as meaning that the objections to a shipment of waste for recovery which the competent authorities of dispatch and of destination are empowered to raise may be based on considerations connected not only to the actual transport of the waste in each competent authority's area of jurisdiction but also on the recovery planned for that shipment. e

The third question

44. By its third question, the referring court is asking, in essence, whether the first indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation must be interpreted as meaning that the competent authority of dispatch, for the purposes of an objection to a shipment of waste, may, in assessing the effects on health and the environment of the recovery envisaged at the destination, rely on the criteria to which, in order to avoid such effects, the recovery of waste is subject in the state of dispatch, even where those criteria are stricter than those in force in the state of destination. f

45. In that regard, as was stated in para 33 of this judgment, the regulation harmonised the question of shipments of waste in order to ensure the protection of the environment. On the other hand, as Advocate General Léger states in para 60 of his opinion, the requirements governing the recovery of waste have not been the object of harmonisation measures. Therefore, under the first paragraph of art 4 of the directive, the member states must take the g a necessary measures to ensure that waste is recovered without endangering human health and without using processes or methods which could harm the environment and, in particular, without risk to water, air, soil, plants and animals, without causing a nuisance through noise or odours, and without adversely affecting the countryside or places of special interest. Whilst that provision does not specify the actual content of the measures which must be taken, it is binding on the member states as to the objective to be achieved, whilst leaving to the member states a margin of discretion in assessing the need for such measures (see European Commission v Italy Case C-365/97 [1999] ECR I-7773 (paras 66, 67)).

b
c
d
e
f 46. In exercising that discretion, the member states may, in setting their waste recovery standards, be led to adopt national measures whose requirement levels with regard to the objectives of protection of human health and the environment laid down by the directive may differ substantially from one state to another. It is precisely in those circumstances that the questions referred by the national court arise and particularly the question whether, where the standards set by the member state of dispatch to attain the above-mentioned objectives are higher than those applicable in the state of destination, the competent authority of dispatch may, on the basis of the regulation, raise an objection to the envisaged shipment by invoking the higher level of protection under its national standards. Since it must be accepted that the competent authorities of dispatch are empowered to raise objections to the shipment taking account of matters connected to the conditions in which the recovery of waste is carried out in the state of destination, the provisions of the first indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation imply that those authorities, in assessing the risks which such recovery would entail for human health and the environment, may take account of all relevant criteria in that regard, including those which are in force in the state of dispatch, even if they are stricter than those of the state of destination, and provided they are intended to avoid those risks. The competent authorities of dispatch cannot, however, be bound by the criteria of their state if such criteria are no more apt to avoid those risks than those of the state of destination.

g 47. That interpretation of the regulation is evident, since it forms part of the environment policy of the Community, one of whose tasks is, according to art 2 EC (formerly art 2 of the EC Treaty), to promote a high level of protection and improvement of the quality of the environment. That objective might be undermined if the competent authority of dispatch were prevented from relying on its own standards, representing a high level of environmental protection, and from opposing consequently a shipment of waste the conditions of recovery for which in the state of destination could harm human health or the environment.

h
i 48. It is true that such opposition may, as in the main proceedings, conflict with the position taken by the competent authority of destination where that authority, taking the view that the recovery meets the requirements of its own national standards, raises no objection to the envisaged shipment of waste. However, such a situation is inherent in the system established by the regulation, which confers simultaneously on all the competent authorities the responsibility of ensuring that shipments are carried out in accordance with the regulation (see Abfall Service AG (ASA) v Bundesminister für Umwelt, Jugend und Familie Case C-6/00 [2002] QB 1073, [2002] 3 WLR 665, [2002] ECR I-1961 (para 44)). That divergence in the assessments of the different competent authorities cannot therefore be validly invoked, as being contrary to the principle of co-operation expressed in art 10 EC (formerly art 5 of the EC Treaty), in order to require a different interpretation of the regulation. a

49. However, since the Community legislature stipulated that waste for recovery should be able to move freely between member states for processing (see Chemische Afvalstoffen Dusseldorp BV v Minister van Volkshuisvesting, Ruimtelijke Ordening en Milieubeheer Case C-203/96 [1999] All ER (EC) 25, [1998] ECR I-4075 (para 33)), opposition by the competent authority of dispatch on the basis of its national waste recovery standards to a shipment can only be lawful in so far as those standards, in compliance with the principle of proportionality, are apt to attain the objectives pursued which are intended to prevent risks for human health and the environment, and do not go beyond what is necessary to attain them. b

50. In that regard, the risks must be measured, not by the yardstick of general considerations, but on the basis of relevant scientific research (see to that effect, in particular, Criminal proceedings against Van der Veldt Case C-17/93 [1994] ECR I-3537 (para 17)). c

51. Furthermore, the fact that one member state imposes less strict rules than another member state does not necessarily mean that the stricter rules are disproportionate and hence incompatible with Community law (see Deutsche Paracelsus Schulen für Naturheilverfahren GmbH v Grabner Case C-294/00 [2002] ECR I-6515 (para 46)). d

52. The mere fact that a member state has chosen a system of protection different from that adopted by another member state cannot affect the appraisal as to the need for and proportionality of the provisions adopted (see Questore di Verona v Zenatti Case C-67/98 [1999] ECR I-7289 (para 34) and the Deutsche Paracelsus case (para 47)). e

53. It is for the national court seised of an action challenging the opposition of the competent authority of dispatch to assess whether those national standards have been used in circumstances contrary to the principle of proportionality (see to that effect Snellers Autos BV v Algemeen Directeur van de Dienst Wegverkeer Case C-314/98 [2000] ECR I-8633 (para 59)). f

54. In view of the foregoing, the reply to the third question must be that the first indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation is to be interpreted as meaning that for the purposes of an objection to a shipment of waste the competent authority of dispatch may, in assessing the effects on health and the environment of the recovery envisaged at the destination, provided it complies with the principle of proportionality, rely on the criteria to which, in order to avoid such effects, the recovery of waste is subject in the state of dispatch, even where those criteria are stricter than those in force in the state of destination. g

The fourth and fifth questions h

55. By its fourth and fifth questions, which it is appropriate to consider together, the referring court is asking, in essence, whether the second indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation, under which reasoned objections may be raised against a planned shipment if it is not in accordance with the national laws and regulations relating to environmental protection, public order, public safety or health protection, enables the competent authority of dispatch to raise an objection based on the fact that the recovery envisaged does not comply with the national provisions. i

56. As was said in para 39 of this judgment, the regulation, taken as a whole, permits all the competent authorities responsible for the control of shipments of waste to take account of matters connected not only to the transport of that a waste but also to the conditions in which the waste is recovered. However, consideration of all the provisions of art 7(4) of the regulation cannot lead to such a conclusion as regards the application of the second indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation without undermining the cohesion of that article.

b 57. It is important to note that art 7(4)(b) of the regulation enables competent authorities of transit to raise reasoned objections against the planned shipment based on the second, third and fourth indents of sub-para (a) of that article, but not on the first and fifth indents thereof.

c 58. Thus the regulation does not permit the competent authorities of transit, in contrast to the competent authorities of dispatch and of destination, to check that the waste will be processed in compliance with the directive or that the recovery is properly justified from the economic and environmental point of view.

d 59. In that context, by providing in the second indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation that the competent authorities may raise objections to the planned shipment if it does not comply with national laws and regulations, the Community legislature sought to safeguard, at each stage of the shipment, the efficacy of each member state's own provisions with regard to waste which is within the territory of that state. Thus, those provisions which govern shipment cover only operations relating to that shipment which occur during the time when it is within the respective territory of each of the competent authorities concerned. It follows that the competent authorities of dispatch cannot rely on those provisions to raise an objection to a recovery operation in the state of destination.

e 60. In those circumstances, the reply to the fourth and fifth questions must be that the second indent of art 7(4)(a) of the regulation is to be interpreted as meaning that a competent authority of dispatch cannot rely on those provisions to raise an objection to a shipment of waste based on the fact that the planned recovery does not comply with the national laws and regulations for the protection of the environment, public order, public safety or health protection.

COSTS

f 61. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main action, a step in the proceedings before the referring court, it is for that court to decide as to the costs. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the court, other than those of the said parties, cannot be recovered.

On those grounds, the Court of Justice (First Chamber) hereby rules:

h (1) The first indent of art 7(4)(a) of Council Regulation (EEC) 259/93 (on the supervision and control of shipments of waste within, into and out of the European Community, as amended by Commission Decisions (EC) 98/368 and (EC) 1999/816, is to be interpreted as meaning that the objections to a shipment of waste for recovery which the competent authorities of dispatch and of destination are empowered to raise may be based on considerations connected not only to the actual transport of the waste in each competent authority's area of jurisdiction but also on the recovery planned for that shipment.

i (2) The first indent of art 7(4)(a) of Regulation 259/93, as amended by Decisions 98/368 and 1999/816, is to be interpreted as meaning that for the purposes of an objection to a shipment of waste the competent authority of dispatch may, in assessing the effects on health and the environment of the recovery envisaged at the destination, provided it complies with the principle of proportionality, rely on the criteria to which, to avoid such effects, the recovery of waste is subject in the state of dispatch, even where those criteria are stricter than those in force in the state of destination. a

(3) The second indent of art 7(4)(a) of Regulation 259/93, as amended by Decisions 98/368 and 1999/816, is to be interpreted as meaning that a competent authority of dispatch may not rely on those provisions to raise an objection to a shipment of waste based on the fact that the planned recovery does not comply with the national laws and regulations for protection of the environment, public order, public safety or health protection. b

a

Radlberger Getränkegesellschaft mbH & Co and another v Land Baden-Württemberg

b

(Case C-309/02)

COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (GRAND CHAMBER)

JUDGES SKOURIS (PRESIDENT), JANN AND LENAERTS (RAPPORTEUR) (PRESIDENTS OF CHAMBERS), GULMANN, PUISOCHET, SCHINTGEN, COLNERIC, VON BAHR AND CUNHA RODRIGUES

c

ADVOCATE GENERAL RUIZ-JARABO COLOMER

2 MARCH, 6 MAY, 14 DECEMBER 2004

d

European Community – Freedom of movement – Goods – Packaging and packaging waste – Claimant companies members of global collection system – Introduction of mandatory deposit and return system – Transition between systems – Whether member state precluded from introducing deposit and return system – Article 28 EC (formerly EC Treaty, art 30), European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 94/62, arts 1(2), 7, 18.

e

The claimant companies exported drinks, including table water and fruit juices, to Germany, using non-reusable recoverable packaging. They had joined a global waste collection system and therefore were exempted from the obligation to charge their customers the deposit prescribed by para 8(1) of the national regulation on the avoidance and recovery of packaging waste (the national regulation). In 1999 the German government announced that for the first time the proportion of reusable drinks packaging had fallen below 72%. The proportion remained below 72% over two further periods, and, consequently, on 2 July 2002, the government announced that from 1 January 2003 a mandatory deposit would be charged on mineral water, beer and soft drinks. The claimants brought an action against the respondent Land before the Administrative Court, Stuttgart, contending that the rules laid down in the national regulation on quotas for reusable packaging and the related deposit and return obligations were contrary to arts 1(1), (2), 5, 7, and 18<sup>a</sup> of European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 94/62 (on packaging and packaging waste) (the directive), and art 28 EC<sup>b</sup> (formerly art 30 of the EC Treaty). The court stayed the proceedings and referred a number of questions to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling which related to the construction of arts 1(2), 7 and 18 of the directive, and art 28 EC.

f

g

h

i

Held — (1) Article 1(2) of the directive did not preclude the member states from introducing measures designed to promote systems for the re-use of packaging. Although the directive did not establish a hierarchy between the re-use and the recovery of packaging waste, art 5 of the directive allowed member states to take measures to encourage systems for the re-use of a Articles 1(1), (2), 5, 7 and 18, so far as material, are set out at judgment paras 3–7, below

b Article 28 EC provides: 'Quantitative restrictions on imports and all measures having equivalent effect shall be prohibited between Member States.'

packaging waste. Such measures had to comply not only with requirements which flowed from the directive's other provisions, but also with the Treaty, in particular, art 28 EC (see judgment paras 33–37, below).

(2) While art 7 of the directive did not confer on the producers and distributors concerned any right to continue to participate in a given packaging waste management system, it precluded the replacement of a global system for the collection of packaging waste with a deposit and return system where the new system was not equally appropriate for the purpose of attaining the objectives of that directive or where the changeover to the new system did not take place without a break and without jeopardising the ability of economic operators in the sectors concerned actually to participate in the new system as soon as it entered into force. In particular, where the new system was a deposit and return system, the member state concerned had to ensure that there were a sufficient number of return points so that consumers who had been charged a deposit when buying goods in non-reusable packaging could recover the deposit even if they did not go back to the place of purchase. Article 7(1) of the directive obliged each member state to ensure that the producers and distributors concerned had access to a packaging waste management system at all times and without discrimination. Therefore, when replacing the existing system the member state had to ensure that the producers and distributors concerned had a reasonable period for the transition of the new system so that they could adapt their production methods and chains of distribution to the requirements of the new system (see judgment paras 43, 46, 48–50, below).

(3) Article 28 EC precluded national rules, such as those laid down in paras 8(1) and 9(2) of the national regulation, when they announced that a global packaging waste collection system was to be replaced by a deposit and return system without the producers and distributors concerned having a reasonable transitional period to adapt thereto and being assured that, at the time when the packaging waste management system changes, they could actually participate in an operational system. Although paras 8(1) and 9(2) of the national regulation applied to all producers and distributors operating within the national territory, they did not affect the marketing of drinks produced in Germany and that of drinks from other member states in the same manner. Recourse to reusable packaging normally caused a drinks producer established in another member state to incur costs higher than those borne by a German producer, given that the costs linked to the organisation of a deposit system and to transport were greater if the producer was established at a certain distance from the points of sale. It followed that the replacement of the global packaging collection system with a deposit and return system hindered the placing on the German market of drinks imported from other member states. Given that the national law did not affect the marketing of drinks produced in Germany and that of drinks from other member states in the same manner, they could not fall outside the scope of art 28 EC. Compliance with the principle of proportionality required there to be a reasonable transitional period which enabled the producers and distributors concerned to adapt and ensured participation in the scheme (see judgment paras 63, 66, 67, 73, 81–83, below).

Notes

For the European legislation on packaging and packaging waste, see 38 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 34.

a Cases cited

Aher-Waggon GmbH v Germany Case C-389/96 [1998] ECR I-4473, ECJ.
Banchemo (Criminal proceedings against) Case C-387/93 [1995] ECR I-4663, ECJ.
Colim NV v Bigg's Continent Noord NV Case C-33/97 [1999] ECR I-3175, ECJ.
DaimlerChrysler AG v Land Baden-Württemberg Case C-324/99 [2001] ECR I-9897, ECJ.

b Deutsche Post AG v Sievers Joined cases C-270/97 and C-271/97 [2000] ECR I-929, ECJ.

Deutsche SiSi-Werke GmbH & Co Betriebs KG v Office for Harmonisation in the Internal Market (Trade Marks and Designs) Joined cases T-146-153/02 (2004) Transcript (judgment), 28 January, CFI.

c Deutscher Apothekerverband eV v 0800 DocMorris NV Case C-322/01 [2003] ECR I-14887, ECJ.

EC Commission v Denmark Case 302/86 [1988] ECR 4607, ECJ.

Eurico Italia Srl v Ente Nazionale Risi Joined cases C-332/92, 333/92 and C-335/92 [1994] ECR I-711, ECJ.

d European Commission v Denmark Case C-246/99 [2002] ECR I-6943, ECJ.

European Commission v Germany Case C-102/96 [1998] ECR I-6871, ECJ.

European Commission v Germany Case C-463/01 (2004) Transcript (opinion), 6 May, (2004) Transcript (judgment), 14 December, ECJ.

European Commission v Greece Case C-391/92 [1995] ECR I-1621, ECJ.

European Commission v Spain Case C-12/00 [2003] ECR I-459, ECJ.

e Franzén (Criminal proceedings against) Case C-189/95 [1997] ECR I-5909, ECJ.

Gozza v Università degli Studi di Padova Case C-371/97 [2000] ECR I-7881, ECJ.

Groupement National des Négociants en Pommes de Terre de Belgique (Belgapom) v ITM Belgium SA Case C-63/94 [1995] ECR I-2467, ECJ.

Henkel KGaA Case C-218/01 (2003) Transcript (opinion), 14 January, (2004) Transcript (judgment), 12 February, ECJ.

f Hünermund v Landesapothekerkammer Baden-Württemberg Case C-292/92 [1993] ECR I-6787, ECJ.

Keck (Criminal proceedings against) Joined cases C-267/91 and C-268/91 [1993] ECR I-6097, ECJ.

Konsumentombudsmannen (KO) v De Agostini (Svenska) Förlag AB, Konsumentombudsmannen (KO) v TV-Shop i Sverige AB Joined cases C-34-36/95 [1997] All ER (EC) 687, [1997] ECR I-3843, ECJ.

g Konsumentombudsmannen (KO) v Gourmet International Products AB Case C-405/98 [2001] All ER (EC) 308, [2001] ECR I-1795, ECJ.

Morellato v Comune di Padova Case C-416/00 [2003] ECR I-9343, ECJ.

h Netherlands v Tankstation 't Heukske vof Joined cases C-401/92 and C-402/92 [1994] ECR I-2199, ECJ.

Philips Electronics NV v Remington Consumer Products Ltd Case C-299/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 634, [2003] Ch 159, [2003] 2 WLR 294, [2002] ECR I-5475, ECJ.

Procureur de la République v Association de Défense des Brûleurs d'Huiles Usagées Case 240/83 [1985] ECR 531, ECJ.

i Procureur du Roi v Dassonville Case 8/74 [1974] ECR 837, ECJ.

Punto Casa SpA v Sindaco del Comune di Capena and Comune di Capena Joined cases C-69/93 and C-258/93 [1994] ECR I-2355, ECJ.

R v Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, ex p Hedley Lomas (Ireland) Ltd Case C-5/94 [1996] All ER (EC) 493, [1996] ECR I-2553, ECJ.

Reina v Landeskreditbank Baden-Württemberg Case 65/81 [1982] ECR 33, ECJ.

- Rewe-Zentral AG v Bundesmonopolverwaltung für Branntwein* Case 120/78 [1979] ECR 649, ECJ. a
- Safety Hi-Tech Srl v S & T Srl* Case C-284/95 [1998] ECR I-4301, ECJ.
- Schutzverband gegen Unlauteren Wettbewerb v TK-Heimdienst Sass GmbH* Case C-254/98 [2000] ECR I-151, ECJ.
- Sieckmann v Deutsches Patent- und Markenamt* Case C-273/00 [2004] All ER (EC) 253, [2003] Ch 487, [2003] 3 WLR 424, [2002] ECR I-11737, ECJ. b
- Société d'importation Édouard Leclerc-Siplec v TF1 Publicité SA* Case C-412/93 [1995] All ER (EC) 343, [1995] ECR I-179, ECJ.
- Van de Haar (Criminal proceedings against)* Joined cases 177/82 and 178/82 [1984] ECR 1797, ECJ.
- Vanacker (Criminal proceedings against)* Case C-37/92 [1993] ECR I-4947, ECJ. c
- World Wildlife Fund (WWF) v Autonome Provinz Bozen* Case C-435/97 [1999] ECR I-5613, ECJ.
- Wouters v Algemene Raad van de Nederlandse Orde van Advocaten (Raad van de Balies van de Europese Gemeenschap intervening)* Case C-309/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 193, [2002] ECR I-1577, ECJ. d

Reference

By order of 21 August 2002, the Verwaltungsgericht (Administrative Court) Stuttgart, Germany referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) four questions (set out at judgment para 19, below) on the interpretation of European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 94/62 (on packaging and packaging waste) (OJ 1994 L365 p 10) and art 28 EC (formerly art 30 of the EC Treaty). The reference was submitted in proceedings brought by Radlberger Getränkegesellschaft mbH & Co and S Spitz KG, which are Austrian drinks producers, against Land Baden-Württemberg. Observations were submitted on behalf of: Radlberger Getränkegesellschaft mbH & Co and S Spitz KG, by R Karpenstein, Rechtsanwalt; Land Baden-Württemberg, by L-A Versteyl, Rechtsanwalt; the German government, by W-D Plessing and A Tiemann, acting as agents, assisted by D Sellner, Rechtsanwalt; the Austrian government, by E Riedl, acting as agent; the French government, by G de Bergues and D Petrusch, acting as agents; the Italian government, by I M Braguglia, acting as agent, assisted by M Fiorilli, avvocato dello Stato; the Netherlands government, by S Terstal and C Wissels, acting as agents; the Commission of the European Communities, by J Grunwald and M Konstantinidis, acting as agents. The language of the case was German. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General. e
f
g

6 May 2004. The Advocate General (D Ruiz-Jarabo Colomer) delivered the following opinion<sup>1</sup>. h

1. The Verwaltungsgericht Stuttgart (Administrative Court, Stuttgart, Germany) has referred four questions to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling on the interpretation of arts 1(2), 7 and 18 of European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 94/62 (on packaging and packaging waste)<sup>2</sup> and of art 28 EC (formerly art 30 of the EC Treaty). i a The questions focus on whether the aforementioned provisions prohibit member states from favouring re-usable drinks packaging over recoverable drinks packaging or from impeding the sale of soft drinks in recoverable packaging, in specific circumstances.

<sup>1</sup> Language of the case: Spanish.

<sup>2</sup> OJ 1994 L365 p 10. It has been significantly amended by European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 2004/12 (OJ 2004 L47 p 26), but the amendments have not affected the provisions whose interpretation is sought in this case.

b I—THE NATIONAL LEGISLATION

2. The Verordnung über die Vermeidung und Verwertung von Verpackungsabfällen (Regulation on the Avoidance and Recovery of Packaging Waste) (hereinafter the Packaging Regulation) of 21 August 1998<sup>3</sup>, promotes various measures for achieving the objective of avoiding or reducing the impact of packaging waste on the environment. This legislation, which replaced the legislation of 12 June 1991<sup>4</sup>, is intended to incorporate Directive 94/62 into national law; it defines re-usable packaging as packaging designed to be used several times for the same purpose.

According to its provisions, producers and distributors of drinks bottled in non-reusable packaging are to charge a deposit on each item at every stage in the chain of distribution, although they may be released from that obligation, which includes the duty to take back and recover the empty bottles, by participating in a comprehensive system for managing packaging and packaging waste. However, if the overall proportion of drinks sold in Germany in re-usable packaging falls below 72% and, at the same time, the proportion of re-usable packaging achieved in 1991 in the specific soft drinks sectors in which they operate<sup>5</sup> is not reached, the economic operators lose that option, and must begin to charge a deposit and assume responsibility for recovering the bottles.

3. Paragraph 6 of the Packaging Regulation provides:

‘1. Distributors shall accept the return of used empty sales packaging from final consumers, free of charge, at, or in the immediate vicinity of, the actual point of delivery, recover the packaging in accordance with the requirements of point 1 of Annex I and fulfil the requirements of point 2 of Annex I ...

2. Producers and distributors shall accept free of charge at the place of actual delivery packaging returned to distributors under subparagraph 1.

3. The obligations under subparagraphs 1 and 2 shall not apply to packaging [covered by] a system which ... ensures that used sales packaging is ... collected from the private final consumer or in his vicinity, throughout the whole sales territory of the distributor ... [The] system ... shall recover packaging delivered to it, in accordance with the requirements of point 1 of Annex I ... Proof of participation in [such] a system shall be provided to the competent authority ... Coordination shall be arranged by the system operator and the public waste management authority in writing ...

4. The competent authority may revoke its determination ... immediately where it establishes that there is a failure to comply with the

i 3 BGBI I, p 2379.

4 BGBI I, p 1234. That legislation contained similar provisions concerning the compulsory deposit on non-reusable drinks packaging.

5 According to the information supplied by the claimants in the main proceedings in their written observations, the proportion of reusable packaging that year per type of drink, taken as a reference, was: mineral water, 91.33%; non-carbonated soft drinks, 34.56%; carbonated soft drinks, 73.72%; beer, 82.16%; and wine, 28.63%.

requirements ... Where the recovery quotas specified in Annex I to this regulation have not been achieved in respect only of packaging made out of particular materials, the revocation shall apply only to such packaging. Subparagraphs 1 and 2 shall apply with effect from the first day of the sixth calendar month following publication of the revocation ...'

4. Paragraph 8(1) of the Packaging Regulation states in the following terms the rule that a deposit is compulsory for non-reusable drinks packaging:

'1. Distributors who put liquids for consumption into circulation in non-reusable drinks packaging shall charge the purchaser a deposit of at least EUR 0.25 including turnover tax per item of packaging; where the net volume exceeds 1.5 litres, the deposit shall be at least EUR 0.50 including turnover tax. The deposit shall be charged by each further distributor at every stage in the chain of distribution until delivery to the final consumer. The deposit shall be repaid when the packaging is returned under Paragraph 6(1) and (2).'

5. Paragraph 9 regulates the exemption from the obligation to charge a deposit and the protection afforded to ecologically sound drinks packaging as follows:

'1. Paragraph 8 shall not apply to packaging in respect of which the producer or distributor participates in a [comprehensive] system under Paragraph 6(3). Paragraph 6(4) shall apply mutatis mutandis.

2. If, for beer, mineral water (including spring water, table water and spa water), carbonated soft drinks, fruit juices (including fruit syrups, vegetable juices and other non-carbonated drinks) and wine (except pearl wine, sparkling wine, vermouth and dessert wine), the combined proportion of drinks in reusable packaging falls below 72% in the calendar year in the geographical area to which this regulation applies, a new survey of the relevant proportions of reusable packaging shall be carried out for the 12 months following publication of the failure to achieve the required proportions. If this shows that the proportion of reusable packaging in Federal territory is below the proportion laid down under the first sentence, the decision under Paragraph 6(3) shall be deemed to be revoked throughout Federal territory in respect of the drinks categories for which the reusable proportion determined in 1991 is not achieved, with effect from the first day of the sixth calendar month following publication in accordance with subparagraph 3. The first and second sentences shall apply mutatis mutandis in respect of pasteurised milk for human consumption when the proportion of reusable packaging and polyethylene bag packaging falls below 20% in the calendar year in the geographical area to which this regulation applies.

3. Each year, the Federal Government shall publish in the Bundesanzeiger [Federal Gazette] the relevant proportions, for the purposes of subparagraph 2, of drinks sold in ecologically sound packaging.

4. Where the relevant proportion, for the purposes of subparagraph 2, of drinks packaged in ecologically sound drinks packaging is achieved again after a revocation, the competent authority shall make a new determination under Paragraph 6(3) on application or on its own initiative.'

a II—THE FACTS IN THE MAIN ACTION

6. The claimants are medium-sized firms established in Austria which produce drinks. They export carbonated and non-carbonated soft drinks, fruit juices and table water in recoverable non-reusable packaging to Germany.

b 7. They participate, as licensees, in the system operated by 'Duales System Deutschland AG' (Grüner Punkt); according to a determination by the Baden-Württemberg Environment Ministry<sup>6</sup>, this is a comprehensive system for managing used packaging and packaging waste, which operates throughout the territory within the meaning of para 6(3) of the Packaging Regulation. They were therefore exempt from charging their customers a sum by way of deposit on each drink.

c 8. On 2 July 2002 the German government published in the Bundesanzeiger the results of a national survey of the overall proportion of packaging that was reusable, in accordance with para 9(3) of the Packaging Regulation. The data showed that, for all drinks except milk, the proportion, for the period between May 2000 and April 2001, was below 72%.

d 9. At the same time, it announced that, from the first day of the sixth calendar month following publication, the exemption would be revoked in respect of the mineral water, beer and carbonated soft drinks sectors, the categories for which the specific proportions achieved in 1991 had not been reached.

e Consequently, the undertakings concerned were required, from January 2003, to charge the deposit provided for in para 8(1) of the Packaging Regulation on most of the packaging for the drinks sold by them in Germany, and to accept the return of the used packaging and recover it.

10. The claimants consider that this measure constitutes a restriction on their exports to Germany, in breach of Community law.

f III—THE QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

11. Before giving judgment on the merits of the case, the Verwaltungsgericht Stuttgart decided to stay proceedings and refer the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

g '(1) On a proper construction of Article 1(2) of ... Directive 94/62 ... are Member States prohibited from favouring systems for reusing drinks packaging over recoverable non-reusable packaging by removing, where a Federal target for reusable packaging of 72% is not reached, the possibility of exemption from a return, management and deposit obligation laid down in respect of empty non-reusable drinks packaging by participation in a return and management system, so far as concerns drinks sectors in which the proportion of reusable packaging has fallen below the level determined in 1991?

h (2) On a proper construction of Article 18 of ... Directive 94/62 ... are Member States prohibited from impeding the placing of drinks in recoverable non-reusable packaging on the market by removing, where a Federal target for reusable packaging of 72% is not reached, the possibility of exemption from a return, management and deposit obligation laid down in respect of empty non-reusable drinks packaging by participation in a return and management system, so far as concerns drinks sectors in which the proportion of reusable packaging has fallen below the level determined in 1991?

(3) On a proper construction of Article 7 of... Directive 94/62 do producers and distributors of drinks in recoverable non-reusable packaging have a right to participate in an existing return and management system for used drinks packaging, in order to meet a statutory obligation to charge a deposit on non-reusable drinks packaging and accept the return of used drinks packaging?

(4) On a proper construction of Article 28 EC are the Member States prohibited from adopting rules providing that where a Federal target for reusable drinks packaging of 72% is not reached, the possibility of exemption from a return, management and deposit obligation laid down in respect of empty non-reusable drinks packaging by participation in a return and management system is removed so far as concerns drinks sectors in which the proportion of reusable packaging has fallen below the level determined in 1991?

IV—THE COMMUNITY LEGISLATION

12. The provisions of secondary legislation of which the German court seeks an interpretation are arts 1(2), 7 and 18 of Directive 94/62.

13. Article 1 provides:

‘1. This Directive aims to harmonize national measures concerning the management of packaging and packaging waste in order, on the one hand, to prevent any impact thereof on the environment of all Member States as well as of third countries or to reduce such impact, thus providing a high level of environmental protection, and, on the other hand, to ensure the functioning of the internal market and to avoid obstacles to trade and distortion and restriction of competition within the Community.

2. To this end this Directive lays down measures aimed, as a first priority, at preventing the production of packaging waste and, as additional fundamental principles, at reusing packaging, at recycling and other forms of recovering packaging waste and, hence, at reducing the final disposal of such waste.’

14. Article 7 governs the return, collection and recovery systems. It is worded as follows:

‘1. Member States shall take the necessary measures to ensure that systems are set up to provide for:

(a) the return and/or collection of used packaging and/or packaging waste from the consumer, other final user, or from the waste stream in order to channel it to the most appropriate waste management alternatives;

(b) the reuse or recovery including recycling of the packaging and/or packaging waste collected, in order to meet the objectives laid down in this Directive.

These systems shall be open to the participation of the economic operators of the sectors concerned and to the participation of the competent public authorities. They shall also apply to imported products under non-discriminatory conditions, including the detailed arrangements and any tariffs imposed for access to the systems, and shall be designed so as to avoid barriers to trade or distortions of competition in conformity with the Treaty.

2. ...’

a 15. Article 18 refers to the freedom to place packaging on the market in the following terms:

‘Member States shall not impede the placing on the market of their territory of packaging which satisfies the provisions of this Directive.’

b 16. Article 28 EC, the primarily legislation referred to by the national court, provides:

‘Quantitative restrictions on imports and all measures having equivalent effect shall be prohibited between Member States.’

V—PROCEDURE BEFORE THE COURT OF JUSTICE

c 17. Written observations have been submitted in these proceedings, within the period prescribed by art 23 of the Statute of the Court of Justice, by the claimant companies, the authority which is the defendant in the main action<sup>7</sup>, the German, French, Italian, Netherlands and Austrian governments and the Commission of the European Communities.

d At the hearing on 2 March 2004 oral argument was presented by the claimants’ representative, the defendant’s representative, the agent of the German government, the agent of the Italian government, the agent of the Netherlands government and the agent of the Commission.

VI—THE FIRST QUESTION

e 18. The Verwaltungsgericht Stuttgart wishes to know, first, whether art 1(2) of Directive 94/62 precludes a member state from favouring the re-use of drinks packaging over recycling and other forms of recovery, by applying rules such as paras 8(1) and 9(2) of the Packaging Regulation.

f A—The observations submitted

19. According to the claimant companies, Directive 94/62 does not give preference to reusable packaging, so there must be no discrimination against other types of packaging. The Austrian government expresses the same opinion.

g 20. Land Baden-Württemberg, the defendant in the main proceedings, claims that the national legislation does not favour the use of reusable packaging but, when the percentage of that packaging is below a certain limit, merely extends to non-reusable packaging the obligation to charge a deposit to which reusable packaging is subject; all types of packaging are therefore treated in the same way. Although the Community legislature did not give priority to reusable packaging, because in 1994 there were no sufficiently advanced assessment techniques, it also did not prohibit such priority; the member states may therefore provide for it if the information available to them so justifies. In Germany, the investigations carried out show that, in order to protect the environment, reusable packaging is better than recoverable packaging<sup>8</sup>.

i <sup>7</sup> Land Baden-Württemberg. In Germany, it is the Federal Länder which have competence to implement the Packaging Regulation.

<sup>8</sup> It states that in the background document entitled ‘Ökobilanz Getränkeverpackungen für alkoholfreie Getränke und Wein II, Phase 2’, the Federal Ministry of the Environment found that, taking into account key indicators like the use of natural resources, the greenhouse effect and acidification, non-reusable glass containers and cans cause more problems than reusable packaging systems.

The German government adds that re-use systems avoid the production of waste and help to achieve the main priority of Directive 94/62. The Italian and Netherlands governments and the Commission agree with these arguments. a

21. The French government believes that, in order to answer this question, the relevant provision is art 5 of Directive 94/62, which does not prohibit member states from favouring reusable packaging systems, provided that they comply with art 28 EC. b

B—Reply to the question

22. On looking at the wording of art 1(2) of Directive 94/62, whose interpretation is required by the national court, it is apparent that it offers no basis for favouring re-use systems over recycling systems and other forms of recovery. The provision does not determine any hierarchical order; it gives top priority to preventing the production of packaging waste, while re-use, recycling and other forms of recovering packaging waste, which are mentioned immediately afterwards, are given equal standing. It is true that the eighth recital states that life cycle assessments should be completed as soon as possible to justify a clear hierarchy between reusable, recyclable and recoverable packaging but, in practice, the studies carried out in certain countries do not appear to have reached final conclusions yet. c

23. Nor is it possible to equate prevention and re-use, which are concepts defined in art 3 of Directive 94/62. According to art 3(4), prevention consists in reducing the quantity and the harmfulness for the environment of materials and substances contained in packaging and packaging waste, and also in reducing packaging at production process level and at the marketing, distribution, utilisation and elimination stages, in particular by developing 'clean' products and technology. Article 3(5) describes re-use as any operation by which packaging, which has been conceived and designed to accomplish within its life cycle a minimum number of trips or rotations, is refilled or used for the same purpose for which it was conceived, with or without the support of auxiliary products, the re-used packaging subsequently becoming packaging waste. d

24. The basic rule for prevention is found in para 1 of Annex II to Directive 94/62, which contains the requirements specific to the manufacturing and composition of packaging: it is to be so manufactured that the packaging volume and weight is limited to the minimum adequate amount to maintain the necessary level of safety, hygiene and acceptance for the packed product and for the consumer; that is to say, prevention concerns the design of the packaging and its manufacturing process, with the aim of reducing and avoiding at source the creation of waste. As we can see, the measures apply equally to reusable and recoverable packaging. e

25. Article 5 of Directive 94/62 authorises public authorities to encourage systems for the re-use of packaging which can be re-used in an environmentally sound manner, provided that they do so in conformity with the Treaty. I shall examine the context in which they may act, and establish whether legislation such as that at issue fulfils that requirement, when I consider the fourth question referred for a preliminary ruling. f

26. Article 1(2) of Directive 94/62 merely gives priority to the prevention of the production of packaging waste, and does not give precedence to reusable packaging, so that a member state cannot use that provision as a basis for favouring the re-use of drinks packaging over recycling and other forms of recovery. g

a VII—THE SECOND QUESTION

27. By this question, it is sought to clarify whether art 18 of Directive 94/62, which enshrines the freedom to place on the market packaging manufactured according to the directive's rules, precludes a member state from impeding the placing on the market of drinks in non-reusable bottles, by applying provisions such as paras 8(1) and 9(2) of the Packaging Regulation.

b

A—The observations submitted

28. The claimants in the main action contend that the provisions of the directive, in particular Annex II, exhaustively cover the risks which packaging represents for the environment: the basic requirements for protection are not minimum clauses which may be completed by national law by means of the imposition of quotas for reusable packaging. Non-reusable packaging which is recyclable or recoverable in the form of waste-to-energy also satisfies the minimum requirements, so that it is not appropriate to restrict the sale of drinks in that kind of packaging. By taking the overall view that reusable packaging is ecologically sound and that non-reusable packaging is harmful to the environment, the German legislation discriminates against the latter and the drinks which it contains. The Austrian, French and Italian governments agree with this assessment.

29. Land Baden-Württemberg and the German government consider, as the Commission does, that the question should be answered in the negative. The Netherlands government suggests that national authorities may impede the placing on the market of products in packaging which infringes legislation relating to re-use, to recovery or to deposit, collection and recovery systems.

B—The reply to the question

30. I agree with the defendant, the German government and the Commission that art 18 establishes the right to place on the market throughout the Community packaging which complies with the basic requirements set out in art 9 and in Annex II, relating to the composition of packaging and its capacity to be re-used or recovered, and merely prohibits discrimination against any kind of packaging which complies with the requirements of Directive 94/62.

31. The deposit, return and recovery system governed by the contested German legislation does not impede trade in drinks in non-reusable packaging; nor does it govern the composition of packaging, only the manner of distribution. Likewise, it does not prevent packaging from entering the market because of its technical characteristics; it simply sets the conditions for its collection and recovery.

32. For these reasons, I consider that art 18 of Directive 94/62 is not the appropriate provision for analysing the effects which the application of rules such as paras 8(1) and 9(2) of the German Packaging Regulation may have on the free movement of goods.

i VIII—THE THIRD QUESTION

33. The Verwaltungsgericht Stuttgart then asks whether art 7 of Directive 94/62 grants producers and distributors of drinks in non-reusable packaging the right to participate in an existing system for the return and management of empty packaging, in order to obtain exemption from the statutory obligation to charge a deposit, to take back the used packaging and to recover it, in which case the national authorities would not be authorised to withdraw that option or to impose those burdens on them if the percentage of reusable packaging fell below a certain level. a

A—The observations submitted

33. In the opinion of the claimant companies, the directive grants economic operators the freedom to participate in comprehensive systems for managing packaging and packaging waste, and the national authorities cannot restrict that freedom. If they do so, as in Germany, a large number of drinks packaged in non-reusable packaging cease to be marketed. The Austrian, Italian and French governments express the same view. The Netherlands government has not submitted observations on this point. b

34. Land Baden-Württemberg and the German government suggest that the question should be answered in the negative. Otherwise, undertakings could refuse to participate in improved systems for collecting packaging and packaging waste, claiming that they have already joined an existing one. The Commission endorses this view. c

B—The reply to the question d

35. After authorising the member states, in art 5, to promote systems for the re-use of packaging, in conformity with the Treaty, Directive 94/62 sets out, in art 6, the recovery and recycling objectives, which are expressed in the obligation to achieve minimum and maximum percentages in a first five-year phase<sup>9</sup>, at the end of which the Council of the European Communities must fix, with a view to increasing them substantially, the corresponding percentages for a second five-year phase<sup>10</sup>. e

36. In order to achieve the desired results, art 7 requires the national authorities to facilitate the introduction of both systems for the return and/or collection of used packaging and packaging waste and systems for the re-use and recovery, including recycling, of the packaging collected; these measures are to form part of a policy covering all packaging. The systems must be open to the participation of the economic operators concerned and to the participation of the public authorities; they are to apply to imported products under non-discriminatory conditions, including the detailed arrangements and the tariffs for access; and they must be designed so as to avoid barriers to trade and distortions of competition, in accordance with the Treaty. f

37. I consider that, under that provision, the national authorities may choose, for non-reusable drinks packaging, between making it subject to deposit, return and recovery or allowing it to be collected, by means of a comprehensive management system, from the consumer's home or near the place in which the distributor operates. Directive 94/62 leaves it to the member states to choose one of these methods or a combination of the two, depending on the type of drink, for example, or on the amount to be charged as a deposit on each item according to the capacity of the different packaging. It should be remembered, however, that art 6 of the directive provides for harmonisation of the minimum and maximum targets for recovery and recycling; also, member g

<sup>9</sup> Greece, Ireland and Portugal were allowed, in the light of the particular circumstances of each country, to set lower targets.

<sup>10</sup> These targets are set out in Directive 2004/12. It is provided that, no later than 31 December 2007, the Parliament and the Council, acting on a proposal from the Commission, are to fix targets for the third five-year phase, from 2009 until 2014, a process which will be repeated every five years. h a states which intend to go beyond the targets set<sup>11</sup> must, as well as informing the Commission of its intentions, have the necessary capacity and implement the system while avoiding distortions of the internal market and without preventing other member states from achieving the objectives.

b 38. Whenever a state sets itself an ambitious programme for managing non-reusable packaging waste, requiring high percentages in order to avoid uncontrolled dumping which damages the countryside, it tends to impose the obligation to charge a deposit, the formula which gives the best results because the consumers themselves return the empty packaging in order to recover the amount left as a deposit. That system is likely to increase the collection rate, to reduce the pollution caused by non-reusable packaging that is thrown away and to increase the possibilities for recycling the material collected. With the introduction of a deposit, there is a greater rate of recovery of the components of the non-reusable packaging and a corresponding reduction in the pollution caused by empty bottles and cans. Where selection and collection, based on a deposit, is entrusted to professional systems, recovery adapted to the constituents makes it possible to save raw materials and to recover the recyclable material with a level of purity higher than that which results from the selective separation of domestic waste, in which errors in sorting occur more frequently.

c 39. In states in which ecological awareness is less developed, the public authorities are inclined rather to save the consumer the inconvenience connected with deposit and return systems, leaving it to him to separate the waste, with the implicit risk of mistakes, carelessness and lack of interest, and providing that the undertakings responsible for managing the waste are to collect it from the consumer's home or in the vicinity of the place in which the distributor operates. It is clear that the consequences of the two systems for the environment are very different, but they are both covered by art 7 of Directive 94/62.

f 40. When member states decide to apply one or other of the systems to all or only certain types of packaging, they have to comply with art 7, that is to say, they have to allow all producers and distributors of drinks in non-reusable packaging, including imports, to have access, at any time and without discrimination, to collection and management systems which replace their statutory obligation to take back and recover the empty packaging. However, I do not think that, on the basis of that provision, economic operators can claim a personal right to use the services of one of those systems in particular merely because they operate in the country or to continue to participate in it, when the national authorities decide that, from a certain date, a deposit will be charged on the purchase of certain drinks bottled in non-reusable packaging.

g 41. Therefore, the answer to be given to the national court must be that art 7 of Directive 94/62 does not grant producers and distributors of drinks in non-reusable packaging a right to participate in an existing return and management system, when the national authorities replace it with a deposit system intended to ensure that the empty packaging is taken back, in order to improve selective recovery and contain uncontrolled dumping.

i IX—THE FOURTH QUESTION

42. It remains to be clarified whether art 28 EC prohibits a member state from prescribing that, where an overall proportion of reusable drinks packaging in the country of 72% is not reached, the economic operators in the sectors in which the proportion of reusable packaging is below the level set in 1991 are to lose the possibility of exemption from the obligation to charge a deposit on non-reusable bottles, to accept their return and repay the deposit and to recover them, by participating in a comprehensive packaging and packaging waste management system.

11 I do not know whether Germany is one of those countries.

A—The observations submitted

43. The claimant companies maintain that the German scheme providing for a reusable packaging quota is a measure having equivalent effect to a quantitative restriction which indirectly hinders intra-Community trade and is not justified on grounds of environmental protection. The fixing of a maximum of 28% for non-reusable packaging in Germany makes it difficult for the claimants to increase their exports to that country; to this must be added the higher price of drinks in non-reusable packaging, owing to the higher amount of the deposit<sup>12</sup>, which encourages the consumption of products in reusable packaging—by definition, of national origin—and the additional labelling required because of the compulsory deposit, which constitutes partitioning of the market. The Austrian, French and Netherlands governments concur with this view.

44. Land Baden-Württemberg and the German government contend that art 28 EC does not apply in the main proceedings. First, art 5 of Directive 94/62 has exhaustively harmonised the use and promotion of reusable packaging and, second, the quota scheme in respect of reusable packaging and the deposit, return and recovery obligation are merely selling arrangements which do not affect the characteristics of the packaging and which apply equally, in fact and in law, to the sale of domestic and imported products. If the legislation under consideration were a barrier to trade, its retention would be justified by the need to satisfy overriding requirements of environmental protection. The Italian government endorses these views.

45. According to the Commission, the question turns not so much on the mere revocation of comprehensive management systems in force up to a certain time, as on the transition from the old system to the new, in the light of the circumstances of the transition and the detailed rules of the two systems<sup>13</sup>. Domestic legislation applicable without distinction to drinks produced in Germany and imported drinks is at issue, and the barriers to the free movement of goods within the Community which the disparities may create must be accepted, because they are justified by overriding requirements of environmental protection. The Commission adds that the member states have to ensure that the transition between the existing comprehensive collection and management system and the new deposit, return and recovery system does not disproportionately hinder that freedom and avoids discrimination against imported products.

<sup>12</sup> According to the information they provide, the purchase of a can of beer carries a deposit of 25 cents; if the same drink is bought in a reusable bottle, it is only necessary to leave 8 cents.

<sup>13</sup> After the end of the written procedure, the Court of Justice asked the Commission for clarification on this point. In its reply, which was lodged at the Registry on 16 January 2004, it explains that, under the second subparagraph of art 7(1) of Directive 94/62, the transition between the old system and the new must occur only when the latter is operational.

a B—The reply to the question

46. It is necessary to consider, first, the applicability of art 28 EC in the present instance, because this has given rise to a difference of views among the parties who have submitted observations in these proceedings for a preliminary ruling.

b

1. The scope of the harmonisation effected by Directive 94/62

47. I do not agree with the parties who claim that art 5 of Directive 94/62 has completely harmonised the use and promotion of reusable packaging.

c

48. In the opinion delivered in European Commission v Denmark<sup>14</sup>, which concerned national legislation prohibiting the importation of beer and carbonated soft drinks in cans, I had the opportunity to express my views on the scope of the harmonisation undertaken by Directive 94/62 in the field. In that case, the packaging satisfied all the basic conditions set out in Annex II to the directive, so that the prohibition was clearly contrary to art 18, which establishes the freedom to place packaging on the market in any of the member states. I argued that national measures on the management of packaging and packaging waste had been harmonised when the directive was adopted. In such circumstances, according to the case law, if the national legislation is compatible with the directive, it cannot be subject to a review of its compatibility with the primary legislation governing the free movement of goods<sup>15</sup>.

d

e

49. However, art 5 of Directive 94/62, which allows member states to promote re-use systems, and requires them to do so in accordance with the Treaty, is an imprecise provision, the wording of which gives no indication as to the manner in which the national authorities are empowered to act or the direction that they may take. Re-use, that is to say, any operation by which packaging is refilled and used for the same purpose for which it was conceived, is defined in art 3(5), a provision which affords no clarification for these purposes, so that it cannot be stated that the directive has harmonised the promotion of the use of reusable packaging.

f

50. It is therefore necessary—in order to judge these measures—to refer to the primary legislation as a whole, and not only to the principles governing the free movement of goods. When public authorities grant, for example, subsidies or aid to encourage research and the development of investment for converting or improving packaging plants, for manufacturing reusable packaging or for establishing activities to promote re-use, and when they adopt measures of an economic, financial or fiscal nature, they must observe the rules on state aid and competition, just as they have to comply with the Treaty provisions on tax matters.

g

h

Furthermore, if there is evidence that the decisions made by a member state to promote re-use systems, even if they do not actually prohibit imports, constitute restrictions on the free movement of goods, they must be examined in the light of art 28 EC and art 30 EC (formerly art 36 of the EC Treaty), because it is clear that, under art 18 of Directive 94/62, member states are not to impede the placing on the market of packaging which satisfies the essential requirements set out in Annex II to the directive, which have been the subject of harmonisation. There are, however, more subtle ways in which the state may act in order to bring about the same result. a

i

<sup>14</sup> Case C-246/99 [2002] ECR I-6943 (paras 18–41). The action was ultimately abandoned.

<sup>15</sup> See R v Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, ex p Hedley Lomas (Ireland) Ltd Case C-5/94 [1996] All ER (EC) 493, [1996] ECR I-2553 (para 18) and European Commission v Germany Case C-102/96 [1998] ECR I-6871 (paras 21, 22).

51. In support of its argument that art 28 EC is not applicable in this case, the German government also pleads<sup>16</sup> the judgment of the Court of Justice in DaimlerChrysler AG v Land Baden-Württemberg<sup>17</sup>, para 44 of which stated that the use in art 4(3)(a)(i) of Council Regulation (EEC) 259/93<sup>18</sup> of the expression 'in accordance with the Treaty' could not be construed as meaning that a national measure that satisfied the requirements of that provision had to be subject to a review of its compatibility with the primary legislation on the free movement of goods. b

52. There are various reasons why, in my view, this argument put forward by the defendant is unlikely to succeed. First, the court completed that finding in the following paragraph of the judgment, adding that that expression likewise does not mean that all national measures restricting the shipments of waste referred to in art 4(3)(a)(i) of Regulation 259/93 must be systematically presumed to be compatible with Community law solely because they are intended to implement one or more of the principles referred to in that provision. Instead, in addition to being compatible with the regulation, such national measures must also comply with the rules or general principles of the Treaty to which no direct reference is made in the legislation adopted in the field of waste shipments. The same assessment appears in the judgment in Deutscher Apothekerverband eV v 0800 DocMorris NV<sup>19</sup>, para 64 of which states that a national measure in a sphere which has been the subject of exhaustive harmonisation at Community level must be assessed in the light of the harmonising measure and not of the primary legislation<sup>20</sup>, even though the power conferred on member states by art 14(1) of European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 97/7<sup>21</sup> must be exercised with due regard for the Treaty, as is expressly stated in that provision<sup>22</sup>. c
d
e

53. Secondly, in the DaimlerChrysler case the relevant Community legislation was a regulation which, by definition, as well as constituting a measure of general application binding in its entirety and directly applicable within the territory of the Union, is more specific than a directive, whose provisions are incorporated by the member states into their respective national legal orders. It is true that the wording used in Regulation 249/93 and in Directive 94/62 to refer to the Treaty is the same. However, there is a great difference between the content of art 4(3)(a)(i) of the regulation and art 5 of the directive; whereas the former contains the principles governing the member states and the specific measures which they may adopt, the latter merely states that such measures have to favour reusable packaging without harming the environment. f
g

---

16 In its written observations it refers to points 15–21 of the defence and to points 9–11 of the rejoinder in European Commission v Germany Case C-463/01 (2004) Transcript (opinion), 6 May, (2004) Transcript (judgment), 14 December. h

17 Case C-324/99 [2001] ECR I-9897.

18 On the supervision and control of shipments of waste within, into and out of the European Community (OJ 1993 L30 p 1).

19 Case C-322/01 [2003] ECR I-14887. i

20 See Criminal proceedings against Vanacker Case C-37/92 [1993] ECR I-4947 (para 9) and the DaimlerChrysler case, cited in footnote 17, above (para 32).

21 On the protection of consumers in respect of distance contracts (OJ 1997 L144 p 19).

22 This provision allows member states to introduce or maintain, in the area covered by the directive, more stringent provisions, compatible with the Treaty, to ensure a higher level of consumer protection.

a 54. There is no doubt that the Community legislature approves of actions of national authorities favouring packaging re-use systems which indirectly result in the avoidance of waste, provided that, whether they are of an economic, financial, fiscal or other nature, they do not interfere with the proper functioning of the internal market.

b 55. I therefore consider that art 5 of Directive 94/62, in itself, is not specific enough for it to be assessed on the basis of that provision whether provisions adopted by member states to promote packaging re-use systems that do not harm the environment are compatible with Community law, and it is not possible to complement it by referring to other provisions in the same legislation. The reference made by art 5 to the Treaty as a whole makes it possible to review the compatibility of those national provisions with the primary legislation on the free movement of goods.

2. Nature of the contested legislation: a measure having an effect equivalent to a quantitative restriction on imports or simply selling arrangements

d 56. The provisions at issue are: para 8(1) of the Packaging Regulation, according to which a distributor of drinks in non-reusable packaging must charge the customer a deposit and return it to him when he returns the empty packaging; and para 9(2), which suspends that measure if the undertaking responsible participates in a comprehensive management system and provided that the proportion of reusable packaging in Germany does not fall below 72%. If that threshold is crossed, the deposit, return and recovery obligation comes into effect in respect of drinks for which the percentage of reusable packaging is below that achieved in 1991. Apparently, this method of graduated control was accepted by the economic operators concerned, who were committed to ensuring that the rate of non-polluting reusable drinks packaging did not fall below the level achieved at that time.

f According to Germany, the aim of these provisions is to promote the use of reusable packaging. In my view, this legislation makes it difficult to market in Germany drinks packaged by their producers in other member states in non-reusable bottles.

57. The reasons for which I take this view are as follows.

g 58. First, art 7 of Directive 94/62 requires the member states to adopt the measures necessary to introduce systems for the return or collection of used packaging and packaging waste, and specifies that the systems have to be open to the participation of the economic operators affected. Under that provision, the national authorities may choose, for non-reusable drinks packaging, between making it subject to deposit, return and recovery or allowing it to be collected, by means of a comprehensive management system, from the consumer's home or near the place in which the distributor operates. However, the fact that in a country the continuation of the second option is made conditional on the overall volume of reusable bottles on the national market not falling below a specific proportion is, without a doubt, a source of legal uncertainty for the economic operators marketing their products in non-reusable packaging because, as long as the rate is kept above the fixed threshold, the undertakings operate year after year with the fear that they will not manage to reach that percentage, in which case, if, in the corresponding sector, the 1991 rate is not achieved either, they will have to arrange, in a very short space of time, to charge a deposit throughout the whole distribution chain.

This is a rule which, first, creates uncertainty for operators who have opted to participate in a comprehensive system to manage packaging and packaging waste, because they do not know how long they can continue under the same conditions and, second, encourages them, in order to avoid that instability, to abandon that more comfortable alternative and charge a deposit on non-reusable packaging or use reusable packaging. Furthermore, there is the dissuasive effect which the rules are likely to have on those who are thinking of introducing their mineral water in Germany. a
b

59. It must be added that undertakings excluded from the option proposed in para 9(1) of the Packaging Regulation where the proportion of reusable packaging falls below the prescribed minimum could return to that option if the use of reusable packaging rises again. If the aim of those rules is to promote reusable bottles, it does not make much sense to allow producers, when the proportion exceeds 72%, to use non-reusable bottles again, with the likely consequence that the percentage will fall again. It seems to me that the decision which undertakings take as to the type of packaging to use is sufficiently important for legislation of that kind not to make it very uncertain for undertakings which choose to enter the German market that the decision will continue to have effect. c
d

60. Secondly, art 7 of Directive 94/62 puts return and collection systems and re-use and recovery systems, including recycling systems, on an equal footing, the only proviso being that they should make it possible to achieve the objectives laid down. There is therefore no reason, if it is sought to promote one system, to prevent economic operators from participating temporarily in another because the prescribed proportion has not been reached. e

61. Thirdly, the contested German legislation, although it applies to national operators and foreign operators in the same way, has a detrimental effect on the latter in particular. Drinks undertakings which intend to export part of their production tend to bottle it in non-reusable packaging because it costs less: if the reusable bottles are made of glass, they weigh more, which means higher fuel consumption and greater tonnage for transportation; furthermore, non-reusable packaging does not have to be taken back to its country of origin and the cost is halved, because the capacity of the returning vehicle may be used to carry other goods, and there is also no need to wash and sterilise bottles. The proof lies in the fact that, in practice, drinks producers from other member states use a considerably higher proportion of plastic packaging than German producers. In that regard, the Commission refers to a survey carried out by the Gesellschaft für Verpackungsmarktforschung in June 2001 to show that, in 1999, German producers of natural mineral water bottled 90% of their water in reusable packaging and the remaining 10% in non-reusable bottles, whereas 71% of exports to Germany were in non-reusable packaging. The claimants in the main proceedings state that, in the same year, 90% of imported drinks were sold in non-reusable packaging, whereas only 26% of drinks produced in Germany were sold in such packaging. f
g
h

62. There is another point which I think is important: in order to reach the German market, the distance which foreign drinks have to be transported is, as a rule, greater than that of drinks produced in Germany. It is true that there are exceptions, because there are no doubt producers in other member states near the border with Germany; furthermore, some German producers cover many kilometres to reach all the distribution points, although they can avoid sending back empty packaging over long distances by participating in a re-use system, if they work with standardised bottles. I do not think it is realistic to suggest to i a foreign undertakings that they should stop using the packaging that they use in all other countries and adopt that officially approved for German undertakings, particularly bearing in mind that, in some cases, the packaging is of a distinctive nature and its graphic representation has been registered as a trade mark<sup>23</sup>.

b 63. In short, the contested legislation establishes specific conditions concerning the marketing of drinks in Germany, which are linked to percentages fixed arbitrarily, which ultimately depend on the preferences of consumers and which the economic operators can affect only if they agree to abandon non-reusable packaging and use reusable packaging. I do not think that the fact that, between 1994 and 2000, imports from other states increased is conclusive because, had it not been for those rules, the increase might have been greater.

c 64. Nor do I agree that paras 8(1) and 9(2) of the German regulation at issue constitute merely selling arrangements, even though they apply without distinction to drinks bottled in Germany and to imported drinks. In the judgment in Criminal proceedings against Keck<sup>24</sup>, the court distinguishes between d the provisions relating to the characteristics of the product and those concerning the selling arrangements in order to specify those rules which, while affecting nationals and non-nationals equally, cause barriers which make them measures of equivalent effect prohibited by art 28 EC.

e In that decision, it confirmed that, in the absence of harmonisation of legislation, obstacles to free movement of goods which are the consequence of applying, to goods coming from other member states where they are lawfully manufactured and marketed, rules that lay down requirements to be met by such goods constitute measures of equivalent effect, and that this is so even if those rules apply to all products without distinction, unless their application can be justified by a public interest objective taking precedence over the free movement of goods<sup>25</sup>.

f 65. The court then stated, contrary to what it had previously decided, that national provisions restricting or prohibiting certain selling arrangements are not such as to hinder directly or indirectly, actually or potentially, trade between member states within the meaning of Procureur du Roi v Dassonville<sup>26</sup>, so long as those provisions apply to all traders operating within the national territory and so long as they affect in the same manner, in law and in fact, the g marketing of domestic products and of those from other member states.

It added that, provided that those conditions are fulfilled, rules of that kind are not such as to prevent the access of products from another member state to the market or to impede access any more than they impede the access of domestic products. Such rules therefore fall outside the scope of art 28 EC.

h

i 23 See the judgment in Henkel KGaA Case C-218/01 (2003) Transcript (opinion), 14 January, (2004) Transcript (judgment), 12 February. The Court of First Instance has given judgment in Deutsche SiSi-Werke GmbH & Co Betriebs KG v Office for Harmonisation in the Internal Market (Trade Marks and Designs) Joined cases T-146-153/02 (2004) Transcript (judgment), 28 January, concerning the refusal to register as a three-dimensional mark a form of drinks packaging consisting in a stand-up pouch.

24 Joined cases C-267/91 and C-268/91 [1993] ECR I-6097. See M López Escudero 'La jurisprudencia sobre la prohibición de las medidas de efecto equivalente tras la sentencia Keck y Mithouard', in Gaceta Jurídica de la CE y de la Competencia, D-28, pp 47-94.

25 See Rewe-Zentral AG v Bundesmonopolverwaltung für Branntwein Case 120/78 [1979] ECR 649 (the Cassis de Dijon case) and Keck's case, cited above (para 15).

26 Case 8/74 [1974] ECR 837.

66. Since that judgment, in order to decide whether art 28 EC prevails over legislation which applies without distinction to domestic and imported products, it is necessary to distinguish rules that lay down requirements to be met by such goods (such as those relating to designation, form, size, weight, composition, presentation, labelling, packaging) from those designed to govern the arrangements for selling them. a

67. Since giving judgment in 1993 in Keck's case<sup>27</sup>, where it examined the prohibition in France against resale at a loss, the Court of Justice has considered the following, for example, to be selling arrangements: a rule of professional conduct, laid down by a professional body, which prohibits pharmacists from advertising outside the pharmacy quasi-pharmaceutical goods which they are authorised to sell<sup>28</sup>; the laying down of a maximum number of opening hours and periods of compulsory closure for shops<sup>29</sup>; the obligation not to open retail outlets on Sundays<sup>30</sup>; a rule which reserves the sale of processed milk for infants solely to pharmacies<sup>31</sup>; a distribution system which reserves the retail sale of tobacco products to outlets authorised by the state<sup>32</sup>; a rule prohibiting the broadcasting of televised advertisements for the distribution sector<sup>33</sup>; a prohibition against any sale which yields only a very low profit margin<sup>34</sup>; an outright ban on advertising aimed at children less than 12 years of age and on misleading advertising<sup>35</sup>; a prohibition on producers and importers of alcoholic drinks in a state directing any advertising messages at consumers<sup>36</sup>; and legislation which provides traders may not make sales on rounds in a given administrative district, unless they also pursue their commercial activity at a permanent establishment situated in that administrative district, where they offer for sale the same goods as they do on rounds<sup>37</sup>. b
c
d
e

68. In the light of these examples, it is difficult to maintain that the German provisions contain merely selling arrangements, since the pressure they put on producers is directly related to the type of packaging in which the goods are marketed and they therefore form part of the measures relating to the characteristics of the products. f

69. For the reasons given, I consider that the rules contained in paras 8(1) and 9(2) of the Packaging Regulation constitute a measure having an equivalent effect to a quantitative restriction, which is prohibited under art 28 EC. g

27 Cited in footnote 24, above.

28 See Hünermund v Landesapothekerkammer Baden-Württemberg Case C-292/92 [1993] ECR I-6787.

29 See Netherlands v Tankstation 't Heukske vof Joined cases C-401/92 and C-402/92 [1994] ECR I-2199.

30 See Punto Casa SpA v Sindaco del Comune di Capena and Comune di Capena Joined cases C-69/93 and C-258/93 [1994] ECR I-2355. h

31 See European Commission v Greece Case C-391/92 [1995] ECR I-1621.

32 See Criminal proceedings against Banchero Case C-387/93 [1995] ECR I-4663.

33 See Société d'importation Édouard Leclerc-Siplec v TFI Publicité SA Case C-412/93 [1995] All ER (EC) 343, [1995] ECR I-179.

34 See Groupeement National des Negociants en Pommes de Terre de Belgique (Belgapom) v ITM Belgium SA Case C-63/94 [1995] ECR I-2467.

35 See Konsumentombudsmannen (KO) v De Agostini (Svenska) Förlag AB, Konsumentombudsmannen (KO) v TV-Shop i Sverige AB Joined cases C-34-36/95 [1997] All ER (EC) 687, [1997] ECR I-3843. i

36 See Konsumentombudsmannen (KO) v Gourmet International Products AB Case C-405/98 [2001] All ER (EC) 308, [2001] ECR I-1795.

37 See Schutzverband gegen Unlauteren Wettbewerb v TK-Heimdienst Sass GmbH Case C-254/98 [2000] ECR I-151.

a 3. The protection of the environment in Germany as justification for the contested legislation

70. According to the settled case law of the Court of Justice, national legislation which restricts or is liable to restrict intra-Community trade may be justified by considerations of public health and environmental protection of the kind relied upon by the German government<sup>38</sup>. However, in that case, it must be proportionate to the objectives pursued and those objectives must not be attainable by measures which are less restrictive of such trade<sup>39</sup>.

b 71. I am not persuaded that it is necessary, in order to protect the environment, to impose the rule that, every time the proportion of reusable packaging in Germany falls below 72%, undertakings lose the possibility of exemption from charging a deposit on non-reusable packaging by participating in a packaging and packaging waste management system if, in the sector in which they operate, the rate of reusable packaging does not reach the 1991 level.

c 72. First, it is not stated why 72% of the reusable packaging in circulation in the country is preferable, from an ecological point of view, to 60%, 70% or 80%, for example. Nor do I know the reasons of environmental protection for which the results achieved in 1991 should have been crystallised for the future, without allowing for adjustment factors according to the conduct and preferences of economic operators and consumers. It must be acknowledged that, if in that year the proportion of reusable bottles of mineral water was 91·33%, the margin available to producers bottling in non-reusable containers, in order to free themselves from the obligation to charge a deposit, under a comprehensive management system, is minimal. The same may be said of beer producers, with a limit of 82·16%, and of producers of carbonated drinks, whose quota is 73·72%, since it is mainly foreign producers who use that kind of packaging.

d As is well known, the Court of Justice found, in the judgment in Commission v Denmark<sup>40</sup>, that a restriction of the quantity of products which could be marketed by importers was disproportionate to the objective pursued. In that case, the Danish legislation allowed producers to sell up to 3,000 hectolitres of beer and soft drinks a year in non-approved containers, provided that these were reusable and that a deposit was charged on each.

e 73. Second, if it really is a question of preventing, albeit indirectly, the production of packaging waste by promoting reusable packaging, I cannot see why it should be necessary, when the 72% rate is achieved again, to resurrect the possibility of exemption from charging a deposit on non-reusable bottles. Certainly, the charging of a deposit achieves a much higher percentage of return of empty packaging by the consumer who, furthermore, soon becomes resigned to paying it. Once that system has been put in place, which is not easy, I wonder about the advantages of going back, with the foreseeable consequence that the use of reusable packaging will go down again, causing fluctuation which may destabilise the habits of users, producers and distributors—not to mention the retrograde step that this entails for management of packaging waste and conservation of the countryside.

f 38 See Procureur de la République v Association de Défense des Brûleurs d'Huiles Usagées Case 240/83 [1985] ECR 531 and EC Commission v Denmark Case 302/86 [1988] ECR 4607 (para 9).

39 See the De Agostini and TV-Shop case, cited in footnote 35, above (para 45), Criminal proceedings against Franzén Case C-189/95 [1997] ECR I-5909 (para 75) and Aher-Waggon GmbH v Germany Case C-389/96 [1998] ECR I-4473 (paras 18–20).

40 Cited in footnote 38, above (para 21).

74. Third, in its eagerness to promote reusable bottles in order to protect the environment from the consequences of recycling and other recovery of non-reusable packaging waste, the German government does not appear to have taken account of other factors (such as the cleansing and sterilisation treatments applicable to the reusable packaging, fuel consumption, emissions into the atmosphere, and the wear and tear of communication routes, if the transport distance is over a certain number of kilometres, with the inevitable increase in traffic density and the risk of accidents) which counterbalance the alleged ecological advantages, so that non-reusable packaging may be an interesting alternative from an environmental point of view. a

75. Fourth, under art 7 of Directive 94/62, member states are to ensure that systems are set up to provide for the return or collection, and re-use or recovery, of packaging; these systems are to be open to the participation of the economic operators concerned, they are to apply to imported products under non-discriminatory conditions, and they are to be designed so as to avoid barriers to trade or distortions of competition, in conformity with the Treaty. I consider that there is no justification, once the collection systems are in place in a state, for the public authorities temporarily to prevent certain economic operators from competing, because the nationals of that state have changed their drink consumption habits and prefer to buy them in non-reusable bottles, and to continue to prevent them until the trend is reversed. This constitutes a restriction on the free movement of goods which is not in correct proportion to the insignificant advantages that it represents for the protection of the environment. In my view, Directive 94/62 contains sufficient devices to allow the German authorities to guarantee that protection by adopting sufficiently stable legislation which permits exporting undertakings to plan in the medium and long term the kind of packaging which is suitable for marketing mineral water in Germany. b
c
d
e

However, if they decide to extend the charging of a deposit to all non-reusable packaging, I agree with the Commission that an adequate number of places must be provided for returning the packaging and recovering the amount paid. Otherwise, since most imported drinks are sold in non-reusable packaging, there would be the risk of creating barriers to trade, and there would in addition be distortions of competition if, at the same time, the reusable bottles used by most domestic producers were returned under more favourable conditions. Nor would it be advisable to set up a large number of separate deposit systems, each one with its own requirements, which would not cover the whole of the territory, because that would make it difficult for foreign producers and importers of packaged drinks to enter the market, quite apart from the fact that small and medium-sized undertakings in the other member states would probably not have sufficient resources to adapt their packaging to satisfy those conditions. f
g
h

76. Finally, charging a deposit on non-reusable packaging does not appear to be a suitable way of promoting the use of reusable packaging. What is certainly achieved is that the buyer or any other person involved returns the empty packaging in order to recover the deposit, which is something, but, when faced with the need to pay for either kind of packaging, the consumer usually opts for the packaging he finds more convenient and not necessarily for the packaging which harms the environment less. i

77. It is clear from these arguments that the German legislation at issue cannot be justified by protection of the environment as an overriding a requirement restricting the application of art 28 EC, because it does not comply with the principle of proportionality.

78. Article 28 EC should therefore be interpreted as prohibiting a member state from providing that, where an overall proportion of reusable drinks packaging in the country of 72% is not reached, the economic operators in the sectors in which the proportion of reusable packaging is below the level set in 1991 are to lose the possibility of exemption from the obligation to charge a deposit on non-reusable bottles, to accept their return and repay the deposit, and to recover them, by participating in a comprehensive packaging and packaging waste management system.

c
X—CONCLUSION

79. In the light of the foregoing considerations, I propose that the Court of Justice give the following reply to the questions referred for a preliminary ruling by the Verwaltungsgericht Stuttgart:

d (1) Article 1(2) of European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 94/62 (on packaging and packaging waste) merely gives priority to the prevention of the production of packaging waste, and does not give precedence to reusable packaging, so that a member state cannot use that provision as a basis for favouring the re-use of drinks packaging over recycling and other forms of recovery.

e (2) Article 18 of Directive 94/62 is not the appropriate provision for analysing the effects which the application of rules such as paras 8(1) and 9(2) of the German Packaging Regulation may have on the free movement of goods.

f (3) Article 7 of Directive 94/62 does not grant producers and distributors of drinks in non-reusable packaging a right to participate in an existing return and management system, when the national authorities replace it with a deposit system intended to ensure that the empty packaging is taken back, in order to improve selective recovery and contain uncontrolled dumping.

g (4) Article 28 EC prohibits a member state from providing that, where an overall proportion of reusable drinks packaging in the country of 72% is not reached, the economic operators in the sectors in which the proportion of reusable packaging is below the level set in 1991 are to lose the possibility of exemption from the obligation to charge a deposit on non-reusable bottles, to accept their return and repay the deposit, and to recover them, by participating in a comprehensive packaging and packaging waste management system.

h
14 December 2004. The COURT OF JUSTICE (Grand Chamber) delivered the following judgment.

i 1. The reference for a preliminary ruling relates to the interpretation of European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 94/62 (on packaging and packaging waste) (OJ 1994 L365 p 10) and art 28 EC (formerly art 30 of the EC Treaty).

2. The reference was submitted in proceedings brought by Radlberger Getränkegesellschaft mbH & Co and S Spitz KG, which are Austrian drinks producers, against Land Baden-Württemberg.

LEGAL CONTEXT

Directive 94/62

3. According to art 1(1), Directive 94/62 aims to harmonise national measures concerning the management of packaging and packaging waste in order, on the one hand, to prevent any impact thereof on the environment of all member states as well as of third countries or to reduce such impact, thus providing a high level of environmental protection, and, on the other hand, to ensure the functioning of the internal market and to avoid obstacles to trade and distortion and restriction of competition within the Community.

4. As stated in art 1(2), the directive lays down—

‘measures aimed, as a first priority, at preventing the production of packaging waste and, as additional fundamental principles, at reusing packaging, at recycling and other forms of recovering packaging waste and, hence, at reducing the final disposal of such waste.’

5. Article 5 of the directive provides:

‘Member States may encourage reuse systems of packaging, which can be reused in an environmentally sound manner, in conformity with the Treaty.’

6. Article 7 provides:

‘1. Member States shall take the necessary measures to ensure that systems are set up to provide for:

(a) the return and/or collection of used packaging and/or packaging waste from the consumer, other final user, or from the waste stream in order to channel it to the most appropriate waste management alternatives;

(b) the reuse or recovery including recycling of the packaging and/or packaging waste collected, in order to meet the objectives laid down in this Directive.

These systems shall be open to the participation of the economic operators of the sectors concerned and to the participation of the competent public authorities. They shall also apply to imported products under non-discriminatory conditions, including the detailed arrangements and any tariffs imposed for access to the systems, and shall be designed so as to avoid barriers to trade or distortions of competition in conformity with the Treaty.

2. The measures referred to in paragraph 1 shall form part of a policy covering all packaging and packaging waste and shall take into account, in particular, requirements regarding the protection of environmental and consumer health, safety and hygiene; the protection of the quality, the authenticity and the technical characteristics of the packed goods and materials used; and the protection of industrial and commercial property rights.’

7. Article 18 is worded as follows:

‘Member States shall not impede the placing on the market of their territory of packaging which satisfies the provisions of this Directive.’

National legislation

8. The Verordnung über die Vermeidung und Verwertung von Verpackungsabfällen (Regulation on the Avoidance and Recovery of Packaging

a Waste) of 21 August 1998 (BGBl 1998 I, p 2379; the VerpackV) prescribes various measures to avoid and reduce the environmental impact of packaging waste. The VerpackV was intended, in particular, to transpose Directive 94/62 and replaced the Verordnung über die Vermeidung von Verpackungsabfällen (Regulation on the Avoidance of Packaging Waste) of 12 June 1991 (BGBl 1991 I, p 1234).

b 9. Paragraph 6(1) and (2) of the VerpackV lays down the following obligations:

c '1. Distributors shall accept the return of used empty sales packaging from final consumers, free of charge, at, or in the immediate vicinity of, the actual point of delivery, recover the packaging in accordance with the requirements of point 1 of Annex I and fulfil the requirements of point 2 of Annex I. The recovery requirements may also be satisfied by reusing the packaging or passing it on to distributors or producers under subparagraph 2. The distributor must draw the attention of the private final consumer, by means of clearly visible, legible notices, to the fact that the packaging may be returned in accordance with the first sentence. The obligation under the first sentence applies only to packaging of the type, form and size and to packaging of goods that the distributor carries in his range. For distributors with a sales area of less than 200 square metres, the obligation to take back returned packaging applies only to packaging for brands which the distributor puts into circulation. In the case of a mail order business, the taking back of returned packaging shall be ensured by means of suitable return facilities within reasonable distance of the final consumer. The possibility of returning the packaging is to be referred to in the consignment and in catalogues. Where sales packaging does not come from private final consumers, the parties may make other arrangements regarding the place of return and the allocation of costs. Where distributors do not fulfil the obligations under the first sentence by accepting the return of packaging at the point of delivery, they shall ensure compliance with them by means of a system as provided for by subparagraph 3. In derogation from the first sentence, the recovery requirements in Paragraph 4(2) shall apply mutatis mutandis to distributors of packaging who cannot participate in a system under subparagraph 3.

g 2. Producers and distributors shall accept free of charge at the place of actual delivery packaging returned to distributors under subparagraph 1, recover the packaging in accordance with the requirements of point 1 of Annex I and fulfil the requirements of point 2 of Annex I. The recovery requirements may also be satisfied by reusing the packaging. The obligations under the first sentence apply only to packaging of the type, form and size and to packaging of goods that the particular producer or distributor puts into circulation. The eighth, ninth and tenth sentences of subparagraph 1 shall apply mutatis mutandis.'

i 10. Under para 6(3), those obligations to take back and recover packaging may in principle also be met by participation of the producer or distributor in a global system for the collection of used sales packaging. The competent Land authority has the task of determining that the system fulfils the conditions imposed by the VerpackV with regard to its coverage rate.

11. By virtue of para 8(1) of the VerpackV, distributors who put liquids for consumption into circulation in non-reusable drinks packaging are required to charge the purchaser a deposit of at least €0.25 including value added tax per item of packaging. Where the net volume exceeds 1.5 litres, the deposit is to be at least €0.50 including value added tax. The deposit is to be charged by each further distributor at every stage in the chain of distribution until sale to the final consumer. The deposit is to be repaid when the packaging is returned under para 6(1) and (2) of the VerpackV. a

12. In accordance with para 9(1) of the VerpackV, this mandatory deposit is not to apply where the producer or distributor is exempt from the obligation to accept return of the packaging because he participates in a global collection system as referred to in para 6(3). b

13. However, para 9(2) of the VerpackV prescribes circumstances in which, for certain drinks, recourse to para 6(3) ceases to be possible. Paragraph 9(2) states as follows: c

‘If, for beer, mineral water (including spring water, table water and spa water), carbonated soft drinks, fruit juices ... and wine ... the combined proportion of drinks in reusable packaging falls below 72% in the calendar year in the geographical area to which this regulation applies, a new survey of the relevant proportions of reusable packaging shall be carried out for the 12 months following publication of the failure to achieve the required proportions. If this shows that the proportion of reusable packaging in Federal territory is below the proportion laid down under the first sentence, the decision under Paragraph 6(3) shall be deemed to be revoked throughout Federal territory in respect of the drinks categories for which the reusable proportion determined in 1991 is not achieved, with effect from the first day of the sixth calendar month following publication in accordance with subparagraph 3 ...’ d

14. In accordance with para 9(3) of the VerpackV, the German government is to publish each year the relevant proportions, as referred to in para 9(2), of drinks packaged in ecologically sound drinks packaging. Under para 9(4) the competent authority, following an application or on its own initiative, is to make a new determination pursuant to para 6(3) where the relevant proportion of drinks in such packaging is again achieved following a revocation. e

THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING f

15. The claimants in the main proceedings export carbonated soft drinks, fruit juices, other non-carbonated drinks and table water to Germany, in non-reusable recoverable packaging. With a view to recovery of that packaging, they joined the global waste collection system operated by the company Der Grüne Punkt—Duales System Deutschland AG and on that basis were exempted from the obligation to charge the deposit laid down in para 8(1) of the VerpackV for drinks distributed in Germany in non-reusable packaging. g

16. The German government announced on 28 January 1999 that in 1997 the proportion of reusable drinks packaging fell below 72% for the first time, namely to 71.33%. Since over two consecutive periods, namely between February 1999 and January 2000 and between May 2000 and April 2001, this proportion remained below 72% throughout Federal territory, on 2 July 2002 the government announced pursuant to para 9(3) of the VerpackV that from 1 January 2003 a mandatory deposit would be charged on mineral water, beer and soft drinks. Under the VerpackV, the claimants in the main proceedings would therefore be required from that date to charge the deposit prescribed in h a para 8(1) thereof on most of their packaging for drinks distributed in Germany and then to accept the return of, and recover, the empty packaging.

b 17. On 23 May 2002 the claimants in the main proceedings brought an action against Land Baden-Württemberg before the Verwaltungsgericht Stuttgart (Administrative Court, Stuttgart) in which they submit that the rules laid down in the VerpackV on quotas for reusable packaging and the related deposit and return obligations are contrary to arts 1(1) and (2), 5, 7 and 18 of Directive 94/62 and art 28 EC. The Federal Republic of Germany was joined as a party to the proceedings.

c 18. The national court states that, if one proceeds on the basis of the interpretation put forward by the claimants according to which art 1(2) of Directive 94/62 presumes that the re-use of packaging and its recovery rank equally, the question arises as to whether the system laid down in the VerpackV is compatible with the directive inasmuch as that system makes it more difficult to put non-reusable packaging into circulation when the proportion of reusable packaging falls below a certain threshold. The national court observes that producers established in another member state are exposed to higher costs than d German producers if they decide to market their drinks in reusable packaging. It points out that, in the claimants' submission, even when the obligation to charge a deposit is suspended the German legislation affects the situation of producers established in another member state because German distributors tend to exclude products with non-reusable packaging from their range of drinks in order that the proportion of reusable packaging does not fall e below 72%.

19. In those circumstances, the Verwaltungsgericht Stuttgart decided to stay proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

f '(1) On a proper construction of Article 1(2) of ... Directive 94/62 ... are Member States prohibited from favouring systems for reusing drinks packaging over recoverable non-reusable packaging by removing, where a Federal target for reusable packaging of 72% is not reached, the possibility of exemption from a return, management and deposit obligation laid down in respect of empty non-reusable drinks packaging by participation in a return and management system, so far as concerns drinks sectors in g which the proportion of reusable packaging has fallen below the level determined in 1991?

h (2) On a proper construction of Article 18 of ... Directive 94/62 ... are Member States prohibited from impeding the placing of drinks in recoverable non-reusable packaging on the market by removing, where a Federal target for reusable packaging of 72% is not reached, the possibility of exemption from a return, management and deposit obligation laid down in respect of empty non-reusable drinks packaging by participation in a return and management system, so far as concerns drinks sectors in which the proportion of reusable packaging has fallen below the level determined in 1991?

i (3) On a proper construction of Article 7 of ... Directive 94/62 ... do producers and distributors of drinks in recoverable non-reusable packaging have a right to participate in an existing return and management system for used drinks packaging, in order to meet a statutory obligation to charge a deposit on non-reusable drinks packaging and accept the return of used drinks packaging?

(4) On a proper construction of Article 28 EC are the Member States prohibited from adopting rules providing that where a Federal target for reusable drinks packaging of 72% is not reached, the possibility of exemption from a return, management and deposit obligation laid down in respect of empty non-reusable drinks packaging by participation in a return and management system is removed so far as concerns drinks sectors in which the proportion of reusable packaging has fallen below the level determined in 1991? a
b

THE REQUESTS TO REOPEN THE ORAL PROCEDURE

20. By letters received at the Court Registry on 14 and 17 June 2004 respectively, the German government and the defendant in the main proceedings requested the court to order the reopening of the oral procedure pursuant to art 61 of the Rules of Procedure. c

21. The German government submits in support of its request that the opinion delivered by the Advocate General on 6 May 2004 contains a series of matters which were not covered in the written or oral procedure and reveal a misappraisal of the arguments relied on by it before the court. In its request, the defendant in the main proceedings likewise maintains that the opinion broaches certain matters which were not debated and upon which the court has therefore not been sufficiently informed. d

22. The court may of its own motion, on a proposal from the Advocate General or at the request of the parties order the reopening of the oral procedure, in accordance with art 61 of its Rules of Procedure, if it considers that it lacks sufficient information or that the case must be dealt with on the basis of an argument which has not been debated between the parties (see Deutsche Post AG v Sievers Joined cases C-270/97 and C-271/97 [2000] ECR I-929 (para 30), Wouters v Algemene Raad van de Nederlandse Orde van Advocaten (Raad van de Balies van de Europese Gemeenschap intervening) Case C-309/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 193, [2002] ECR I-1577 (para 42), Philips Electronics NV v Remington Consumer Products Ltd Case C-299/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 634, [2002] ECR I-5475 (para 20) and Steckmann v Deutsches Patent- und Markenamt Case C-273/00 [2004] All ER (EC) 253, [2002] ECR I-11737 (para 22)). e
f

23. In the circumstances of this case, however, the court, after hearing the Advocate General, considers that it is in possession of all the facts necessary for it to answer the questions referred and that those facts have been the subject of argument presented before it. g

24. The requests of the German government and the defendant in the main proceedings seeking the reopening of the oral procedure must therefore be rejected. h

CONSIDERATION OF THE QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING Admissibility of the questions referred

25. The defendant in the main proceedings submits that the court must reject the questions referred for a preliminary ruling as inadmissible, given that the main action is inadmissible as it has been brought against Land Baden-Württemberg: the latter has no power of its own to adopt primary or secondary legislation in the matter and merely implements federal rules. In the defendant's submission, the action should have been brought against the federal state before the court with jurisdiction in this regard, namely the Verwaltungsgericht Berlin. In parallel proceedings a number of German administrative courts have already found similar actions inadmissible. i

- a 26. As to those submissions, it is not for the Court of Justice, given the allocation of functions between itself and the national courts, to determine whether the decision to refer has been taken in accordance with the rules of national law governing the organisation of courts and their procedure (see Eurico Italia Srl v Ente Nazionale Risi Joined cases C-332/92, C-333/92 and C-335/92 [1994] ECR I-711 (para 13), World Wildlife Fund (WWF) v Autonome Provinz Bozen Case C-435/97 [1999] ECR I-5613 (para 33) and Gozza v Università degli Studi di Padova Case C-371/97 [2000] ECR I-7881 (para 30)).
- b The court must abide by the decision from a court of a member state requesting a preliminary ruling in so far as it has not been overturned in any appeal procedures provided for by national law (see Reina v Landeskreditbank Baden-Württemberg Case 65/81 [1982] ECR 33 (para 7)).
- c 27. In the present case, it is apparent from the order for reference that the Verwaltungsgericht Stuttgart considers that the main action is at least partially admissible.
28. Nor is it in dispute that there is a direct connection between, first, the four questions referred for a preliminary ruling, which relate to the interpretation of arts 1, 7 and 18 of Directive 94/62 and art 28 EC and have been asked in order to enable the national court to assess whether the German legislation at issue is compatible with those provisions, and second, the subject matter of the main proceedings, which seek a declaration that the claimants are not required to comply with the obligations to charge a deposit on their non-reusable packaging and accept its return.
- d 29. It follows that the reference for a preliminary ruling is admissible.
- e

Question 1

30. By its first question, the national court essentially asks whether art 1(2) of Directive 94/62 precludes a member state from promoting systems for the re-use of packaging, by application of a system such as that laid down in paras 8(1) and 9(2) of the VerpackV.
- f 31. While art 1(2) of Directive 94/62 envisages as a 'first priority' measures aimed at preventing the production of packaging waste, it lists, as 'additional fundamental principles', reusing packaging, recycling and other forms of recovering packaging waste.
- g 32. The eighth recital in the preamble to the directive states that—'until scientific and technological progress is made with regard to recovery processes, reuse and recycling should be considered preferable in terms of environmental impact ... this requires the setting up in the Member States of systems guaranteeing the return of used packaging and/or packaging waste; life-cycle assessments should be completed as soon as possible to justify a clear hierarchy between reusable, recyclable and recoverable packaging ...'
- h 33. It follows from the foregoing that Directive 96/42 does not establish a hierarchy between the re-use of packaging and the recovery of packaging waste.
- i 34. However, art 5 of Directive 94/62 allows the member states to take measures designed to encourage systems for the re-use of packaging that can be re-used in an environmentally sound manner.
35. It is clear from the very wording of art 5 that such a policy of promoting the re-use of packaging is permitted only in so far as it is consistent with the Treaty.

36. Thus, measures taken by a member state pursuant to art 5 must comply not only with requirements that flow from the directive's other provisions, in particular art 7 to which the third question referred for a preliminary ruling relates, but also with obligations resulting from the provisions of the Treaty, in particular art 28 EC to which the fourth question referred for a preliminary ruling relates. a

37. The answer to the first question must therefore be that art 1(2) of Directive 94/62 does not preclude the member states from introducing measures designed to promote systems for the re-use of packaging. b

38. In view of the foregoing, it is appropriate to answer first the third and fourth questions referred for a preliminary ruling. c

Question 3

39. By its third question, the national court essentially asks whether art 7 of Directive 94/62 confers on producers and distributors of drinks in recoverable non-reusable packaging who are permitted to fulfil their deposit and return obligations by participating in a global packaging collection system the right to continue to participate in a global system of that kind in order to meet their legal obligations. d

40. Directive 94/62 requires the member states, in art 7(1), to take the necessary measures to ensure that systems are set up to provide for, first, the return and/or collection of used packaging and/or packaging waste and, second, the re-use or recovery of the packaging or packaging waste collected. Article 7(1) also states that those systems must be open to the participation of the economic operators of the sectors concerned and to the participation of the competent public authorities, apply to imported products under non-discriminatory conditions, and be designed so as to avoid barriers to trade or distortions of competition in conformity with the Treaty. e

41. Article 7(2) of the directive requires the measures referred to in art 7(1) to form part of a policy covering all packaging and packaging waste and states that those measures are to take into account, in particular, requirements regarding the protection of environmental and consumer health, safety and hygiene, the protection of the quality, the authenticity and the technical characteristics of the packed goods and materials used, and the protection of industrial and commercial property rights. f

42. Article 7 leaves it to the member states to choose, as regards non-reusable packaging, between a deposit and return system, on the one hand, and a global packaging collection system, on the other, or to opt for a combination of the two systems depending on the type of product, provided that the systems chosen are designed to channel packaging to the most appropriate waste management alternatives and form part of a policy covering all packaging and packaging waste. g

43. That provision does not confer on the producers and distributors concerned any right to continue to participate in a given packaging waste management system. h

44. Directive 94/62 does not prevent a member state from providing that amendments are to be made to packaging waste management systems set up in its territory so as to ensure that the most appropriate waste management alternative is adopted. i

45. While Directive 94/62 thus allows a member state to require the replacement, in the light of the circumstances, of a system for the collection of a packaging near the homes of consumers or points of sale with a deposit and return system, such replacement must however comply with certain conditions.

b 46. First, the new system must be equally appropriate for the purpose of attaining the objectives of Directive 94/62. In particular, where the new system is, as in the present case, a deposit and return system, the member state concerned must ensure that there are a sufficient number of return points so that consumers who have been charged a deposit when buying goods in non-reusable packaging can recover the deposit even if they do not go back to the initial place of purchase.

c 47. It should be noted in this connection that the first sentence of para 6(1) of the VerpackV provides that distributors are to accept the return of sales packaging free of charge at, or in the immediate vicinity of, the actual point of delivery ('am Ort der tatsächlichen Übergabe oder in dessen unmittelbarer Nähe'). While it is true that the following sentences of para 6(1) add certain details, in particular as regards the limitations on that obligation on the basis of the characteristics of the packaging concerned and on the basis of the sales area of the distributor concerned, the fact remains that the extent of the obligation to accept return does not appear to be unambiguous.

d 48. Second, the changeover to the new system must take place without a break and without jeopardising the ability of economic operators in the sectors concerned actually to participate in the new system as soon as it enters into force. Article 7(1) of Directive 94/62 obliges each member state to ensure that the producers and distributors concerned have access to a packaging waste management system at all times and without discrimination.

e 49. Therefore, a member state which replaces the existing packaging waste management system with another has the task of ensuring that the producers and distributors concerned have a reasonable period for the transition to the new system so that they can adapt their production methods and chains of distribution to the requirements of the new system.

f 50. The answer to the third question must therefore be that while art 7 of Directive 94/62 does not confer on the producers and distributors concerned any right to continue to participate in a given packaging waste management system, it precludes the replacement of a global system for the collection of packaging waste with a deposit and return system where the new system is not equally appropriate for the purpose of attaining the objectives of that directive or where the changeover to the new system does not take place without a break and without jeopardising the ability of economic operators in the sectors concerned actually to participate in the new system as soon as it enters into force.

g
h Question 4

i 51. By its fourth question, the national court essentially asks whether art 28 EC precludes national rules, such as those laid down in paras 8(1) and 9(2) of the VerpackV, under which the proportion of reusable packaging in the sector concerned determines whether producers and distributors using non-reusable packaging may fulfil their deposit, return and recovery obligations by participation in a global collection system.

The applicability of art 28 EC

52. In the German government's submission, there cannot be a conflict between art 28 EC and the national rules at issue given that, as regards the re-use of packaging, Directive 94/62, in particular arts 5, 9 and 18, has the aim and effect of harmonising completely the subject in question. a

53. In view of the fact that, where a sphere has been the subject of exhaustive harmonisation at Community level, any national measure relating thereto must be assessed in the light of the provisions of the harmonising measure and not those of the Treaty (see Criminal proceedings against Vanacker Case C-37/92 [1993] ECR I-4947 (para 9), DaimlerChrysler AG v Land Baden-Württemberg Case C-324/99 [2001] ECR I-9897 (para 32) and Deutscher Apothekerverband eV v 0800 DocMorris NV Case C-322/01 [2003] ECR I-14887 (para 64)), it must be determined whether the harmonisation brought about by Directive 94/62 precludes the compatibility of the national rules in question with art 28 EC from being examined. b

54. As regards the re-use of packaging, art 5 of Directive 94/62 does no more than allow the member states to encourage, in conformity with the Treaty, systems for the re-use of packaging that can be re-used in an environmentally sound manner. c

55. Apart from the definition of the concept of 're-use' of packaging, certain general provisions on measures to avoid packaging waste and the provisions relating to return, collection and recovery systems, set out in arts 3(5), 4 and 7 respectively, Directive 94/62 does not regulate, as regards member states which are disposed to exercise the power granted by art 5, the organisation of systems encouraging reusable packaging. d

56. In contrast to the position in respect of the marking and identification of packaging and the requirements on the composition of packaging and its capacity to be re-used or recovered, governed by arts 8 and 11 of Directive 94/62 and Annex II thereto, the organisation of national systems intended to encourage the re-use of packaging is therefore not the subject of complete harmonisation. e

57. Such systems can consequently be assessed on the basis of the Treaty provisions relating to the free movement of goods. f

58. Furthermore, art 5 of Directive 94/62 allows the member states to encourage systems for the re-use of packaging only 'in conformity with the Treaty'.

59. Inasmuch as art 18 of Directive 94/62 does no more than guarantee the free movement, in the territory of the member states, of packaging which complies with the requirements relating to its marking, composition and capacity to be re-used or recovered, that provision likewise does not preclude national packaging waste management systems from being assessed in the light of art 28 EC if they are liable to affect the conditions for marketing the products concerned. g

The existence of a barrier to trade

h

60. It must therefore be assessed whether art 28 EC precludes national rules, such as those at issue in the main proceedings, under which the ability of producers and distributors using non-reusable packaging to fulfil their deposit and return obligations by participation in a global collection system depends on changes in the overall proportion of drinks in non-reusable packaging on the German market and the proportion of the particular drinks concerned that are placed on the same market in such packaging. i

61. It should be noted, first, that such rules apply without distinction to national products and products from other member states and lay down the a same deposit and return requirements for producers established in other member states as for national producers.

b 62. Second, in contrast to the maximum level of drinks capable of being marketed in non-approved containers which was at issue in EC Commission v Denmark Case 302/86 [1988] ECR 4607, in the main proceedings the proportions do not limit the quantity of products which may be imported in a certain type of packaging. The VerpackV does not prohibit the marketing of products in non-reusable packaging beyond the proportions indicated, but provides merely that the exceeding of those proportions will result in a change in the management system for non-reusable packaging.

c 63. However, the fact remains that while paras 8(1) and 9(2) of the VerpackV admittedly apply to all producers and distributors operating in national territory, they do not affect the marketing of drinks produced in Germany and that of drinks from other member states in the same manner.

d 64. While a changeover from one packaging management system to another results, generally, in costs so far as concerns the marking or labelling of packaging, rules, such as those at issue in the main proceedings, which oblige producers and distributors using non-reusable packaging to replace their participation in a global collection system with a deposit and return system cause every producer and distributor using such packaging to incur additional costs connected with organisation of the taking back of packaging, the refunding of sums paid by way of deposit and any balancing of those sums between distributors.

e 65. It is not in dispute that producers established outside Germany use considerably more non-reusable packaging than German producers.

f 66. The national court observes that recourse to reusable packaging normally causes a drinks producer established in another member state to incur costs higher than those borne by a German producer, given that costs linked to organisation of a deposit system and to transport are greater if the producer is established at a certain distance from the points of sale.

g 67. It follows that the replacement, as regards non-reusable packaging, of a global packaging collection system with a deposit and return system is such as to hinder the placing on the German market of drinks imported from other member states (see to this effect, as regards reusable drinks packaging, Commission v Denmark, cited above (para 13)).

h 68. It is immaterial in this regard that the provisions in question envisage deposit and return obligations for non-reusable packaging and do not prohibit imports of drinks in such packaging and that it is, moreover, possible for producers to resort to reusable packaging. A measure capable of hindering imports must be classified as a measure having equivalent effect to a quantitative restriction even though the hindrance is slight and even though it is possible for the products to be marketed in other ways (see Criminal proceedings against Van de Haar Joined cases 177/82 and 178/82 [1984] ECR 1797 (para 14)).

i 69. In this context, it is not relevant to assert, as the German government does, that the increase of imports into Germany of natural mineral water in non-reusable packaging in respect of the period preceding the introduction of the deposit and return obligations demonstrates that there is no discrimination against drinks producers established in other member states. Even if that trend is observed on the German market, it cannot take away the fact that, for drinks producers established in other member states, paras 8 and 9 of the VerpackV constitute an obstacle to the marketing of their products in Germany.

70. Contrary to the submissions of the defendant in the main proceedings and the German government, paras 8 and 9 of the VerpackV cannot be treated as national provisions which restrict or prohibit certain 'selling arrangements' within the meaning of the judgment in Criminal proceedings against Keck joined cases C-267/91 and C-268/91 [1993] ECR I-6097 (para 16 et seq). a

71. The court has held that the need, resulting from the measures at issue, to alter the packaging or the labelling of imported products prevents those measures from concerning selling arrangements for the products within the meaning of the judgment in Keck's case (see Colim NV v Bigg's Continent Noord NV Case C-33/97 [1999] ECR I-3175 (para 37), European Commission v Spain Case C-12/00 [2003] ECR I-459 (para 76) and Morellato v Comune di Padova Case C-416/00 [2003] ECR I-9343 (para 29)). b

72. As noted in para 64 of the present judgment, the replacement of participation in a global collection system by the establishment of a deposit and return system obliges the producers concerned to alter certain information on their packaging. c

73. In any event, given that the provisions of the VerpackV do not affect the marketing of drinks produced in Germany and that of drinks from other member states in the same manner, they cannot fall outside the scope of art 28 EC (see Keck's case (paras 16, 17)). d

Justifications relating to protection of the environment

74. It must be examined next whether, as the defendant in the main proceedings and the German government assert, rules such as those laid down in paras 8(1) and 9(2) of the VerpackV can be justified by reasons relating to protection of the environment. e

75. In accordance with settled case law, national measures capable of hindering intra-Community trade may be justified by overriding requirements relating to protection of the environment provided that the measures in question are proportionate to the aim pursued (see Commission v Denmark (paras 6, 9) and Aher-Waggon GmbH v Germany Case C-389/96 [1998] ECR I-4473 (para 20)). f

76. The obligation to establish a deposit and return system for empty packaging is an indispensable element of a system intended to ensure that packaging is re-used (see Commission v Denmark (para 13)). g

77. With regard to non-reusable packaging, as the defendant in the main proceedings and the German government state, the establishment of a deposit and return system is liable to increase the proportion of empty packaging returned and results in more precise sorting of packaging waste, thus helping to improve its recovery. In addition, the charging of a deposit contributes to the reduction of waste in the natural environment since it encourages consumers to return empty packaging to the points of sale. h

78. Furthermore, in so far as the rules at issue in the main proceedings make the entry into force of a new packaging waste management system conditional on the proportion of reusable packaging on the German market, they create a situation where any increase in sales of drinks in non-reusable packaging on that market makes it more likely that there will be a change of system. Inasmuch as those rules thus encourage the producers and distributors concerned to have recourse to reusable packaging, they contribute towards reducing the amount of waste to be disposed of, which constitutes one of the general objectives of environmental protection policy. i a 79. However, in order for such rules to comply with the principle of proportionality, it must be ascertained not only whether the means which they employ are suitable for the purpose of attaining the desired objectives but also whether those means do not go beyond what is necessary for that purpose (see Safety Hi-Tech Srl v S & T Srl Case C-284/95 [1998] ECR I-4301 (para 57)).

b 80. In order for national rules to satisfy the latter test, they must allow the producers and distributors concerned, before the deposit and return system enters into force, to adapt their production methods and the management of non-reusable packaging waste to the requirements of the new system. While it is true that a member state may leave to those producers and distributors the task of setting up that system by organising the taking back of packaging, the refunding of sums paid by way of deposit and any balancing of those sums c between distributors, the member state in question must still ensure that, at the time when the packaging waste management system changes, every producer or distributor concerned can actually participate in an operational system.

d 81. Legislation, such as the VerpackV, that makes the establishment of a deposit and return system dependent on a packaging re-use rate, which is certainly advantageous from an ecological point of view, complies with the principle of proportionality only if, while encouraging the re-use of packaging, it gives the producers and distributors concerned a reasonable transitional period to adapt thereto and ensures that, at the time when the packaging waste management system changes, every producer or distributor concerned can e actually participate in an operational system.

82. It is for national courts to determine whether the change of packaging waste management system, such as the change provided for in paras 8(1) and 9(2) of the VerpackV, allows the producers and distributors concerned to participate in an operational system under the above-mentioned conditions.

f 83. Consequently, the answer to the fourth question must be that art 28 EC precludes national rules, such as those laid down in paras 8(1) and 9(2) of the VerpackV, when they announce that a global packaging waste collection system is to be replaced by a deposit and return system without the producers and distributors concerned having a reasonable transitional period to adapt thereto and being assured that, at the time when the packaging waste management system changes, they can actually participate in an operational g system.

Question 2

h 84. In light of the answer given to the fourth question, it is no longer necessary to answer the second question.

COSTS

i 85. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable.

On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Grand Chamber) rules as follows:

(1) Article 1(2) of European Parliament and Council Directive (EC) 94/62 (on packaging and packaging waste) does not preclude the member states from introducing measures designed to promote systems for the re-use of packaging.

(2) While art 7 of Directive 94/62 does not confer on the producers and distributors concerned any right to continue to participate in a given packaging waste management system, it precludes the replacement of a global system for the collection of packaging waste with a deposit and return system where the new system is not equally appropriate for the purpose of attaining the objectives of that directive or where the changeover to the new system does not take place without a break and without jeopardising the ability of economic operators in the sectors concerned actually to participate in the new system as soon as it enters into force. a
b

(3) Article 28 EC (formerly art 30 of the EC Treaty) precludes national rules, such as those laid down in paras 8(1) and 9(2) of the Verordnung über die Vermeidung und Verwertung von Verpackungsabfällen (Regulation on the Avoidance and Recovery of Packaging Waste), when they announce that a global packaging waste collection system is to be replaced by a deposit and return system without the producers and distributors concerned having a reasonable transitional period to adapt thereto and being assured that, at the time when the packaging waste management system changes, they can actually participate in an operational system. c
d

a Holcim (Deutschland) AG (formerly Alsen AG) v European Commission (Case T-28/03)

b COURT OF FIRST INSTANCE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (THIRD CHAMBER) JUDGES AZIZI (PRESIDENT), JAEGER AND DEHOUSSE
10 JUNE 2004, 21 APRIL 2005

European Community – Commission – Decision – Decision giving applicant undertaking option to pay fine or provide bank guarantee as security for payment of fine – Applicant undertaking electing to offer Commission bank guarantee – Annulment by Court of First Instance of decision in relation to applicant undertaking – Consequences of annulment – Whether bank guarantee charges recoverable – Articles 233, 235, 288 EC (formerly EC Treaty, arts 176, 178, 215).

d The applicant company, which had been formed in 1997 as the result of a merger between two companies, manufactured construction materials. By Commission Decision (EC) 94/815 (relating to a proceeding under art 85<sup>a</sup> of the EC Treaty (now art 81 EC) (Cases IV/33.126 and 33.322—Cement) both those companies were found to be amongst those associations, federations and undertakings which had infringed art 85 of the EC Treaty by participating in concerted practices designed to prevent incursions by competitors on respective national markets in the Community. Fines were imposed upon them. In accordance with the option offered to them by the Commission of the European Communities, they decided to provide bank guarantees, thus avoiding the need to pay the fines immediately. The two companies brought actions for the annulment of the decision. On 15 March 2000, the Court of First Instance annulled the decision in so far as the applicant was concerned and ordered the Commission to pay the costs (the judgment). Pursuant to art 91 of the Rules of Procedure of the Court of First Instance, the applicant requested the Commission to pay, inter alia, the charges incurred in providing the bank guarantees. The Commission refused. The applicant's second request for payment of the charges was also refused. The applicant then brought proceedings seeking, under arts 233 EC<sup>b</sup>, 235 EC<sup>c</sup> and 288 EC<sup>d</sup> (formerly arts 176, 178 and 215 of the EC Treaty), compensation in the form of reimbursement of the charges it had incurred. The Commission contended, inter alia, that the action should be dismissed as inadmissible or, in the alternative, unfounded.

h a Article 81 EC, so far as material, provides: 'The following shall be prohibited as incompatible with the common market: all ... concerted practices ... which have as their object or effect the prevention, restriction or distortion of competition within the common market ...'

b Article 233 EC, so far as material, provides: 'The institution or institutions whose act has been declared void or whose failure to act has been declared contrary to this Treaty shall be required to take the necessary measures to comply with the judgment of the Court of Justice. This obligation shall not affect any obligation which may result from the application of the second paragraph of Article 288.'

i c Article 235 EC provides: 'The Court of Justice shall have jurisdiction in disputes relating to compensation for damage provided for in the second paragraph of Article 288.'

d Article 288 EC, so far as material, provides: 'The contractual liability of the Community shall be governed by the law applicable to the contract in question. In the case of non-contractual liability, the Community shall, in accordance with the general principles common to the laws of the Member States, make good any damage caused by its institutions or by its servants in the performance of their duties.'

Held – (1) Article 233 EC, in the context of the objection of inadmissibility, did not constitute a specific remedy. The EC Treaty provided, restrictively, the remedies which were available to persons to rely on their rights. As art 233 EC did not establish a remedy, it could not autonomously found a claim such as the claim for reimbursement of the bank guarantee charges in the instant case. The fact that the Commission had no discretion, or that the Court of First Instance had declared that the charges had to be reimbursed, did not alter that finding (see judgment paras 31, 32, 35, 36, below). a
b

(2) The breach of Community law found in the judgment regarding that part of the decision which concerned the applicant was not sufficiently serious to allow the non-contractual liability of the Community to be incurred. Without fundamentally calling into question the Commission's analysis regarding the application of art 85(1) of the EC Treaty, the Court of First Instance had confined itself to challenging the Commission's appraisal of the probative nature of certain documents used for the purpose of establishing the infringement in respect of certain applicants. Furthermore, although the court annulled the decision in so far as it concerned the applicant, it had none the less found that there was a certain amount of evidence of such a kind as to accredit the argument that the impugned co-operation had had the object and effect of reinforcing the rule on non-transshipment to home markets. In addition, regard had to be had to: (i) the fact that the decision involved consideration of a particularly complex case; (ii) that investigation of the structure of the relevant association had been difficult; (iii) it had been necessary to analyse a great number of documents; and (iv) the difficulties in applying the provisions of the EC Treaty in matters relating to cartels. Accordingly, the Commission was not liable to compensate the applicant for those charges which were admissible as having been incurred within the limitation period (see judgment paras 86, 113–116, 118, below). c
d
e

(3) An undertaking which brought an action against a decision imposing a fine upon it had a choice whether to pay the fine, apply for suspension of the operation of the decision, or to provide a bank guarantee. In the circumstances, the applicant could not maintain that the guarantee charges which it had incurred were the direct consequence of the unlawfulness of the decision. The damage it alleged it had suffered was the consequence of its own decision not to comply with the obligation to pay the fine within the period prescribed by providing a bank guarantee (see judgment paras 122, 123, below); Corus UK Ltd v European Commission Case T-171/99 [2001] ECR II-2967 distinguished. f
g

Notes

For the power of the Commission to impose fines on undertakings for infringement of art 81 EC, see 47 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2001 reissue) para 399. h

Cases cited

- Asteris AE v EC Commission* Joined cases 97/86, 193/86, 99/86 and 215/86 [1988] ECR 2181, ECJ.
- Autosalone Ispra dei Fratelli Rossi Snc v European Commission* Case T-124/99 [2001] ECR II-53, CFI; affd Case C-136/01 P [2002] I-6565, ECJ. i
- Biret International SA v EU Council* Case T-174/00 [2002] ECR II-17, CFI; affd Case C-93/02 P [2003] ECR I-10497, ECJ.
- Birra Wührer SpA v EC Council* Joined cases 256/80, 257/80, 265/80, 267/80 and 5/81 [1982] ECR 85, ECJ.

- a* Blackspur DIY Ltd v EU Council Case T-168/94 [1995] ECR II-2627, CFI.
British American Tobacco International (Investments) v European Commission Case T-111/00 [2001] ECR II-2997, CFI.
Camar Srl v European Commission Joined cases T-79/96, T-260/97 and T-117/98 [2000] ECR II-2193, CFI; affd in part sub nom European Commission v Camar Srl Case C-312/00 P [2002] ECR I-11355, ECJ.
- b* Cimenteries CBR v European Commission Joined cases T-25/95, T-26/95, T-30-32/95, T-34-39/95, T-42-46/95, T-48/95, T-50-65/95, T-68-71/95, T-87/95, T-88/95, T-103/95 and T-104/95 [2000] ECR II-491, CFI.
Coöperatieve vereniging Suiker Unie UA v EC Commission Joined cases 40-48/73, 50/73, 54-56/73, 111/73 and 113-114/73 [1975] ECR 1663, ECJ.
- c* Corus UK Ltd v European Commission Case T-171/99 [2001] ECR II-2967, CFI.
Deere (John) Ltd v European Commission Case C-7/95 P [1998] All ER (EC) 481n, [1998] ECR I-3111, ECJ.
Dumortier Frères (P) v EC Council Joined cases 64/76 and 113/76, 167/78 and 239/78, 27/79, 28/79 and 45/79 [1979] ECR 3091, ECJ.
Efisol SA v European Commission Case T-336/94 [1996] ECR II-1343, CFI.
- d* Enso Española SA v European Commission Case T-348/94 [1998] ECR II-1875, CFI.
Etablissements Biret et Cie SA v EU Council Case T-210/00 [2002] ECR II-47, CFI.
Fresh Marine Co SA v European Commission Case T-178/98 [2000] ECR II-3331, CFI; affd sub nom European Commission v Fresh Marine Co SA Case C-472/00 P [2003] ECR I-7541, ECJ.
- e* Groupement des Cartes Bancaires 'CB' v European Commission Case T-275/94 [1995] All ER (EC) 717, [1995] ECR II-2169, CFI.
Hartmann v EU Council Case T-20/94 [1997] ECR II-595, CFI.
Jestädt v EU Council Case T-332/99 [2001] ECR II-2561, CFI.
K v Germany Case 233/82 [1982] ECR 3637, ECJ.
Kurt Kampffmeyer Mühlenvereinigung KG v EC Commission Joined cases 56-60/74 [1976] ECR 711, ECJ.
- f* Laboratoires Pharmaceutiques Bergaderm SA (in liq) v European Commission Case C-352/98 P [2000] ECR I-5291, ECJ.
Lamberts v European Ombudsman Case T-209/00 [2002] ECR II-2203, CFI; affd Case C-234/02 P [2004] ECR I-2803, ECJ.
- g* Meskens v European Parliament Case T-84/91 [1992] ECR II-1565, CFI.
Meyer v European Commission Case T-333/01 [2003] ECR II-117, CFI.
Oleifici Mediterranei (SA) v EEC Case 26/81 [1982] ECR 3057, ECJ.
Philip Morris International Inc v European Commission (supported by European Parliament intervening) Joined cases T-377/00, T-379/00, T-380/00, T-260/01 and T-272/01 [2003] All ER (EC) 1008, [2003] ECR II-1, CFI.
- h* Remia BV v EC Commission Case 42/84 [1985] ECR 2545, ECJ.
Salamander AG (supported by Markenverband eV, intervening) v European Parliament (supported by Finland, intervening) Joined cases T-172/98 and T-175-177/98 [2000] All ER (EC) 754, [2000] ECR II-2487, CFI.
Unión de Pequeños Agricultores v EU Council (supported by the European Commission intervening) Case C-50/00 P [2002] All ER (EC) 893, [2003] QB 893, [2003] 2 WLR 795, [2002] ECR I-6677, ECJ.
- i*

Application

By application lodged at the Registry of the Court of First Instance on 31 January 2003, Holcim (Deutschland) AG, formerly Alsen AG, established in Hamburg, Germany, brought the present action for compensation in the form of reimbursement of the bank guarantee charges incurred by the applicant following a fine fixed by Commission Decision (EC) 94/815 (relating to a proceeding under art 85 of the EC Treaty (now art 81 EC) (Cases IV/33.126 and 33.322—Cement)) (OJ 1994 L343 p 1), which was annulled by the judgment of the Court of First Instance of 15 March 2000 in Cimenteries CBR v European Commission Joined cases T-25/95, T-26/95, T-30-32/95, T-34-39/95, T-42-46/95, T-48/95, T-50-65/95, T-68-71/95, T-87/95, T-88/95, T-103/95 and T-104/95 [2000] ECR II-491. The applicant was represented initially by F Wiemer and K Moosecker, then by F Wiemer, P Niggemann and B Menkhaus, lawyers. The Commission of the European Communities was represented by R Lyal and W Mölls, acting as agents, with an address for service in Luxembourg. The language of the case was German. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

21 April 2005. THE COURT OF FIRST INSTANCE (Third Chamber) delivered the following judgment.

FACTS

1. The applicant, Alsen AG, which became Holcim (Deutschland) AG, whose registered office is in Hamburg, Germany, manufactures construction materials. Alsen AG came about as a result of the merger in 1997 between Alsen Breitenburg Zement- und Kalkwerke GmbH (Alsen Breitenburg) and Nordcement AG (Nordcement).

2. By Decision (EC) 94/815 (relating to a proceeding under art 85 of the EC Treaty (now art 81 EC) (Cases IV/33.126 and 33.322—Cement)) (OJ 1994 L343 p 1; the Cement decision), the Commission of the European Communities ordered Alsen Breitenburg and Nordcement to pay fines of €3.841m and €1.85m, respectively, for infringement of art 85 of the EC Treaty (now art 81 EC).

3. Alsen Breitenburg and Nordcement brought actions for annulment of that decision. Those actions were registered under the references T-45/95 and T-46/95 and were then joined to the actions brought by the other companies to which the Cement decision was addressed.

4. In accordance with the option given by the Commission, Alsen Breitenburg and Nordcement decided to provide bank guarantees, thus avoiding the need to pay the fines immediately. Alsen Breitenburg's bank guarantee was in existence from 3 May 1995 until 2 May 2000 and was arranged by Berenberg Bank, in consideration of an annual commission of 0.45%. Nordcement provided, from 18 April 1995 until 3 May 2000, a bank guarantee arranged by Deutsche Bank, in consideration of an annual commission of 0.375% and a single start-up commission of €15.34. The applicant paid to the banks, for arranging the bank guarantees, a total amount of €139,002.21.

5. By judgment of 15 March 2000 in Cimenteries CBR v European Commission Joined cases T-25/95, T-26/95, T-30-32/95, T-34-39/95, T-42-46/95, T-48/95, T-50-65/95, T-68-71/95, T-87/95, T-88/95, T-103/95 and T-104/95 [2000] ECR II-491 (the Cement case), the Court of First Instance of the European Communities annulled the Cement decision in so far as the applicant was concerned and ordered the Commission to pay the costs.

6. Pursuant to art 91 of the Rules of Procedure of the Court of First Instance, and by letter of 28 September 2001, the applicant therefore requested the defendant to pay, first, the costs of the proceedings (in particular the lawyers' fees, amounting to €545,000) and, second, the charges incurred in providing the bank guarantees.

a 7. By letter of 24 January 2002, the defendant offered to pay to the applicant part of its lawyers' fees (€130,000), but refused to pay the bank guarantee charges, relying on the case law on costs within the meaning of art 91 of the Rules of Procedure.

b 8. By letter of 5 April 2002, the applicant again requested the applicant to pay it the whole of the lawyers' costs and the bank guarantee charges. For payment of the bank guarantee charges, the applicant relied this time on the second paragraph of art 288 EC (formerly art 215 of the EC Treaty) and art 233 EC (formerly art 176 of the EC Treaty) and also on the judgment of the Court of First Instance of 10 October 2001 in Corus UK Ltd v European Commission Case T-171/99 [2001] ECR II-2967, which had been delivered in the meantime.

c 9. By an email of 30 May 2002, the defendant offered to pay the lawyers' fees in the amount of €200,000. As regards the bank guarantee charges, it again refused to pay them, taking the view that the possibility of deferring payment of the fine by providing a bank guarantee was a simple option and that the defendant could not therefore be held liable for the charges occasioned where undertakings decided to take advantage of that possibility.

d PROCEDURE AND FORMS OF ORDER SOUGHT BY THE PARTIES

10. By application lodged at the Registry of the Court of First Instance on 31 January 2003, the applicant brought the present action.

e 11. On 10 April 2003, the defendant raised an objection of inadmissibility, under art 114 of the Rules of Procedure, in so far as the action is based on art 233 EC, and lodged a defence.

12. Upon hearing the report of the Judge-Rapporteur, the Court of First Instance (Third Chamber) decided to open the oral procedure. The parties presented oral argument and their answers to the questions put by the court at the public hearing held on 10 June 2004.

f 13. The applicant claims that the court should:
—order the Commission to pay it the sum of €139,002.21, plus default interest at the rate of 5.75% per annum from 15 April 2000;
—order the Commission to pay the costs.

g 14. The defendant contends that the court should:
—dismiss the action as inadmissible, in so far as it is based on art 233 EC;
—dismiss the action in its entirety, in so far as it is based on art 288 EC;
—as inadmissible, or, in the alternative, as unfounded, in so far as it relates to the bank guarantee charges incurred before 31 January 1998;
—as unfounded for the remainder;
—order the applicant to pay the costs.

h 15. In its observations, the applicant claims that the court should:
—declare the action admissible, in so far as it is based on art 233 EC;
—in the alternative, interpret the action, in so far as it is based on art 233 EC, as being an action for annulment or for failure to act;
—order the defendant to pay the costs.

ADMISSIBILITY

i The admissibility of the action in so far as it is based on art 233 EC

Arguments of the parties

16. The defendant submits that if the applicant is of the opinion that art 233 EC has not been observed, two remedies are available, namely an action for annulment (see art 230 EC (formerly art 173 of the EC Treaty)) and an action for failure to act (see art 232 EC (formerly art 175 of the EC Treaty)).

17. The present action, whereby the applicant seeks an order that the defendant pay a certain sum, is neither an action for annulment nor an action for failure to act. a

18. In the defendant's submission, by initiating the present proceedings, the applicant hopes to secure a judgment producing directly the result to which, in its opinion, the Commission is bound in execution of the Cement judgment. However, the EC Treaty contains no legal basis which would allow such a solution. b

19. The case law of the Court of Justice of the European Communities on what are known as 'payment' actions confirms that no type of action other than those provided for in arts 230 and 232 EC can be contemplated.

20. The defendant infers that the claim based on the first paragraph of art 233 EC and seeking an order that the Commission reimburse the bank guarantee charges is manifestly inadmissible. Nor, in its submission, can such a claim be interpreted as being an action brought under arts 230 or 232 EC, which, moreover, would be equally inadmissible in the present circumstances. c

21. The applicant observes, first, that it seeks reimbursement for the damage it sustained. It maintains, therefore, that reliance on art 233 EC comes within the framework of an 'action for damages' and that the defendant had no discretion in this case. Relying on the retroactive effect of a judgment annulling a measure and also on the case law of the Court of First Instance (and in particular the judgment in the Corus UK case (see para 8, above) (para 50)), the applicant submits that the defendant is under an obligation to reimburse the bank guarantee charges. The applicant further submits that the Court of First Instance rightly stated in the Cement judgment (at para 5116 et seq) that the bank guarantee charges must be reimbursed. d

22. Second, the applicant claims that the first paragraph of art 233 EC also gives rise to a right to compensation, so that it is entitled to rely on that provision. e

23. The applicant refutes the defendant's submission that the rights derived from the first paragraph of art 233 EC could be invoked solely within the framework of an action for annulment or an action for failure to act. That argument finds no support in the wording of art 233 EC, nor does it follow from the case law cited by the defendant. f

24. The applicant further submits that the defendant's argument is inconsistent with the principle of procedural economy, since it would entail embarking upon two remedies (an action for damages under art 288 EC and an action for annulment or for failure to act under art 233 EC). g

25. In the alternative, the applicant requests the court to interpret the action, in so far as it is based on the first paragraph of art 233 EC, as being an action for annulment or for failure to act. h

26. In that regard, the applicant maintains that it would be inconsistent with the principle of procedural economy to require it to claim anew reimbursement from the Commission for the bank charges and then to bring an action for annulment or for failure to act, even when the defendant has already definitively indicated that it refused to pay the amount in question. The applicant observes, last, that it would still be possible to bring an action for annulment since the Commission would not yet have adopted a contestable decision. i

a Findings of the court

—Admissibility of the action in so far as it is based on art 233 EC

27. It should be observed at the outset that the applicant has based its action in part, and autonomously, on art 233 EC, in order to secure reimbursement of the bank guarantee charges.

b 28. Thus, in order to explain the legal basis of its right, the applicant draws a clear distinction in its application between ‘the right to reimbursement under Article 233 EC’ (Title II, point 1(a) of the application) and ‘the right to compensation based on the combined provisions of the second paragraph of Article 288 EC and Article 235 EC [formerly art 178 of the EC Treaty]’ (Title II, point 1(b) of the application).

c 29. In addition, the applicant states that ‘[a]longside the right derived from Article 233 EC, the Commission is also required, on the basis of the combined provisions of the second paragraph of Article 288 EC and Article 235 EC, to reimburse the guarantee charges’ (para 22 of the application).

30. Last, the applicant stated at the hearing that its action rested on two separate and autonomous legal bases, namely (i) art 233 EC and (ii) the

d combined provisions of arts 288 and 235 EC.

31. It should be borne in mind, in that regard, that the EC Treaty provides, restrictively, the remedies which are available to persons to rely on their rights (see, to that effect, the order of the Court of Justice in K v Germany Case 233/82 [1982] ECR 3637).

e 32. As art 233 EC does not establish a remedy, it cannot autonomously found a claim such as the claim for reimbursement of the bank guarantee charges in the present case.

33. That does not mean, however, that a person is without a remedy when he considers that the measures required for the purpose of complying with a judgment have not been taken. The Court of Justice has already had occasion to hold, on that point, that the obligation arising under art 233 EC could be implemented by means, in particular, of the remedies provided for in arts 230 and 232 EC (see Asteris AE v EC Commission Joined cases 97/86, 193/86, 99/86 and 215/86 [1988] ECR 2181 (paras 24, 32, 33)).

g 34. In that context, it is not for the Community judicature to usurp the function of the founding authority of the Community in order to change the system of legal remedies and procedures established by the Treaty (see Unión de Pequeños Agricultores v EU Council (supported by the European Commission intervening) Case C-50/00 P [2002] All ER (EC) 893, [2002] ECR I-6677 (para 45), Salamander AG (supported by Markenverband eV, intervening) v European Parliament (supported by Finland, intervening) Joined cases T-172/98 and T-175-177/98 [2000] All ER (EC) 754, [2000] ECR II-2487 (para 75) and Philip Morris International Inc v European Commission (supported by European Parliament intervening) Joined cases T-377/00, T-379/00, T-380/00, T-260/01 and T-272/01 [2003] All ER (EC) 1008, [2003] ECR II-1 (para 124)).

i 35. The fact that, as the applicant submits, the defendant had no discretion in the present case, or that the Court of First Instance declared in the Cement case that the bank guarantee charges must be reimbursed, does not alter that finding. The same applies to the applicant’s argument that art 233 EC creates ‘rights to compensation’ or that other remedies, outside an action for annulment or for failure to act, may be used in order to rely on those rights, or again the argument that the principle of procedural economy should be applicable.

36. The only question raised in the context of the objection of inadmissibility is whether art 233 EC, as such, constitutes a specific remedy. In the light of the restrictive remedies provided for in the Treaty and of the case law cited above, the answer must be in the negative. a

37. For the sake of completeness, it should be noted that in the Cement case the Court of First Instance, contrary to the applicant's claim, did not state that the bank guarantee charges must be reimbursed. It merely stated, and, moreover, did so in the context of Cases T-50/95 and T-51/95, in which the applicant was not a party, that 'those claims in actual fact concern[ed] compliance with the present judgment and that it [was] for the Commission to take the necessary steps to comply with it, in accordance with Article 176 of the EC Treaty (now Article 233 EC)' (see the Cement judgment (para 5118)). It follows from that paragraph that the court did not hold that the Commission was under an obligation, under art 233 EC, to reimburse the bank guarantee charges. The court merely stated that it was for the Commission to take the necessary steps to comply with the judgment. It must be borne in mind, in that regard, that it is not for the court to substitute itself for the Commission and determine the measures that the latter should have adopted in the context of art 233 EC (see Meskens v European Parliament Case T-84/91 [1992] ECR II-1565/II-2335 (paras 78, 79)). b
c

38. Nor is the present case comparable with the Corus UK case (see para 8, above). In that judgment, the Court of First Instance held (at para 39) that art 34 CS (the counterpart in the ECSC Treaty of art 233 EC) provided for a specific legal remedy, distinct from that provided by the general rule of Community liability under art 40 CS (the counterpart in the ECSC Treaty of art 288 EC), in cases where the injury relied upon resulted from a decision of the Commission that had subsequently been annulled by the Community courts. d
e

39. However, art 233 EC, on which the applicant relies in the present case, is drafted in different terms from those of art 34 CS. According to art 34 CS, not only is the Commission to take steps to ensure equitable redress for the harm resulting directly from the decision or recommendation declared void, but its failure to do so provides a ground for bringing an action for damages before the court. In those circumstances, the solution adopted by the Court of First Instance in the Corus UK case (see para 8, above) cannot be transposed to the present case. f
g

40. For all of those reasons, the applicant's action, in so far as it is based on art 233 EC, must be dismissed as inadmissible.

—The applicant's request that the action be interpreted as being an action for annulment or for failure to act h

41. It should be noted, first of all, that in the introduction to its application, the applicant states that the objective of the present action is a 'claim for damages'. Furthermore, by the form of order which it seeks, the applicant claims that 'the Commission should be ordered to pay the applicant the sum of EUR 139 002.21, plus default interest at the rate of 5.75% per annum from 15 April 2000'. It follows that the object of the present action is clearly to obtain damages and not to obtain annulment of an act or a declaration that the defendant has failed to act. i

42. The first paragraph of art 21 of the Statute of the Court of Justice, which, pursuant to the first paragraph of art 53 of that statute, is applicable to the procedure before the Court of First Instance, provides that '[a] case shall be a brought before the Court by a written application addressed to the Registrar' and that '[t]he application shall contain the applicant's name and permanent address and the description of the signatory, the name of the party or names of the parties against whom the application is made, the subject-matter of the dispute, the form of order sought and a brief statement of the pleas in law on which the application is based'.

b 43. Likewise, art 44(1)(c) of the Rules of Procedure provides that an application of the kind referred to in art 21 of the Statute of the Court of Justice is to state the subject matter of the proceedings and a summary of the pleas in law on which the application is based.

c 44. It is settled case law that that information must be sufficiently clear and precise to enable the defendant to prepare its defence and the court to decide the case, if appropriate, without other information in support. In order to ensure legal certainty and the sound administration of justice, if an action is to be admissible, the essential facts and law on which it is based must be apparent from the text of the application itself, even if only stated briefly, provided the statement is coherent and comprehensible (see Enso Española SA v European Commission Case T-348/94 [1998] ECR II-1875 (para 143)).

d 45. It is also settled case law that, under art 44(1) in conjunction with art 48(2) of the Rules of Procedure, the subject matter of the claim must be defined in the application. A claim put forward for the first time in the reply modifies the original subject matter of the application and must therefore be regarded as a new claim and be rejected as inadmissible (see Etablissements Biret et Cie SA v EU Council Case T-210/00 [2002] ECR II-47 (para 49) and the case law cited there). The same reasoning applies where the initial subject matter of the application is modified in observations on an objection of inadmissibility.

e 46. In the light of those factors, and since the sole object of the application was to obtain 'damages', the applicant's request that the action, in so far as it is based on the first paragraph of art 233 EC, be interpreted as being an action for annulment or for failure to act, must be dismissed as inadmissible.

f
The time-barring of the action for damages based on art 235 EC and the second paragraph of art 288 EC

Arguments of the parties

g 47. The defendant also disputes, for a part of the bank charges incurred by the applicant, the admissibility of the action based on art 235 EC and the second paragraph of art 288 EC.

h 48. Having regard to art 46 of the Statute of the Court of Justice, the defendant contends that the alleged right which the applicant claims is time-barred and the action inadmissible, in so far as it relates to the bank guarantee charges incurred before 31 January 1998.

i 49. In the present case, the act which may possibly give rise to an obligation to compensate the applicant, namely the Cement decision, was adopted on 30 November 1994 and notified to the applicant on 3 February 1995. The bank guarantees were issued on 18 and 21 April 1995 and then sent to the Commission. The period covered by the guarantee began at the end of the period allowed for payment, ie on 3 May 1995. Since, according to the defendant, the conditions of an obligation to provide compensation could be satisfied, where appropriate, with effect from that day, 3 May 1995 must be regarded as the starting date of the limitation period.

50. The defendant acknowledges that, in the present case, the damage was not caused by a single isolated incident, but continuously, until the expiry of the bank guarantees. In such a case, the limitation referred to in art 46 of the Statute of the Court of Justice applies to the period more than five years before the date of the interrupting act but does not affect rights which came into being during later periods. a

51. In the present case, the defendant submits that the applicant, in its letter of 5 April 2002, did indeed request it to reimburse the bank guarantee charges, relying on the second paragraph of art 288 EC, but it did not, as required by the third sentence of art 46 of the Statute of the Court of Justice, then bring an action within the period prescribed in art 230 EC. b

52. The defendant concludes that the limitation period was interrupted only when the application was lodged, on 31 January 2003, and that the rights in respect of the bank guarantee charges incurred before 31 January 1998 are therefore time-barred. c

53. The applicant contends, on the contrary, that the limitation period for the claim for reimbursement of the bank guarantee charges began to run only with the pronouncement of the Cement judgment. Referring in particular to Birra Wührer SpA v EC Council Joined cases 256/80, 257/80, 265/80, 267/80 and 5/81 [1982] ECR 85 (paras 10–12), the applicant submits that it is only from pronouncement of the judgment that the conditions on which the obligation to make reparation depends were satisfied. d

54. In the applicant's submission, the decisive factor giving rise to the right to compensation is not, in the present case, the mere illegality of the decision imposing the fine, but its annulment by the court, since while the decision was valid there was a legal basis for providing the bank guarantees. As the action for annulment of the decision imposing the fine did not have suspensory effect, the obligation imposed by the operative part of the Cement decision continued throughout the duration of the proceedings. e

55. A different approach would not, in the applicant's submission, be consistent with the principle of procedural economy, since it would also make it necessary to initiate, alongside the action for annulment of the decision imposing the fine, an action for compensation, seeking reimbursement of the bank guarantee charges. In order to avoid divergent judgments on the legality of the decision in issue, the court would be unable to adjudicate on the action for compensation until after the judgment annulling the decision, and the action for compensation would have to be suspended until that time. f

56. Furthermore, the applicant contends that the extent of the harm was determined by the duration of the action for annulment. On that basis, there is no indirect damage in the present case. g

57. Last, the applicant maintains that the approach supported by the defendant would have the consequence that the limitation period for the right to reimbursement of the bank guarantee charges would continue to run while the annulment proceedings were pending. Thus, the defendant would be able to avoid claims for compensation by ensuring, by lodging an appeal, that the judgment annulling the decision became enforceable at the latest possible moment. h

58. The applicant concludes that the limitation period began to run in March 2000 and was interrupted when it brought the action on 31 January 2003, ie before the expiry of the limitation period, in accordance with art 46 of the Statute of the Court of Justice. i

a Findings of the court

59. According to the case law, the limitation period for proceedings against the Communities in matters arising from non-contractual liability cannot begin before all the requirements governing the obligation to make good the damage are satisfied (see Biret International SA v EU Council Case T-174/00 [2002] ECR II-17 (para 38)).

b 60. In the present case, the damage alleged to have been caused to the applicant became apparent when it provided the bank guarantees. Annexes 2 and 3 to the application show that Alsen Breitenburg's bank guarantee was in existence between 3 May 1995 and 2 May 2000 and was arranged by Berenberg Bank and that Nordcement's was in existence between 18 April 1995 and 3 May 2000 and arranged by Deutsche Bank. Those banks therefore applied charges, c calculated on the basis of annual commission expressed as a percentage of the sums guaranteed (0.45% in the case of Berenberg Bank and 0.375% in the case of Deutsche Bank).

61. In those circumstances, the sums payable to the banks were proportionate to the number of days during which the bank guarantees d were in force. That method of calculating the bank charges is apparent from Annex 2 to the application, as Berenberg Bank calculated the charges in proportion to the number of days elapsed. The applicant confirmed at the hearing that the bank guarantee charges accrued by reference to the days.

62. It should further be noted that the charges already incurred would have been payable to the banks whatever the final outcome of the action for e annulment.

63. Being of the view that the Cement decision was illegal (which is confirmed by the fact that it brought an action for annulment), the applicant was in a position to invoke the non-contractual liability of the Community as soon as it provided the bank guarantees. It could have relied, in that context, on the existence of future but certain and quantifiable damage (namely the bank f guarantee charges applicable), since that harm was foreseeable with sufficient certainty (see, on the possibility of relying on future loss, in particular, Kurt Kampffmeyer Mühlenvereinigung KG v EC Commission Joined cases 56–60/74 [1976] ECR 711 (para 6) and Camar Srl v European Commission Joined cases T-79/96, T-260/97 and T-117/98 [2000] ECR II-2193 (paras 192, 207)).

64. Contrary to the applicant's contention, it was not necessary for the g Cement decision to be annulled in order for the limitation period for the action for compensation to begin. The court has already had occasion to hold that the fact that an applicant considered that it did not yet have all the evidence it needed to prove to the requisite legal standard in judicial proceedings that the Community was liable could not, as such, prevent the limitation period from h running. Confusion would then arise between the procedural criterion relating to the commencement of the limitation period and the finding that the conditions for liability were satisfied, which can ultimately be made only by the court before which the matter has been brought for final adjudication on its substance (see the order of the Court of First Instance in Autosalone Ispra dei Fratelli Rossi Snc v European Commission Case T-124/99 [2001] ECR II-53 i (para 24).

65. In the present case, any infringement of Community law existed before the Cement decision was adopted. At the time when the applicant was notified of that decision, it took formal notice of it, in fact and in law. It was also at that point that the Cement decision began to produce legal effects vis-à-vis the applicant. From that date, it was therefore open to the applicant to plead an infringement of Community law. a

66. To adopt a different approach would amount to calling in question the autonomy of actions for damages vis-à-vis other remedies, and in particular an action for annulment (see, on the autonomy of an action for damages, the judgment in Lamberts v European Ombudsman Case T-209/00 [2002] ECR II-2203 (para 58) and the case law cited there). b

67. The arguments put forward by the applicant concerning the principle of procedural economy are inoperative. Even though that principle means that a litigant may not be required to bring a new action where the contested decision is replaced by a new decision (see British American Tobacco International (Investments) v European Commission Case T-111/00 [2001] ECR II-2997 (para 22)), it cannot permit the rules governing the limitation period of an action for compensation to be called in question. That would be the case if the applicant's argument were followed. c

68. Taking into account all those elements, it must be held that the limitation period for the action in respect of non-contractual liability began to run, in the present case, as soon as the bank guarantees were provided by the companies concerned, namely on 3 May 1995 for Alsen Breitenburg and on 18 April 1995 for Nordcement. d

69. However, account must also be taken of the fact that the damage relied on in the present case was not a single isolated incident but was ongoing. In fact, as stated above, the charges were calculated in proportion to the number of days during which the bank guarantees were in force. That point, moreover, was confirmed by the applicant at the hearing. Accordingly, the damage in question increased from day to day and was ongoing in nature. e

70. In such a case, the limitation period referred to in art 46 of the Statute of the Court of Justice applies, by reference to the date of the event which interrupted the limitation period, to the period preceding that date by more than five years and does not affect rights which arose during subsequent periods (see Hartmann v EU Council Case T-20/94 [1997] ECR II-595 (para 132), the Biret International case (see para 59, above) (para 41) and the order of the Court of First Instance in Jestädt v EU Council Case T-332/99 [2001] ECR II-2561 (paras 44, 45)). f

71. In that regard, art 46 of the Statute of the Court of Justice envisages as an act interrupting the limitation period either the proceedings instituted before the court or the application made prior to such proceedings by the aggrieved party to the relevant institution. In the latter case, the application must be made within the period of two months provided for in art 230 EC and the provisions of the second paragraph of art 232 EC are to apply where appropriate. g

72. In the present case, by an initial letter of 28 September 2001, on the basis of art 91 of the Rules of Procedure, the applicant requested the defendant to reimburse the charges incurred in providing the bank guarantees. It reiterated its request by letter of 5 April 2002, relying on that occasion on the second paragraph of art 288 EC. h

73. Following those two requests, however, the applicant did not institute proceedings within the period provided for in art 230 EC, as required by the third sentence of art 46 of the Statute of the Court of Justice. Those letters therefore do not constitute events interrupting the limitation period for the purposes of art 46 of the Statute of the Court of Justice. i

- a 74. For all of those reasons, and in view of the fact that the present action was brought on 31 January 2003, it must be dismissed as inadmissible as regards the bank guarantee charges incurred by the applicant five years before that date, ie before 31 January 1998.

SUBSTANCE

- b 75. As the action is being dismissed as inadmissible in so far as it is based on art 233 EC, the court's examination of the substance is confined to the arguments which the applicant puts forward on the basis of the second paragraph of art 288 EC and art 235 EC. Furthermore, as the action for compensation is also being dismissed as inadmissible as regards the bank guarantee charges incurred before 31 January 1998, the examination of the substance will be confined to the costs incurred after that date.

Arguments of the parties

- d 76. As regards the unlawfulness of the Cement decision, which was annulled by the Court of First Instance, the applicant claims that that decision contains a defect which renders the Community liable. It maintains that that decision was annulled in part because the defendant was unable to prove that the applicant had infringed art 85 of the EC Treaty or that it had participated in agreements that restricted competition. The applicant therefore submits that in the present case the Commission made a grave error.

- e 77. The applicant explains that the defendant had no discretion when it adopted the Cement decision. Referring to the judgment in European Commission v Fresh Marine Co SA Case C-472/00 P [2003] ECR I-7541, the applicant contends that a mere infringement of Community law is therefore sufficient to establish the existence of a 'sufficiently serious breach'. According to the Cement judgment, the defendant should not have imposed a fine in the present case, which completely reduces its discretion. The present case is also different from the Corus UK case (see para 8, above) where it was necessary to analyse whether the Commission had incorrectly exercised its discretion when determining the amount of the fine. The applicant concludes that, in this case, the illegality of the decision imposing the fine is sufficient to engage the liability of the Community.

- g 78. In those circumstances, there is no need to determine whether the case was complex. In any event, it is necessary to analyse the applicant's particular situation. Since the Court of First Instance considered that there was not sufficient evidence in the present case, the applicant's situation could not be regarded as complex. There was in any event a serious infringement of the Commission's duty to exercise diligence.

- h 79. Last, the applicant observes that the co-operation or lack thereof on the part of the other undertakings during the administrative procedure cannot in any event harm it. In addition, the bank guarantee charges should be reimbursed under the principle of fairness.

- i 80. As regards the causal link, the applicant maintains that the Cement decision directly caused it damage, namely the bank guarantee charges. That damage is not based on a decision freely taken by the applicant and if its action for annulment had been dismissed it would have suffered damage either as a result of the interest paid or as a result of the bank guarantee charges imposed. The applicant also submits that if the provision of a bank guarantee did not have the same legal consequences as immediate payment of the fine, it would no longer be a valid alternative for undertakings.

81. As regards the damage, the applicant submits, annexed to its application, two bank invoices for a total amount of €139,002.21. It also claims that the Commission should be ordered to pay default interest (at 5.75%) from one month after delivery of the Cement judgment, ie from 15 April 2000. a

82. The defendant contends that the applicant has misread the Fresh Marine judgment (see para 77, above). The Court of Justice stated in that judgment that the mere infringement of Community law 'may' be sufficient to establish the existence of a sufficiently serious breach. The determining factor is the manifest and grave nature of the error committed and it is also necessary, in the defendant's submission, to examine all the factors which may provide an indication of the gravity of the fault committed by the Commission. b

83. In the present case, the defendant contends that the Cement case was very complex. The infringement was distinguished by numerous ramifications, the involvement of a large part of the European industry and an extremely high number of participants and therefore of addressees of the decision. The cartel was kept secret, moreover, and during the investigation none of the undertakings co-operated to a greater extent than provided for by the rules on investigative powers. c

84. As regards the causal link, the defendant contends that, unlike payment of a fine, the provision of a bank guarantee is not an obligation. It concludes that there is no direct causal link, within the meaning of the case law, between any fault committed by the Commission and the alleged damage. d

85. Concerning the damage, the defendant explains that, as regards the interest claimed, on 15 April 2000 (which the applicant proposes as the date on which default interest begins to accrue), it was not aware of the applicant's demands or of the amount claimed. As for the applicant's letter of 5 April 2002, it was not followed by an application within the period set out in the second sentence of art 46 of the Statute of the Court of Justice. The defendant therefore submits that a right to payment of default interest could in any event be envisaged only from the date on which the present action was brought, on 31 January 2003. Last, as regards the rate of interest claimed, the defendant submits that the rate applied by the European Central Bank to its main refinancing transactions, on 31 January 2003, was 2.75%. The addition of two percentage points fixed in the Corus UK case (see para 8, above), would result in an interest rate of 4.75% and not of 5.75%, as the applicant maintains. e

Findings of the court

86. It follows from a consistent line of decisions that the non-contractual liability of the Community, within the meaning of the second paragraph of art 288 EC, depends on the fulfilment of a set of conditions, namely the unlawfulness of the conduct alleged against the institutions, the fact of damage and the existence of a causal link between the conduct and the damage complained of (see SA Oleifici Mediterranei v EEC Case 26/81 [1982] ECR 3057 (para 16) and Efisol SA v European Commission Case T-336/94 [1996] ECR II-1343 (para 30)). f

The condition relating to the unlawfulness of the alleged conduct

87. As regards the condition relating to the unlawfulness of the alleged conduct, the case law requires that a sufficiently serious breach of a legal rule designed to confer rights on individuals be established. In that regard, it must be borne in mind that the system of rules which the Court of Justice has worked out with regard to non-contractual liability on the part of the Community takes into account, inter alia, the complexity of the situations to g a be regulated, difficulties in the application or interpretation of the texts and, more particularly, the margin of discretion available to the author of the act in question. The determining factor for regarding a breach of Community law as sufficiently serious lies in the manifest and serious failure by the Community institution concerned to observe the limits on its discretion. Where that institution has only considerably reduced, or even no, discretion, the mere infringement of Community law may be sufficient to establish the existence of a sufficiently serious breach (see Laboratoires Pharmaceutiques Bergaderm SA (in liq) v European Commission Case C-352/98 P [2000] ECR I-5291 (paras 40, 42–44), European Commission v Camar Srl Case C-312/00 P [2002] ECR I-11355 (paras 52–55) and the Fresh Marine case (see para 77, above) (paras 24–26)).

c —The factual and legal context of the Cement decision

88. It should be observed at the outset, first, that the Cement decision provides, in art 1, that certain associations, federations and undertakings (including the applicant) had infringed art 85(1) of the EC Treaty by participating in an agreement (known as ‘the Cembureau agreement’ after the European cement association) designed to ensure non-transshipment to home markets and to regulate cement transfers from one country to another. Cembureau was made up of direct members and indirect members. The undertakings whose merger led to the creation of the applicant formed part of the second category (see, in particular, para 1440 of the Cement judgment). In that context, and in respect of the indirect members of Cembureau, art 1 of the Cement decision referred to the undertakings (including therefore the applicant) which had manifested their accession to the Cembureau agreement by participating in a measure implementing that agreement (see para 4076 of the Cement judgment).

f 89. In that regard, art 5 of the Cement decision concluded that certain associations, federations and undertakings (including the applicant) had infringed art 85(1) of the EC Treaty by participating, within the framework of the European Cement Export Committee (the ECEC), in concerted practices designed to prevent incursions by competitors on respective national markets in the Community.

g 90. For those reasons, according to art 9 of the Cement decision, fines of €3.841m and €1.85m respectively were imposed on Alsen Breitenburg and on Nordcement (the merger of which led to the creation of the applicant).

h 91. The Court of First Instance held, however, that the evidence adduced in the Cement decision, even considered as a whole, did not establish that the members of the ECEC aimed, in the framework of their co-operation within that export committee, to channel their production surpluses in order to reinforce the rule that there should be no transshipment to home markets (see para 3849 of the Cement judgment).

i 92. In so far as the activities within the ECEC were considered, in art 5 of the Cement decision, to constitute an infringement of art 85(1) of the EC Treaty, on the ground that they were designed to prevent incursions by competitors on respective national markets in the Community, the Court of First Instance decided to annul art 5 of the Cement decision (see para 3850 of the grounds and paras 16 and 17 of the operative part of the Cement judgment).

93. Furthermore, since it had not been established that the conduct referred to in art 5 of the Cement decision pursued the same objective as the Cembureau agreement, the Court of First Instance held that that conduct could not be regarded as elements of the infringement referred to in art 1 of the Cement decision (see para 4058 of the Cement judgment). The Court of First Instance therefore decided also to annul, in so far as it concerned the applicant, art 1 of the Cement decision (see paras 4074–4079 of the grounds and paras 16 and 17 of the operative part of the Cement judgment). a

94. Consequently, art 9 of the Cement decision, which fixed the fines for Alsen Breitenburg and Nordcement, was also annulled (see para 4718 of the grounds and paras 16 and 17 of the operative part of the Cement judgment). b

—The Commission's discretion

95. The Community judicature undertakes generally a comprehensive review of the question whether or not the conditions for the application of art 85(1) of the EC Treaty are met. It is only where it reviews complex economic appraisals made by the Commission that the Community judicature confines itself to verifying whether the rules on procedure and on the statement of reasons have been complied with, whether the facts have been accurately stated and whether there has been any manifest error of appraisal or a misuse of powers (see Remia BV v EC Commission Case 42/84 [1985] ECR 2545 (para 34) and John Deere Ltd v European Commission Case C-7/95 P [1998] All ER (EC) 481n, [1998] ECR I-3111 (para 34)). c
d

96. In the present case, it should be observed at the outset that the review carried out by the Court of First Instance, which led to the annulment of the Cement decision so far as the applicant was concerned, covered the existence of conduct which was contrary to art 85(1) of the EC Treaty. That review did not cover the fixing by the Commission of the amount of the fines imposed on the applicant. e

97. It follows from the Cement judgment (at paras 3771–3850), moreover, which set out the grounds on which the Court of First Instance annulled art 5 of the Cement decision, and therefore, in consequence, annulled arts 1 and 9 of that decision, so far as the applicant was concerned, that the court undertook a comprehensive review of the application by the defendant of art 85(1) of the EC Treaty. f

98. The relevant paragraphs of the Cement judgment make no reference to economic appraisals made by the Commission or to any discretion on its part that might have limited the scope of the review carried out by the Court of First Instance. g

99. Last, the classification of the conduct of the undertakings concerned as constituting or not constituting an infringement for the purposes of art 85(1) of the EC Treaty fell in this case within the scope of the simple application of the law on the basis of the elements of fact available to the Commission.

100. It follows from those factors that the Commission's discretion was reduced in the present case. In those circumstances, the infringement of art 85(1) of the EC Treaty found by the Court of First Instance in the Cement judgment, namely the insufficiency of the evidence adduced by the defendant in support of the applicant's impugned practices, could suffice to establish the existence of a sufficiently serious breach. h

101. As stated at para 87, above, however, the system of rules which the Court of Justice has worked out with regard to non-contractual liability on the part of the Community must also induce the Community judicature to take into account, in addition to the discretion enjoyed by the institution concerned, in particular, the complexity of the situations to be regulated and also the difficulties in the application or interpretation of the texts. i a —The complexity of the situations to be regulated and the difficulties in the application or interpretation of the texts

102. In the present case, it should be noted, first, that the case at the origin of the Cement decision and then of the Cement judgment was particularly complex. In that regard, the applicant's argument that the complexity of the context of the case is irrelevant must be rejected. On the contrary, that context permits the complexity of the situations to be regulated to be measured, within the meaning of the case law.

b 103. The procedure, which lasted more than three years, involved both international and national associations and numerous undertakings established in non-member countries and also virtually all the Community undertakings in the cement sector. The investigation carried out by the defendant required the presence of a large number of factors.

c 104. The Court of First Instance referred to the complexity of the case when it stated that 'the Court held ... in [Coöperatieve vereniging Suiker Unie UA v EC Commission Joined cases 40–48/73, 50/73, 54–56/73, 111/73 and 113–114/73 [1975] ECR 1663] ... which was also a complex case, that a period of two months was reasonable [to prepare a reply to a statement of objections]' (see the Cement judgment (para 654)).

d 105. Furthermore, concerning the time taken by the investigation, the Court of First Instance observed (at para 709) that '[t]he period of 31 months which elapsed between the investigations in April 1989 and dispatch of the [statement of objections] in November 1991 was reasonable, taking into account ... the scope and the difficulties of an investigation into almost the whole of the European cement industry' and that—

e '[t]he fact that it took the Commission 20 months after the end of the hearings to adopt the contested decision, on 30 November 1994, is not an infringement of the principle that the duration of administrative proceedings relating to competition policy should be reasonable, since the decision had to be sent to 42 undertakings and associations of undertakings, concerned 24 separate infringements, and had to be drawn up in the nine official Community languages.'

f 106. The applicant itself acknowledged, in its letter to the defendant dated 28 September 2001, that the case was characterised by extreme complexity. The applicant referred, in particular, to the subject matter and the nature of the dispute, to its importance from the aspect of Community law and also to the difficulties of the case and to the number of undertakings concerned.

g 107. It should be noted, second, that the situations to be regulated in the present case were all the more complex because the undertakings concerned by the Commission's investigation were direct or indirect members of Cembureau. In the latter case, which applied to the applicant's situation, the undertakings concerned were represented within Cembureau by their respective associations.

h 108. It should be noted, third, that, as regards the part of the Cement decision which specifically concerned the applicant, the defendant was faced with a range of probative documents whose interpretation was unclear.

i 109. Thus, as regards the grounds which led to the annulment of the Cement decision, so far as the applicant was concerned, the Court of First Instance stated first of all (in the Cement judgment):

'3790. ... It is not ... apparent [from art 1 of the ECEC statutes of 6 December 1979, from art 1 of the statutes of 26 September 1986, from the minutes of the meeting held in Paris on 23 January 1979 and from an internal memorandum of Ciments Français of 7 March 1989] that the real object of the members of the ECEC was to reinforce the rule that there should be no transshipment to European home markets ... a

3792. ... Although [the Blue Circle memorandum of 1 December 1983] refers to a link between the rule that there should be no transshipment to home markets and the channelling of production surpluses, it cannot be presumed, on the basis of the mere existence of an export committee, that its members intended, through their activities in it, to "prevent incursions by competitors on respective national markets in the Community" ... b

110. As regards the direct or indirect affiliation of the members of the ECEC to Cembureau, the court observed: c

'3799. Admittedly, for the parties to the Cembureau agreement which took part in the activities of the ECEC after the conclusion of that agreement, the information exchanged during ECEC meetings concerning third country markets helped them to channel their production surpluses to non-European destinations and as such therefore facilitated the implementation of the Cembureau agreement. Amongst the members of the ECEC are several direct members of Cembureau (FIC, SFIC, Aalborg, Oficemen, Irish Cement, ATIC, Italcementi, Cementir and AGCI), whose participation in the Cembureau agreement is not in any doubt, as they participated in the meetings of the Head Delegates at which the Cembureau agreement was concluded and/or confirmed ... d

3800. However, that finding does not mean that the cooperation organised within the framework of the ECEC between all its members had as its object the reinforcement of the rule that there should be no transshipment to home markets.' e

111. As regards the relationships between the ECEC and the European Export Policy Committee (the EPC), the court observed: f

'3806. ... the Court finds, having regard to the evidence to which the Commission refers in the contested decision [i.e the documents mentioned at recital (32) of the Cement decision], that the members of the ECEC always took the view that the characteristics and identity of their export committee were independent of those of the EPC ... g

3821. ... Even if it is accepted that non-transshipment to home markets was the rule underlying cooperation in the EPC, the documents referred to in recital 32 of the contested decision do not therefore support the conclusion that the links which existed between the ECEC and the EPC had influenced the activities of the ECEC in such a way that the members of the ECEC had adopted the rule of not transshipping to internal markets for their activities within the ECEC.' h

112. As regards, last, the fact that the ECEC's activities were not restricted to large-scale exports, the court considered:

'3825. The Commission cannot, however, rely on [the] minutes [of the ECEC meeting of 22 March 1985] in order to prove that the cooperation within the ECEC aimed to reinforce the rule that there should be no transshipment to home markets through the channelling of production surpluses ... i 3827. The Court finds that none of the minutes cited in ... paragraph [3826] prove a link between imports from non-member a countries and the principle of non-transshipment to home markets ... In any event, the mere fact that on some occasions the situation of imports from non-member countries was examined does not prove that "the object and effect of the cooperation within the ECEC was to reinforce the rule that there should be no transshipment to home markets" ...

b 3828. As regards the documents referred to in recital 33, paragraph 5, of the contested decision, it is true, as the Commission submits, that some minutes refer to some information on the situation in the member countries. However, the mere mention of an item of information relating to an internal market of the Community at a meeting of the ECEC or of the ECEC Steering Committee does not necessarily prove that the activities of the ECEC aimed to "reinforce the rule that there should be no transshipment to home markets".

c 113. It follows that, without fundamentally calling in question the Commission's analysis as regards the application of art 85(1) of the EC Treaty to the agreements in question, the Court of First Instance confined itself in the Cement judgment to challenging the Commission's appraisal of the probative nature of certain documents used for the purpose of establishing the infringement in respect of certain applicants. In particular, it appears that the divergence in interpretation between the court and the Commission on that point concerned only a marginal activity of the cartel, namely that carried out in the context of co-operation between the parties within the ECEC, with a view to channelling their production surpluses with the aim of thus reinforcing the rule on non-transshipment to home markets, namely the market-sharing that constituted the real 'core' of the cartel. Furthermore, although the court annulled the Cement decision in so far as it concerned the applicant, it none the less found that the Commission had a certain amount of evidence of such a kind as to accredit its argument that the co-operation within the ECEC had the object and effect of reinforcing the rule on non-transshipment to home markets and it was only after making a detailed appraisal of the content of the documents in question that the court arrived at the conclusion that, seen in their entirety and taking account, in particular, of the explanations provided by the undertakings concerned, those documents did not allow it to be established to the requisite legal standard that the activity within the ECEC reinforced the rule on non-transshipment to home markets.

g 114. For all of those reasons, regard being had to the fact that Cement was a particularly complex case, involving a very large number of undertakings and almost the entire European cement industry, to the fact that the structure of Cembureau made the investigation difficult owing to the existence of direct and indirect members, and to the fact that it was necessary to analyse a great number of documents, including in the applicant's specific situation, it must be held that the defendant was faced with complex situations to be regulated.

h 115. Last, it is necessary to take account of the difficulties in applying the provisions of the EC Treaty in matters relating to cartels (see, by analogy, the Corus UK case (see para 8, above) (para 46)). Those practical difficulties were all the greater because the factual elements of the case in question, including in the part of the decision concerning the applicant, were numerous.

i 116. On all of those grounds, it must be held that the breach of Community law found in the Cement judgment as regards the part of the decision concerning the applicant is not sufficiently serious.

117. As regards the principle of fairness, which would render mandatory reimbursement of the bank guarantee charges, the applicant does not explain how that principle is intended to confer rights on individuals or how there is a sufficiently serious breach of that principle in the present case. The same applies to the principle of diligence which in the applicant's submission is borne by the defendant. Those arguments are therefore inoperative. a

118. In the light of the foregoing, the first condition which, according to the case law, allows the non-contractual liability of the Community to be incurred is not satisfied in the present case. b

The condition relating to the existence of a causal link between the conduct and the alleged damage

119. In any event, the Community can be held liable only for the damage which is a sufficiently direct consequence of the unlawful conduct of the institution concerned (see, in particular, P Dumortier Frères v EC Council Joined cases 64/76 and 113/76, 167/78 and 239/78, 27/79, 28/79 and 45/79 [1979] ECR 3091 (para 21), Blackspur DIY Ltd v EU Council Case T-168/94 [1995] ECR II-2627 (para 52), Fresh Marine Co SA v European Commission Case T-178/98 [2000] ECR II-3331 (para 118) and Meyer v European Commission Case T-333/01 [2003] ECR II-117 (para 32)). c

120. In the present case, it should first of all be borne in mind that, under art 9 of the Cement decision, fines of €3.841m and €1.85m respectively were imposed on Alsen Breitenburg and on Nordcement. Under the first paragraph of art 11 of that decision, the fines were to be paid within three months of the date of notification of the decision. Under the second paragraph of art 11, moreover, the fines attracted automatic interest upon expiry of that period. e

121. Under the first paragraph of art 192 of the EC Treaty (now art 256 EC), the Cement decision was enforceable in that regard, since it imposed a pecuniary obligation on persons other than states, notwithstanding the action for annulment of that decision initiated under art 173 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, art 230 EC). Pursuant to the first sentence of art 185 of the EC Treaty (now art 242 EC), actions brought before the Community judicature do not have suspensory effect (see Groupeement des Cartes Bancaires 'CB' v European Commission Case T-275/94 [1995] All ER (EC) 717, [1995] ECR II-2169 (paras 50–52)). f

122. It is common ground that the applicant, in derogation from those provisions, did not pay the fine imposed on it in art 9 of the Cement decision, as the Commission, in the letter notifying the applicant of that decision, gave it the opportunity to provide a bank guarantee as security for payment of the fine until such time as the Cement judgment had been pronounced. An undertaking which brings an action against a Commission decision imposing a fine on it has a choice: it can pay the fine on its becoming payable, together with default interest, should any such interest have accrued, at the rate set by the Commission in its decision; or it can apply for suspension of operation of the decision pursuant to the second sentence of art 185 of the EC Treaty; or, last, if the Commission so allows, it can provide a bank guarantee as security for payment of the fine and default interest, in accordance with the conditions laid down by the Commission (see the CB case (para 121, above) (para 54)). g
h
i

123. In those circumstances, the applicant cannot validly maintain that the bank guarantee charges which it incurred in the present case are the direct consequence of the unlawfulness of the Cement decision. The damage which it alleges in that regard is the consequence of its own decision not to comply

a with the obligation to pay the fine, in derogation from the rules laid down in the first paragraph of art 192 of the EC Treaty and the first sentence of art 185 of the EC Treaty, within the period prescribed by the Cement decision, by providing a bank guarantee.

124. It should further be emphasised that the two options open to the applicant, namely to bring an action against the Cement decision and also an application for suspension of operation of that decision (at least as regards payment of the fine) and to provide a bank guarantee in accordance with the option offered by the Commission, were real alternatives to immediate payment of the fine. Those options were, moreover, left entirely to the discretion of the undertakings (see, to that effect, the CB case (para 121, above) (paras 54, 55)). Those options were therefore not mandatory in nature as a consequence of the Cement decision. Furthermore, a number of undertakings (like the applicant) opted to provide bank guarantees, whereas others preferred to comply with the financial obligation arising under the Cement decision and to pay the relevant fine (see, in that regard, the Cement judgment (para 5116)). If the applicant had decided to pay the fine, it would thus have avoided having to pay the bank guarantee charges (see, in relation to default interest, the CB case (para 121, above) (para 83)).

125. None of the arguments put forward by the applicant is capable of calling that conclusion in question.

126. In particular, as regards the alleged circumstance that the considerations set out in the Corus UK case (see para 8, above) (para 57), may be transposed to the present case, it must be held that at that point in the judgment the Court of First Instance held not, as the applicant suggests, that the undertakings to which a decision imposing fines was addressed did not have a choice between paying the fine immediately and providing a bank guarantee, but that, first, by paying the fine, the undertaking merely complied with the operative part of a decision which was enforceable notwithstanding the action which it had brought before the court and, second, that the provision of a bank guarantee rather than immediate payment of the fine was a simple option allowed by the Commission to the undertaking concerned.

127. In any event, and without embarking here on an examination of possible damage or a detailed analysis of the differences between art 34 CS and art 233 EC, it must be emphasised that the considerations in the judgment in the Corus UK case (see para 8, above), which led the Court of First Instance to hold that, in the case of a judgment annulling or reducing the fine imposed on an undertaking for infringing the competition rules, the Commission is under an obligation to reimburse not only the principal amount of the fine which has been wrongly paid, but also the default interest on that amount, are not applicable where the undertaking concerned has provided a bank guarantee. It must be borne in mind that in the Corus UK case (see para 8, above), the court (at paras 54–56) based that obligation on the fact, first, that the obligation to reimburse in full the fine which has been wrongly paid cannot disregard the time elapsed, which has reduced the value of the fine, and, second, that failure to pay default interest would entail the unjust enrichment of the Community, which is contrary to the general principles of Community law.

128. Neither of those considerations can be relied on by the applicant in the present case.

129. As regards the first consideration, it should be observed that where a bank guarantee has been provided, the Commission is not required to reimburse a fine that was wrongly paid, since, ex hypothesi, the fine was not paid. The undertaking has therefore suffered no loss in value as regards the fine that it was required to pay immediately to the Commission, in light of the enforceable nature of the contested decision (see the second paragraph of art 192 of the EC Treaty) and the absence of suspensory effect of actions brought before the Court of First Instance (see the first sentence of art 185 of the EC Treaty). As stated above, the only financial damage that may have been sustained by the undertaking concerned is the consequence of its own decision to provide a bank guarantee in order to be in a position, in derogation from the rules set out above, not to pay the fine immediately, even though it has not secured a suspension of enforcement of the decision imposing the fine. a

130. As regards the second consideration, moreover, it must be held that, contrary to the situation in the Corus UK case (para 8, above), the Commission's failure to assume responsibility for the charges incurred in providing a bank guarantee does not entail any undue enrichment of the Community, since the bank guarantee charges are paid not to the Community but to a third party. Observance of the general principle prohibiting undue enrichment does not justify such reimbursement in any circumstances. Quite to the contrary, if the Commission were to assume responsibility for the charges incurred in providing a bank guarantee, that would allow the undertaking concerned to be placed in the situation in which it was before the contested decision was adopted, but the Commission, on the other hand, would be penalised, since it would be required to reimburse to the undertaking sums of which it did not have the benefit. b

131. Taking those factors into account, the causal link between the conduct attributed to the defendant and the alleged damage cannot in this case be qualified as sufficiently direct. c

132. In the light of the foregoing, and without there being any need to adjudicate on the damage alleged to have been sustained, the action based on art 235 EC and the second paragraph of art 288 EC, as concerns the costs of the bank guarantee after 31 January 1998, must be dismissed as unfounded. d

COSTS e

133. Under art 87(2) of the Rules of Procedure, the unsuccessful party is to be ordered to pay the costs if they have been applied for in the successful party's pleadings. Since the applicant has been unsuccessful in its submissions, it must be ordered to pay all the costs, in accordance with the form of order sought by the defendant. f

On those grounds, the Court of First Instance (Third Chamber) hereby:

- (1) Dismisses the action as inadmissible in so far as it is based on art 233 EC;
  - (2) Dismisses as inadmissible the alternative request that the action, in so far as it is based on art 233 EC, be interpreted as being an action for annulment or for failure to act; g
  - (3) Dismisses as inadmissible the claim for damages, as regards the bank guarantee charges incurred by the applicant before 31 January 1998;
  - (4) Dismisses the remainder of the application as unfounded;
  - (5) Orders the applicant to pay the costs. h
- i

European Commission v Tetra Laval BV

(Case C-12/03 P)

COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (GRAND CHAMBER)

JUDGES JANN (PRESIDENT OF THE FIRST CHAMBER, ACTING FOR THE PRESIDENT), TIMMERMANS AND ROSAS (RAPPORTEUR) (PRESIDENTS OF CHAMBERS), GULMANN, PUISSOCHET, SCHINTGEN, COLNERIC, VON BAHR AND CUNHA RODRIGUES
ADVOCATE GENERAL TIZZANO

27 JANUARY, 25 MAY 2004, 15 FEBRUARY 2005

European Community – Rules on competition – Mergers – Commission declaring proposed concentration incompatible with the common market – Collective dominant position – Requisite proof – Power of judicial review – Whether Court of First Instance erring in infringing Commission’s appraisal of concentration and failing to take account of the Commission’s discretion regarding factual and economic matters – Commission Decision C(2004) 124 – Council Regulation (EEC) 4064/89.

The applicant company was the group holding company of a group which included the Tetra Pak company. The Tetra Pak company was the world leader in the carton packaging sector and was regarded as holding a dominant position in aseptic packaging on that market. Sidel SA was a leading company in the production and supply of stretch blow moulding (SBM) machines, which were used for the production of polyethylene terephthalate (PET) packaging. The merger of the applicant and Sidel was notified to the Commission of the European Communities. The applicant entered into a number of commitments which included keeping the companies separate for ten years. The Commission declared the merger incompatible with the common market and the functioning of the Agreement on the European Economic Area by Commission Decision C(2004) 124 (Case No COMP/M.2416—Tetra Laval/Sidel). The Commission concluded, inter alia, that the markets for carton and PET packaging systems were distinct but closely related and potentially converging markets. Further, the notified merger would encourage the applicant to leverage its dominant position on the market for equipment and consumables for carton packaging so as to persuade its customers on that market who were switching to PET in order to package certain sensitive products, such as milk, to choose Sidel’s SBM machines, thereby excluding smaller competitors and turning Sidel’s leading position on the relevant market into a dominant position. Subsequently, the applicant brought an action for annulment of that decision. The Court of First Instance (the CFI) found that the Commission had committed manifest errors of assessment in its findings as to leveraging and the strengthening of the applicant’s dominant position in the carton sector and annulled the contested decision. The CFI held that, where the Commission takes the view that a merger should be prohibited because it will create or strengthen a dominant position within a foreseeable period, it was incumbent upon it to produce convincing evidence supporting that view. The CFI also stated that in order to assess the foreseeability of the merged entity’s conduct the Commission had to examine all the circumstances which might determine that conduct. Given that, in the case of a dominant undertaking, the supposed leveraging could constitute an abuse of the pre-existing dominant position, the CFI held that, when examining the likelihood of the adoption of anti-competitive conduct, the Commission had to have regard not only to the incentives to adopt such conduct but also to the factors liable to reduce, or even eliminate, those incentives, such as the probability of legal action against, and penalties for, such conduct. Since the Commission had failed to carry out such an examination, its findings could not be upheld. As regards the Commission's claim that '[the applicant's] current dominant position in carton packaging' would be strengthened by the elimination of a source of constraints on competition from neighbouring markets as a result of the elimination of competition from Sidel on the PET packaging market, the CFI held that the Commission had to prove that strengthening, which could not be inferred automatically from the fact that there was a dominant position. It found that the Commission had failed to provide such proof. The Commission appealed to the Court of Justice of the European Communities on a number of grounds. Those grounds included: firstly, that the CFI had erred in law as to the standard of proof which it was required to satisfy and as to the scope of the CFI's power of judicial review. Secondly, that arts 2<sup>a</sup> and 8<sup>b</sup> of Council Regulation (EEC) 4064/89 (on the control of concentrations between undertakings) had been infringed in so far as the CFI required the Commission to: (a) take account of the impact which the illegality of certain conduct had on the incentives for the merged entity to engage in leveraging; and (b) to assess, as a potential remedy, the commitments not to adopt any abusive conduct. Additionally it alleged infringement of art 2, distortion of the facts and failure to take account of the Commission's arguments in that the CFI had failed to recognise the merits of the Commission's finding that the applicant would strengthen its dominant position in the carton sector.

Held – (1) The CFI had correctly set out the tests to be applied when carrying out judicial review of a Commission decision on concentration. While the Commission had a margin of discretion with regard to economic matters, that did not mean that the Community courts had to refrain from reviewing the Commission's interpretation of information of an economic nature. Not only should the Community courts, inter alia, establish whether the evidence relied on was factually accurate, reliable and consistent but also whether that evidence contained all the information which had to be taken into account in order to assess a complex situation and whether it was capable of substantiating the conclusions drawn from it. Such a review was all the more necessary in the case of a prospective analysis required when examining a planned merger with conglomerate effect. Further, the CFI had not erred in specifying the quality of the evidence which the Commission was required to produce in order to demonstrate that the requirements of art 2(3) were satisfied. Proof of anti-competitive conglomerate effects of a merger of the kind notified in the instant case, involved prospective analysis in which the chains of cause and effect were dimly discernible, uncertain and difficult to establish. Therefore the quality of the evidence produced by the Commission

a Article 2 of Regulation 4064/89 is set out at judgment para 2, below

b Article 8 of Regulation 4064/89 provides, so far as material: '... (2) Where the Commission finds that, following modification by the undertakings concerned if necessary, a notified concentration fulfils the criterion laid down in Article 2(2), it shall issue a declaration declaring the concentration compatible with the common market ...'

a in order to establish that it was necessary to adopt a decision declaring the concentration incompatible with the common market was particularly important, as that evidence had to support the Commission's conclusion that, were the decision not to be adopted, the economic development envisaged by the Commission would be plausible. In the present case, the CFI had carried out its review in the manner required and had observed the criteria to be applied in exercising its power of review. Accordingly, arts 2(2) or (3) had not been infringed (see judgment paras 38–40, 44, 45, 48, 49, below).

b (2) Although the CFI had erred in law by rejecting the Commission's conclusions as to the adoption by the merged entity of conduct likely to result in leveraging, it was nevertheless right to hold that the Commission should have taken account of the commitments offered by the applicant with regard to its future conduct. The CFI's error had been to reject the Commission's conclusions as to the adoption by the merged entity of anti-competitive conduct capable of leveraging on the sole ground that the Commission had, when assessing the likelihood of such conduct, failed to take account of the unlawfulness of that conduct and consequently the likelihood of its detection, c of action by the competent authorities and of the financial penalties which might ensue. Accordingly, whilst the ground of appeal was well founded in part, it could not call into question the judgment under appeal in so far as it annulled the contested decision since that annulment had been based, d inter alia, on the Commission's refusal to take account of those commitments (see judgment paras 78, 89, below).

e (3) The CFI had been correct to point out that although an important factor, the mere fact that the acquiring undertaking already held a clear dominant position on the relevant market did not in itself justify a finding that a reduction in the potential competition which that undertaking had to face constituted a strengthening of its position. The potential competition represented by a producer of substituted products on a segment of the relevant market was only one of the factors which had to be taken into account when assessing whether there was a risk that a concentration might strengthen a dominant position. It could not be ruled out that a reduction in potential competition might be compensated by other factors, with the result that the competitive position of the already dominant undertaking remained unchanged. The CFI had been right to state in connection with the parties' arguments regarding a lack of innovation in the carton sector that the Commission had to show that, if there was a reduction in potential competition, this will tend to strengthen the applicant's dominant position in relation to its competitor on the aseptic carton market. Thus the CFI had relied on the potential reactions of the applicant's competitors as a basis for refuting the contention that the applicant might be encouraged to increase prices on the aseptic carton market or to innovate less. Accordingly, that part of the ground of appeal in which the Commission claimed that the potential competition was unrelated to the competitive relationship between the undertaking regarded as dominant and other undertakings active on the relevant market could not be regarded as well-founded (see judgment paras 126–130, below).

i

Notes

For abuse of a dominant position by one or more undertakings in regard to Community competition law, see 47 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2001 reissue) paras 353, 356.

Cases cited

- Aalborg Portland A/S v European Commission* Joined cases C-204/00 P, C-205/00 P, C-211/00 P, C-213/00 P, C-217/00 P and C-219/00 P [2004] ECR I-123, ECJ.
- Air France (SA à Participation Ouvrière Cie Nationale) v EC Commission* Case T-2/93 [1994] ECR II-323, CFI.
- Airtours plc v European Commission* Case T-342/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 783, [2002] ECR II-2585, CFI.
- AKZO Chemie BV v EC Commission* Case C-62/86 [1991] ECR I-3359, ECJ.
- British American Tobacco Co Ltd v EC Commission* Joined cases 142/84 and 156/84 [1987] ECR 4487, ECJ.
- Cie Maritime Belge Transports SA v European Commission* Joined cases C-395/96 P and C-396/96 P [2000] All ER (EC) 385, [2000] ECR I-1365, ECJ.
- Coca-Cola Co v European Commission* (supported by The Virgin Trading Co Ltd and anor, interveners) Joined cases T-125/97 and T-127/97 [2000] All ER (EC) 460, [2000] ECR II-1733, CFI.
- Culin v EC Commission* Case C-343/87 [1990] ECR I-225, ECJ.
- Deere (John) Ltd v European Commission* Case C-7/95 P [1998] All ER (EC) 481n, [1998] ECR I-3111, ECJ.
- European Commission v Camar Srl* Case C-312/00 P [2002] ECR I-11355, ECJ.
- France v European Commission* Joined cases C-68/94 and C-30/95 [1998] ECR I-1375, ECJ.
- Gencor Ltd v European Commission* (Germany intervening) Case T-102/96 [1999] All ER (EC) 289, [1999] ECR II-753, CFI.
- Hilti AG v EC Commission* Case C-53/92 P [1994] ECR I-667, ECJ.
- Hoffmann-La Roche & Co AG v EC Commission* Case 85/76 [1979] ECR 461, ECJ.
- Italy v European Commission* Joined cases C-15/98 and C-105/99 [2000] ECR I-8855, ECJ.
- Lestelle v EC Commission* Case C-30/91 P [1992] ECR I-3755, ECJ.
- Michel v European Parliament* Case 195/80 [1981] ECR 2861, ECJ.
- Nederlandsche Banden-Industrie Michelin (NV) v EC Commission* Case 322/81 [1983] ECR 3461, ECJ.
- New Holland Ford Ltd v European Commission* Case C-8/95 P [1998] ECR I-3175, ECJ.
- Remia BV v EC Commission* Case 42/84 [1985] ECR 2545, ECJ.
- Salzgitter AG (formerly Preussag Stahl AG) v European Commission* Case C-210/98 P [2000] ECR I-5843, ECJ.
- Società Finanziaria Siderurgica Finsider SpA (in liq) v European Commission* Case C-320/92 P [1994] ECR I-5697, ECJ.
- Tetra Pak International SA v EC Commission* Case T-51/89 [1990] ECR II-309, CFI.
- Tetra Pak International SA v EC Commission* Case T-83/91 [1994] ECR II-755, CFI; affd Case C-333/94 P [1996] ECR I-5951, ECJ.

Appeal

By application lodged at the Court Registry on 8 January 2003, the Commission of the European Communities brought an appeal under art 49 of the EC Statute of the Court of Justice against the judgment of the Court of First Instance in Tetra Laval BV v European Commission Case T-5/02 [2003] All ER (EC) 762, [2002] ECR II-4381, by which the Court of First Instance annulled Commission Decision (EC) 2004/124 declaring a concentration to be incompatible with the common market and the EEA Agreement (Case No COMP/M.2416—Tetra Laval/Sidel). The Commission was represented by

- a M Petite, A Whelan and P Hellström, acting as agents, with an address for service in Luxembourg. Tetra Laval BV, a company established in Amsterdam, Netherlands, was represented by A Vandencastele and D Waelbroeck of the Brussels Bar, M Johnsson of the Swedish Bar and A Weitbrecht and S Völcker, Rechtsanwälte. The language of the case was English. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General.

b

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Paragraphs
I—THE RELEVANT PROVISIONS	2–4
II—FACTS AND PROCEDURE	5–56
c The concentration notified and the procedure before the Commission	5
The contested decision	6–27
The judgment under appeal	28–53
The appeal and the procedure before the Court of Justice of the European Communities	54–56
d III—LEGAL ANALYSIS	57–197
General considerations on the admissibility of appeals against judgments of the Court of First Instance	59–61
The ground of appeal relating to an error of law concerning the standard of proof required and the scope of judicial review	62–112
e Concerning the ground of appeal relating to the requirement that the unlawful nature of certain behaviour should be taken into consideration and that purely behavioural commitments should be taken into account	113–128
The ground of appeal relating to the definition of distinct markets for SBM machines depending on their end use	129–145
f The ground of appeal relating to the strengthening of Tetra's dominant position in carton	146–167
The ground of appeal relating to the creation of a dominant position for Tetra in SBM machines	168–193
Concluding considerations on the outcome of the appeal	194–196
g Costs	197
IV—CONCLUSION	198

25 May 2004. The Advocate General (A Tizzano) delivered the following opinion<sup>1</sup>.

- h 1. The subject matter of this case is an appeal brought by the Commission of the European Communities against the judgment of the Court of First Instance of 23 October 2002 in Tetra Laval BV v European Commission Case T-5/02 [2003] All ER (EC) 762, [2002] ECR II-4381 which annulled Commission Decision C(2001) 3345 final declaring a concentration to be incompatible with the common market and with the EEA Agreement (Case No COMP/M.2416—Tetra Laval/Sidel).

i

I—THE RELEVANT PROVISIONS

2. As everyone knows, in order to contribute to the creation of 'a system ensuring that competition in the internal market is not distorted' (see art 3(f) of the EEC Treaty, then, after amendment, art 3(g) of the EC Treaty, now art 3(g) EC), Council Regulation (EEC) 4064/89<sup>2</sup> (the Merger Regulation or just the regulation) introduced control of concentrations with a Community dimension<sup>3</sup>. For that purpose, it provided in particular that prior notification of those operations should be made to the Commission, which is called upon to appraise their compatibility with the common market.

<sup>1</sup> Original language: Italian.

3. In accordance with art 2(1) of the regulation, in making that appraisal the Commission is to take into account—

(a) the need to preserve and develop effective competition within the common market in view of, among other things, the structure of all the markets concerned and the actual or potential competition from undertakings located either within or without the Community;

(b) the market position of the undertakings concerned and their economic and financial power, the opportunities available to suppliers and users, their access to supplies or markets, any legal or other barriers to entry, supply and demand trends for the relevant goods and services, the interests of the intermediate and ultimate consumers, and the development of technical and economic progress provided that it is to consumers' advantage and does not form an obstacle to competition.'

4. The subsequent subparagraphs of art 2 then provide:

—on the one hand, that '[a] concentration which does not create or strengthen a dominant position as a result of which effective competition would be significantly impeded in the common market or in a substantial part of it shall be declared compatible with the common market' (sub-para (2));

—on the other hand, that '[a] concentration which creates or strengthens a dominant position as a result of which effective competition would be significantly impeded in the common market or in a substantial part of it shall be declared incompatible with the common market' (sub-para (3)).

II—FACTS AND PROCEDURE

The concentration notified and the procedure before the Commission

5. The relevant parts of the reconstruction of the facts in the judgment under appeal reveal the following:

'9. On 27 March 2001, Tetra Laval SA, a privately held company incorporated under French law and a wholly owned subsidiary of Tetra Laval BV (Tetra or the applicant), a holding company belonging to the Tetra Laval group, announced a public bid for all outstanding shares in Sidel SA (Sidel), a French publicly-quoted company. On the same day, Tetra Laval SA acquired roughly 9.75% of the shares in Sidel from Azeo (5.56%) and Sidel's directors (4.19%) ...

11. Pursuant to the bid, Tetra acquired approximately 81.3%, of the outstanding shares in Sidel. After the closing of the bid, the applicant acquired certain additional shares, making its current holdings roughly 95.2% of the shares and 95.93% of the voting rights in Sidel.

<sup>2</sup> On the control of concentrations between undertakings (OJ 1989 L395 p 1; corrigendum in OJ 1990 L257 p 13). Regulation 4064/89 was amended by Council Regulation (EC) 1310/97 (OJ 1997 L180 p 1).

<sup>3</sup> What is meant by 'concentrations' is explained in art 3 of the regulation, while art 1(2) and (3) makes clear in what circumstances a concentration may have a 'Community dimension'.

a 12. Tetra comprises, inter alia, the Tetra Pak company, which is mainly active in the area of liquid food carton packaging, where Tetra Pak is the worldwide market leader. Tetra also has more limited activities in the plastic packaging sector, mainly as a converter (which consists of manufacturing and supplying empty packaging to producers who then fill the packaging themselves), particularly of high density polyethylene (HDPE) bottles.

b 13. Sidel is involved in the design and production of packaging equipment and systems, particularly stretch blow moulding machines (SBM machines), which are used in the production of polyethylene terephthalate (PET) plastic bottles. It is the worldwide leader for the production and supply of SBM machines. It is also active in barrier technology, used to make PET compatible with products which are sensitive to gas and light, as well as in the manufacture of filling machines for PET and, to a lesser extent, HDPE bottles.

c 14. On 18 May 2001, the operations by which Tetra acquired its shareholding in Sidel were notified to the Commission.

d 15. It is agreed by the parties that those operations (the merger or the notified transaction) constitute an acquisition within the meaning of art 3(1)(b) of Regulation 4064/89 and that the merger has a Community dimension within the meaning of art 1(2) thereof.

e 16. By decision of 5 July 2001, the Commission, having concluded that the merger raised serious doubts as to its compatibility with the common market and the Agreement on the European Economic Area (the EEA Agreement), initiated proceedings in accordance with art 6(1)(c) of Regulation 4064/89 ...

f 19. On 25 September 2001, the applicant proposed a number of commitments, in accordance with art 8(2) of Regulation 4064/89, with a view to remedying the competition concerns expressed in the first statement of objections ...

21. On 9 October 2001, the applicant offered the Commission a new set of firm commitments (the commitments), replacing those dated 25 September 2001 ...

g 24. By decision of 30 October 2001 (Commission Decision C(2001) 3345 (Case No COMP/M.2416—Tetra Laval/Sidel)) (the contested decision), the Commission declared the notified transaction incompatible with the common market and the functioning of the EEA Agreement, pursuant to art 8(3) of Regulation 4064/89 ...

h 26. In the light of the findings in the contested decision and following a separate administrative procedure initiated by the sending of a statement of objections to Tetra on 19 November 2001, the Commission adopted, on 30 January 2002, a decision setting out measures in order to restore conditions of effective competition pursuant to art 8(4) of the regulation (Case No COMP/M.2416—Tetra Laval/Sidel).'

i The contested decision

6. If I confine myself to the core passages, and reserve the right to return in greater detail to certain aspects of particular importance to this case, the contested decision can be briefly summarised as follows.

7. After describing in general terms the packaging for liquid foods industry, the Commission analysed the relevant product markets, starting with an assessment of whether it was possible to substitute alternative packaging materials and, in consequence, alternative packaging systems. a

8. For the purposes of that analysis, the Commission considered it appropriate to use 'end-use segmentation'; that is to say, to assess by reference to the kind of liquid to be packaged whether or not the various packaging materials and systems are substitutable<sup>4</sup>. From that point of view, and considering that Tetra and Sidel were active chiefly in the segments of carton and PET packaging, the Commission focused its analysis in particular on drinks that could be packaged in both those materials ('common' or 'sensitive' products), namely: liquid dairy products (referred to in the contested judgment also as 'LDPs'<sup>5</sup>); 'juices' and 'nectars' (which in the contested decision and judgment are referred to simply as 'juices'); 'fruit-flavoured still drinks' (which in the decision are simply called 'fruit-flavoured drinks' and in the judgment 'FFDs') and 'ready-to-drink tea and coffee drinks' (referred to in the decision and judgment simply as 'tea/coffee drinks')<sup>6</sup>. b c

9. Examining the interrelation between the two materials, the Commission began by pointing out that although they have 'traditionally been used for ... different beverages'<sup>7</sup>, 'PET is a suitable material for the packaging of all the products that have been traditionally packaged in carton'<sup>8</sup>. Following a full analysis and in particular 'in the light of recent and forthcoming technological developments, cost and marketing considerations', the Commission arrived at the conclusion that 'PET use in the common product segments will grow significantly in the next five years'<sup>9</sup>. d

10. The Commission then stated— e

'that although substitution between the ... systems [of carton and PET packaging] does not currently have the necessary effectiveness and immediacy required for the purposes of market definition (i.e. they are weak substitutes), this may change in the future.'

It also concluded that— f

'given their presence in the same sector of liquid-food packaging, their common product segments, customer base and increasing use of aseptic technology, the two packaging systems belong to two very closely neighbouring markets.'<sup>10</sup>

11. Having said that, the Commission found it 'necessary to analyse whether there are distinct relevant product markets for specific equipment within each packaging system'<sup>11</sup>. g

4 See in particular recitals (40) and (44) of the decision.

5 This footnote is not relevant in the English version. h

6 See in particular recitals (12) and (45) of the decision.

7 Recital (55), in which it is explained that 'PET and carton have traditionally been used for packaging different beverages. This is mainly due to different physical characteristics of these packaging solutions. Carton is non-transparent and hence suitable for oxygen and light-sensitive products but cannot withstand carbonation. PET is transparent and can withstand carbonation but has been traditionally less suitable for oxygen and light-sensitive products. As a result, carton has been used mainly for LDPs (primarily white milk) and juices whereas PET has been principally used for water (still and carbonated) and CSDs [carbonated soft drinks]'. i

8 Recital (57).

9 Recital (103).

10 Recital (163).

11 Recital (164).

a 12. As a result of that analysis, with reference to the PET packaging systems<sup>12</sup>, the Commission concluded: (i) that 'high-capacity stretch blow-moulding [SBM] machines form a separate market from low-capacity SBM machines' and that, '[in] the light of the specific characteristics of the "sensitive" products and the ability for price discrimination', 'separate relevant markets exist for each distinct group of customers on the basis of end-use in particular in the four "sensitive" beverage segments'<sup>13</sup>; (ii) that the various 'barrier technologies for PET form part of the same product market'<sup>14</sup>; (iii) that there existed 'two distinct product markets for aseptic PET filling machines and non-aseptic PET filling machines'<sup>15</sup>; (iv) and that 'preforms [for PET] are a distinct product market'<sup>16</sup>.

b 13. With reference to carton packaging systems on the other hand, the Commission has—

'concluded that there are four distinct product markets: aseptic carton packaging machines, aseptic cartons, non-aseptic carton packaging machines and non-aseptic cartons.'<sup>17</sup>

d 14. After making those statements with regard to the relevant product markets, the Commission then went on to a rapid examination of the geographical dimension of those markets, concluding that for them 'the relevant geographic market ... is the EEA'<sup>18</sup>.

15. Turning to an assessment of the effect on competition of the notified concentration, the Commission began by finding that before the concentration e Tetra already held 'a dominant position on the market for aseptic packaging machines and cartons and a leading position on the market for non-aseptic

f 12 With regard to those systems, it ought to be borne in mind that '[p]ackaging of liquid-food in PET bottles requires a combination of distinct machinery and, if required, a barrier technology. There are three distinct stages in the packaging process: (a) production of plastic preforms, the preproduction tubes used to make PET bottles; (b) production of empty PET bottles using the plastic preforms in specialised stretch blow-moulding machines (SBM machines) and (c) filling of the finished PET bottles with the liquid using a dedicated filling machine' (see recital (20) of the contested decision). In the PET packaging systems '[l]iquids are packaged in two main ways: in-house by the liquid producers themselves and by "bottle converters". In-house packaging requires the purchase of packaging equipment and installation of packaging lines at the premises of the beverage company. By contrast, converters produce empty packages, which are then either filled by filling companies or sold to beverage companies for filling in-house' (see recital (15) of the decision).

g 13 Recital (188).

14 Recital (199). In this regard I would point out that 'for oxygen-sensitive products (such as juices or beer), the gas barrier properties of a PET bottle need to be enhanced ... To enhance the barrier properties of PET, a barrier technology is applied onto the standard PET bottle ... For light-sensitive products such as UHT white milk a light barrier needs to be added' (see recitals (22)–(24) of the decision).

h 15 Recital (204). In this connection, I would note that 'non-aseptic PET filling machines are generally used for carbonated drinks, mineral water, edible oils and fresh milk. Aseptic PET filling machines are used for ambient juices, fruit or flavoured still drinks, ready-to-drink tea and coffee drinks and liquid dairy products ...' (see recital (21) of the decision).

16 Recital (206).

i 17 Recital (209). With regard to such systems, it is helpful to note that '[u]nlike PET with its distinct stages of production (preforms, empty bottles, filling), the liquid-food carton business is one of integrated pack construction, filling and sealing ... All these operations are done on one carton packaging machine within the beverage company's factory ... There are distinct aseptic and non-aseptic carton machines and the distinction between aseptic and non-aseptic carton packaging runs throughout the packaging process' (see recital (28) of the decision).

18 Recital (212).

packaging machines and cartons'; moreover, it also held 'a dominant position in the carton packaging market as a whole'<sup>19</sup>. Before the notified concentration Sidel, on the other hand, held— a

'a leading position in the high and low-capacity SBM machine market across all end-use segmentations and a strong position in other PET packaging equipment, in particular aseptic filling machines, secondary equipment and associated services.'<sup>20</sup> b

16. In those circumstances, the Commission assessed whether the concentration notified would lead to the creation or strengthening of one or more dominant positions within the meaning of art 2 of the Merger Regulation. c

17. In that regard, the Commission first of all found that—

'[t]he proposed transaction produces direct horizontal effects as both parties are active in three distinct product markets: SBM machines (low capacity); barrier technology and aseptic PET filling machines.'

According to the Commission, 'the already strong position of Sidel' would as a result 'immediately be strengthened further through the merger.'<sup>21</sup> d

18. More particularly, with reference to the 'horizontal effects' of the merger, the Commission concluded: (i) that 'the low-capacity market would become more concentrated as a result of the operation' and that 'Tetra/Sidel would be by far the leading company throughout the entire spectrum of SBM machinery from the simplest low-capacity machines to the highest-capacity and most technologically advanced machines'<sup>22</sup>; (ii) 'that the combination of the parties'... technologies would enhance the merged entity's position in the barrier technology market significantly', even though 'not to the extent that a dominant position would be created'<sup>23</sup>; and (iii) 'that the merged entity would have a strong position in aseptic PET filling machines'.<sup>24</sup> e

19. The Commission then examined the 'vertical effects' of the merger, finding that it would result in 'Tetra/Sidel being vertically integrated in three packaging systems: carton, HDPE and PET'. That could 'create a channel conflict with independent converters with possible anti-competitive effects'. The Commission did not, however, conclude that 'these vertical concerns would, by themselves, result in the creation of a dominant position for PET equipment or preforms'<sup>25</sup>. f

20. After making those findings in respect of the 'horizontal' and 'vertical' effects of the merger, the Commission went on to assess the possible 'conglomerate' anti-competitive effects arising from the fact that the body created by the merger would occupy a strong position in neighbouring markets, such as those in carton and carton packaging equipment and those in PET packaging equipment. Such an assessment, in its opinion, was made especially necessary by the close links between the various markets, due to the fact that— g

19 Recital (231).

20 Recital (259).

21 Recital (263).

22 Recitals (269), (270).

23 Recital (282).

24 Recital (290).

25 Recital (324).

a 'PET is already becoming an important alternative, as well as complementary, packaging to carton in the "sensitive" product markets and that it will continue to grow in importance.'<sup>26</sup>

21. From that point of view, the Commission first of all appraised whether the merged entity might not exploit its dominance in the carton sector in order to gain a dominant position in the markets for PET packaging equipment ('leveraging'). In this connection, following a thorough analysis, the Commission arrived at the conclusion—

c 'that, by combining the dominant company in carton packaging, Tetra, and the leading company in PET packaging equipment, Sidel, the proposed transaction would create a market structure which would provide the merged entity with the incentives and tools to turn its leading position in PET packaging equipment, in particular SBM machines (low and high-capacity) used for the "sensitive" product segments into a dominant position. This is also likely to enhance the merged entity's position and have anti-competitive effects on the overall SBM machine market.'<sup>27</sup>

22. The Commission then assessed the possible effects of the notified merger on Tetra's dominant position in carton. On this point, considering that 'carton and PET packaging systems form ... closely neighbouring product markets that exert some competitive constraint on one another', it came to the conclusion that 'by eliminating Sidel as a growing competitive constraint in a closely neighbouring market, Tetra's position in carton packaging would be strengthened'<sup>28</sup>.

e 23. Last, the Commission assessed whether the merged entity's dominance in carton and PET packaging equipment could lead to further strengthening of its predominance. In this respect, it considered it—

f 'likely that, through the merger, the merged entity's position in the end-use sectors of "sensitive" products would marginalise competitors and raise barriers to entry thus reinforcing dominance in the relevant markets for carton packaging equipment and PET packaging equipment in particular SBM machines used for "sensitive" products.'<sup>29</sup>

g 24. After carrying out those assessments of the effect on competition of the notified transaction, the Commission went on to evaluate the commitments offered by Tetra, namely: (i) 'divestiture of Tetra's SBM business'; (ii) 'divestiture of Tetra's PET preform business'; (iii) 'holding Sidel separate from TetraPak companies' and (iv) 'granting a licence of Sidel's SBM business for sale to customers filling "sensitive" products and for sales to converters'<sup>30</sup>.

h 25. Following a swift examination of those commitments, the Commission considered, however, that they were 'insufficient to eliminate the major competition concerns identified on the PET packaging equipment and carton packaging markets', since the 'two divestitures will have a minimal impact on the position of the merged entity'; the licence, apart from being 'insufficient to

i

26 Recital (337).

27 Recital (389).

28 Recitals (397), (399).

29 Recital (408).

30 Recital (410).

remove the Commission's competition concerns ... does not appear to be a viable option and may actually introduce complex mechanisms in the market resulting in artificial regulation', and 'the two behavioural commitments are considered insufficient as such to resolve the concerns arising from the structure of the market following the merger'<sup>31</sup>.

26. The Commission therefore concluded 'that, given both the lack of viability of the proposed commitments and their overall insufficiency to address the competition concerns raised by the transaction', they were not 'sufficient to remove the identified competition concerns and thus cannot form the basis for an authorisation decision'<sup>32</sup>.

27. Having regard to the considerations summarised above, the Commission concluded therefore—

'that the notified concentration would create a dominant position in the market for PET packaging equipment, in particular SBM machines used for the "sensitive" product segments, and strengthen a dominant position in aseptic carton packaging equipment and aseptic cartons in the EEA, as a result of which effective competition would be significantly impeded in the common market and in the EEA.'<sup>33</sup>

Taking the view that the commitments proposed by Tetra were considered insufficient to remedy that situation, the Commission accordingly declared the concentration 'incompatible with the common market and the functioning of the EEA Agreement'<sup>34</sup>.

The judgment under appeal

28. By action lodged at the Registry of the Court of First Instance on 15 January 2002, Tetra challenged the Commission's decision. By judgment of 25 October 2002 the Court of First Instance granted the application, annulling the contested decision.

29. If I again confine myself to the essential passages and reserve the right to return in greater detail to certain aspects, the judgment can be briefly summarised as follows.

30. After dismissing the plea in the action alleging 'infringement of the right of access to the file'<sup>35</sup>, the Court of First Instance—so far as is of more direct interest here—dwelled: (i) on the pleas based on the absence of horizontal or vertical anti-competitive effects of the modified merger<sup>36</sup> and (ii) on 'the plea based on the lack of foreseeable conglomerate effect'.

31. With reference to the pleas concerning the 'horizontal' and 'vertical' effects of the merger, the Court of First Instance began by finding—

'that, even though the Commission did not base the contested decision on those ... effects, it did take them into account in support of its finding that the modified merger must be prohibited.'<sup>37</sup>

31 Recital (424).

32 Recital (451).

33 Recital (452).

34 Article 1 of the operative part.

35 Paragraphs 83–118.

36 By 'modified merger' the Court of First Instance means 'the merger as modified by the commitments' (see para 81).

37 Paragraph 124.

- a 32. Having said that, the Court of First Instance found that, taking into account the commitments proposed by Tetra—
‘the negative horizontal effects of the merger referred to by the Commission in the contested decision are merely minimal, if not almost non-existent, on the various relevant PET packaging equipment markets.’
- b On that basis it concluded—‘that the Commission made a manifest error of assessment in so far as it relied on the horizontal effects of the modified merger to support its finding that a dominant position on those PET markets would be created for the merged entity through leveraging.’<sup>38</sup>
- c 33. Similarly, the Court of First Instance found that—‘it has not been shown that the modified merger would result in sizeable or, at the very least, significant vertical effects on the relevant market for PET packaging equipment.’
- d In such circumstances, it had, in its opinion, necessarily to find—‘that the Commission made a manifest error of assessment in so far as it relied on the vertical effects of the modified merger to support its finding that a dominant position on those PET markets would be created for the merged entity through leveraging.’<sup>39</sup>
- e 34. According to the Court of First Instance, however, the ‘manifest errors of assessment’ into which the Commission fell ‘in relying on the horizontal and vertical effects of the modified merger to support its analysis of the creation of a dominant position on the relevant PET markets’ did not, however, ‘lead to the annulment of the contested decision, since the conglomerate effect alleged by the Commission could by itself suffice to justify the decision’<sup>40</sup>.
- f 35. Coming to the ‘plea based on the lack of foreseeable conglomerate effect’, the Court of First Instance went on to examine in turn—
‘the three pillars of the Commission’s reasoning concerning leveraging, the elimination of potential competition and the general effect of strengthening the competitive position of the merged entity.’<sup>41</sup>
- g 36. Beginning with the first of those pillars, the Court of First Instance noted first of all that, as the Commission itself had acknowledged, ‘leveraging by Tetra through the conduct described [in the decision]’<sup>42</sup> could constitute abuse of Tetra’s pre-existing dominant position in the aseptic carton markets’<sup>43</sup>. In such a case, according to the Court of First Instance, the Commission ought to have assessed—
- h

---

38 Paragraph 132.

39 Paragraph 140.

40 Paragraph 141.

41 Paragraph 145.

i 42 In this connection, summarising the contents of the decision, the Court of First Instance noted that ‘the leveraging from the aseptic carton market ... would manifest itself—in addition to the possibility of the merged entity’s engaging in practices such as tying sales of carton packaging equipment and consumables to sales of PET packaging equipment and forced sales (recitals (345), (365))—firstly, by the probability of predatory pricing by the merged entity (recital (364) ...) secondly, by price wars; and, thirdly, by the granting of loyalty rebates.’ (See para 156.)

43 Paragraph 158.

'whether, despite the prohibition of such conduct, it is none the less likely that the entity resulting from the merger will act in such a manner or whether, on the contrary, the illegal nature of the conduct and/or the risk of detection will make such a strategy unlikely. While it is appropriate to take account, in its assessment, of incentives to engage in anti-competitive practices, such as those resulting in the present case for Tetra from the commercial advantages which may be foreseen on the PET equipment markets ... the Commission must also consider the extent to which those incentives would be reduced, or even eliminated, owing to the illegality of the conduct in question, the likelihood of its detection, action taken by the competent authorities, both at Community and national level, and the financial penalties which could ensue.'<sup>44</sup>

37. Since, therefore, 'the Commission did not carry out such an assessment in the contested decision', the Court of First Instance stated that—

'in so far as the Commission's assessment is based on the possibility, or even the probability, that Tetra will engage in such conduct in the aseptic carton markets, its findings in this respect cannot be upheld.'<sup>45</sup>

38. Likewise, the Court of First Instance held that—

'the fact that the applicant offered commitments regarding its future conduct is also a factor which the Commission should have taken into account in assessing whether it was likely that the merged entity would act in a manner which could result in the creation of a dominant position on one or more of the relevant PET equipment markets.'

However—

'[t]here is no indication in the contested decision that the Commission took account of the implications of those commitments when it assessed the creation of such a position in future through leveraging.'<sup>46</sup>

39. The Court of First Instance then concluded in examining 'whether the Commission based its analysis of the likelihood of leveraging ... and of the consequences ... on sufficiently convincing evidence', it was necessary 'to take account only of conduct which would, at least probably, not be illegal'<sup>47</sup>.

40. Having said that, and going on with its analysis, the Court of First Instance asserted that 'the Commission did not commit a manifest error of assessment in finding that it would be possible for the merged entity to engage in leveraging practices'<sup>48</sup>. In particular, according to the Court of First Instance, that institution had 'established to the requisite legal standard that growth in the PET market is foreseeable, rendering possible the occurrence of the predicted leveraging'<sup>49</sup>.

41. Since, however, the contested decision indicates 'that the incentive for the merged entity to exercise leveraging depends to a large extent on

<sup>44</sup> Paragraph 159.

<sup>45</sup> Paragraph 160.

<sup>46</sup> Paragraph 161.

<sup>47</sup> Paragraph 162.

<sup>48</sup> Paragraph 199.

<sup>49</sup> Paragraph 195.

a the anticipated level of growth in the PET markets', the Court of First Instance found it necessary to examine whether, as the applicant maintained—

b 'the foreseeable volume of sensitive products packaged in PET by 2005, as compared with the total future volume of products packaged in PET, makes that incentive unlikely or at least reduces the likelihood significantly.'<sup>50</sup>

42. At the outcome of that examination, it concluded that—

c 'the growth forecasts for LDPs and juices as stated by the Commission in the contested decision have not been proven to the requisite legal standard. Although a certain amount of growth in those segments is likely, especially for premium products, convincing evidence of the extent of the growth is lacking.'<sup>51</sup>

According to the Court of First Instance, however—

d 'having regard to the fact that PET use will probably increase by 2005, even if less sharply than that forecast by the Commission, the incentive to leverage cannot be excluded.'<sup>52</sup>

e 43. Given the foregoing, the Court of First Instance went on 'to examine the ways in which the merged entity could engage in leveraging'<sup>53</sup>. On that point, it found that by limiting the analysis 'to those [practices] which, at least probably, do not constitute an abuse of a dominant position on the aseptic carton markets'<sup>54</sup>, and taking into consideration the commitments proposed by Tetra, it had to 'be found that the merged entity's possible means of leveraging would be quite limited'<sup>55</sup>. Account would therefore have to be taken of that in 'examination of the foreseeable consequences of its resorting to such conduct'<sup>56</sup>.

f 44. Turning to the consideration of those consequences, the Court of First Instance found that it was 'necessary to distinguish the various PET equipment markets from those specifically for SBM machines'<sup>57</sup>.

45. As regards the former, following a careful market-by-market analysis, the Court of First Instance concluded—

g 'that the contested decision does not provide sufficiently convincing evidence to show that leveraging from the aseptic carton market would enable a dominant position to be created for the new entity by 2005 on the markets for barrier technology, aseptic and non-aseptic filling machines, plastic bottle closure systems and auxiliary equipment.'<sup>58</sup>

h 46. With regard to the SBM machines markets, again after a detailed analysis, the Court of First Instance concluded:

50 Paragraph 201.

51 Paragraph 214. Nevertheless, the Commission did not commit an error on that point, according to the Court of First Instance, with regard to the forecast growth in FFDs and tea/coffee drinks (see para 215).

52 Paragraph 216.

i 53 Paragraph 216.

54 Paragraph 218.

55 Paragraph 224.

56 See footnote above.

57 Paragraph 225.

58 Paragraph 254.

that, 'on the basis of the evidence in the contested decision, the Commission ... committed an error, first, by finding that "the majority of SBM machines are 'generic'" ... and, second, by distinguishing between them according to end use'. Moreover, '[t]he contested decision does not provide sufficient evidence to justify the definition of distinct sub-markets among SBM machines with reference to their end use', for which reason 'the only sub-markets it is necessary to consider are those for low- and high-capacity machines'<sup>59</sup>; a that, 'as regards low-capacity SBM machines ... in so far as the Commission predicts that a dominant position will be created on that market by 2005 through leveraging, it committed a manifest error of assessment'<sup>60</sup>; b and that, 'as regards the market for high-capacity SBM machines, the evidence relied on by the Commission does not justify a finding that both the merged entity's competitors and the converters would be marginalised by 2005 due to leveraging by that entity directed at Tetra's current customers on the carton markets who, during that period, intend to switch all or part of their production over to PET for packaging of sensitive products'<sup>61</sup>. c

47. Drawing a '[g]eneral conclusion on leveraging', the Court of First Instance held, in consequence— d

'that, in relying as it did on the consequences of leveraging by the merged entity in order to support its finding that a dominant position would be created by 2005 on the PET packaging equipment markets, especially those for low- and high-capacity SBM machines used for sensitive products, the Commission committed a manifest error of assessment.'<sup>62</sup> e

48. The Court of First Instance then noted that—

'[s]ince the conditions required by art 2(3) of Regulation 4064/89 have not been fulfilled as regards the leveraging foreseen by the Commission, it must be examined whether those conditions are fulfilled with regard to the second pillar of the Commission's reasoning concerning the carton markets.'<sup>63</sup> f

49. Undertaking that assessment, the Court of First Instance first of all observed generally that the Commission did not—

'commit any error in examining the significance for the carton markets of a reduction of potential competition from the PET equipment markets. It does have to show, however, that such a reduction, if it exists, would tend to strengthen Tetra's dominant position in relation to its competitors on the aseptic carton markets.'<sup>64</sup> g

50. In that regard, after examining the assessments made by the Commission, the Court of First Instance concluded that— h

'the evidence relied on in the contested decision does not establish to the requisite legal standard that the effects of the modified merger on Tetra's

---

<sup>59</sup> Paragraph 269.

<sup>60</sup> Paragraph 283.

<sup>61</sup> Paragraph 306.

<sup>62</sup> Paragraph 308.

<sup>63</sup> Paragraph 309.

<sup>64</sup> Paragraph 323.

- a position, principally on the aseptic carton markets, would, by eliminating Sidel as a potential competitor, be such as to fulfil the conditions of art 2(3) of Regulation 4064/89.'

Indeed, in its opinion, 'it has not been shown that the merged entity's position would be strengthened vis-à-vis its competitors on the carton markets'<sup>65</sup>.

- b 51. Turning, finally, to the 'third pillar' of the Commission's reasoning, which concerns the overall position of the merged entity in the packaging of sensitive products, the Court of First Instance confined itself to the finding that—

'[t]hese effects of the notified transaction cannot, however, be considered in isolation from the analysis in the contested decision concerning the first two pillars of the Commission's reasoning. Since the analysis of those two pillars is vitiated by manifest errors of assessment ... the third pillar must also be dismissed and it is not necessary to examine it in detail.'<sup>66</sup>

- c 52. The Court of First Instance therefore concluded that 'the contested decision does not establish to the requisite legal standard that the modified merger would give rise to significant anti-competitive conglomerate effects'. In its view—

'[i]t must therefore be concluded that the Commission committed a manifest error of assessment in prohibiting the modified merger on the basis of the evidence relied on in the contested decision relating to the foreseen conglomerate effect.'<sup>67</sup>

- e 53. Drawing an overall conclusion as to the outcome of the action, the Court of First Instance therefore affirmed that 'the pleas alleging lack of horizontal, vertical and conglomerate anti-competitive effects must be declared well-founded, and it is not necessary to examine the other pleas' and that '[c]onsequently, the contested decision is annulled'<sup>68</sup>.

- f The appeal and the procedure before the Court of Justice of the European Communities

- g 54. By application lodged at the Registry of the Court of Justice on 8 January 2003, the Commission brought an appeal against that judgment of the Court of First Instance, seeking to have it set aside. Tetra has of course opposed that request, lodging a response as provided for by art 115 of the Rules of Procedure of the Court of Justice.

- h 55. In that response, in addition to claiming that the appeal should be dismissed, Tetra requested—as a measure of inquiry pursuant to art 45(2)(b) of the Rules of Procedure—the production of the translation into French of the appeal (the original version of which is in English, the language of the case in the proceedings before the Court of First Instance and, therefore, in these proceedings). The request for that measure of inquiry was rejected by the court by order of 24 July 2003.

- i 56. On leave given by the President of the Court of Justice in accordance with art 117 of the Rules of Procedure, the Commission submitted a reply, which was followed by a rejoinder lodged by Tetra. In addition, the parties replied in writing to a question asked by the court and were heard at the hearing of 27 January 2004.

65 Paragraph 333.

66 Paragraph 335.

67 Paragraph 336.

68 Paragraphs 337, 338.

III—LEGAL ANALYSIS

57. In support of its application the Commission has raised five grounds of appeal, relating to:

(i) an error of law concerning the standard of proof required and the scope of judicial review;

(ii) an error of law, and in particular infringement of arts 2 and 8(2) of the Merger Regulation, in that the Court of First Instance required the Commission to take into consideration the unlawfulness of certain conduct and to take account of purely behavioural commitments;

(iii) an error of law in that the Court of First Instance did not uphold the Commission's definition of separate product markets for SBM machines by reference to their end use;

(iv) infringement of art 2 of the regulation, distortion of the facts and failure to take account of the Commission's arguments in that the Court of First Instance did not uphold the Commission's finding as to the strengthening of Tetra's dominant position in carton;

(v) error of law in that the Court of First Instance did not uphold the Commission's conclusions as to the creation of a dominant position for Tetra in SBM machines.

58. After a few brief general remarks on the admissibility of appeals against the judgments of the Court of First Instance, those grounds of appeal will be examined in the same order as that in which they were submitted by the Commission.

General considerations on the admissibility of appeals against judgments of the Court of First Instance

59. Having regard to the fact that Tetra is challenging the admissibility of most of the Commission's grounds of appeal, before I go on to analyse those grounds, I must briefly point out that, in accordance with art 225 EC (formerly art 168a of the EC Treaty) and art 51 of the Statute of the Court of Justice, an appeal may be brought against a judgment of the Court of First Instance 'on points of law only'.

60. It follows, according to settled case law, that the Court of First Instance—

'has exclusive jurisdiction, first, to establish the facts except where the substantive inaccuracy of its findings is apparent from the documents submitted to it and, second, to assess those facts.

When the Court of First Instance has established or assessed the facts, the Court of Justice has jurisdiction under art 168a of the Treaty [now art 225 EC] to review the legal characterisation of those facts by the Court of First Instance and the legal conclusions it has drawn from them ...

22. The Court of Justice thus has no jurisdiction to establish the facts or, in principle, to examine the evidence which the Court of First Instance accepted in support of those facts. Provided that the evidence has been properly obtained and the general principles of law and the rules of procedure in relation to the burden of proof and the taking of evidence have been observed, it is for the Court of First Instance alone to assess the value which should be attached to the evidence produced to it ... The appraisal by the Court of First Instance of the evidence put before it does a not constitute, save where the evidence has been fundamentally misconstrued, a point of law which is subject, as such, to review by the Court of Justice.<sup>69</sup>

61. It is, therefore, only within those narrow confines fixed by established case law that the various grounds of appeal may be examined by the Court of Justice.

The ground of appeal relating to an error of law concerning the standard of proof required and the scope of judicial review

c 62. By the first ground of appeal, which may in essence be broken down into two parts, the Commission first criticises generally the scope of the judicial review carried out by the Court of First Instance and the standard of proof demanded by that court in order for a concentration to be prohibited and, second, provides a 'concrete example' of the mistakes made by the Court of First Instance, challenging the kind of review carried out by that court in relation to the Commission's assessments of foreseeable growth in PET. For the sake of clarity, those two aspects will be analysed separately.

(a) The Commission's general criticisms

e 63. The criticisms of a general nature formulated by the Commission relate first and foremost to the scope and nature of the judicial review carried out by the Court of First Instance in relation to the complex economic evaluations made in the contested decision.

f 64. In particular, the Commission complains that the Court of First Instance did not confine itself to establishing whether the institution had committed a 'manifest error of assessment', and therefore to ascertaining whether the facts on which its assessment was based were correct, whether the conclusions drawn from those facts were not clearly mistaken or inconsistent and whether all the relevant factors had been taken into account.

g 65. According to the appellant institution, instead of limiting itself to those aspects, the Court of First Instance carried out a far more incisive review, going so far as to ascertain whether the Commission's conclusions were supported by 'convincing'<sup>70</sup> evidence or facts. In its view, therefore, the Court of First Instance carried out a form of review that, taken literally, required the Commission to 'convince' it of its conclusions and, as a result, enabled the court to tackle the substance of the issues and to substitute its own point of view for that of the Commission. To the latter's mind, furthermore, in the case in point the Court of First Instance carried out a review far more rigorous than performed by the Court of Justice in France v European Commission (the Kali and Salz case)<sup>71</sup>, which also concerned concentrations and in which the Community judicature merely established whether the Commission's conclusions were borne out by a 'sufficiently cogent and consistent body of evidence'<sup>72</sup>.

i <sup>69</sup> See John Deere Ltd v European Commission Case C-7/95 P [1998] All ER (EC) 481n, [1998] ECR I-3111 (paras 21, 22). To the same effect, see, inter multos, Hilti AG v EC Commission Case C-53/92 P [1994] ECR I-667 (paras 42, 43) and New Holland Ford Ltd v European Commission Case C-8/95 P [1998] ECR I-3175 (para 26).

<sup>70</sup> [Footnote not relevant to the English language version of this text].

<sup>71</sup> Joined cases C-68/94 and C-30/95 [1998] ECR I-1375.

<sup>72</sup> Paragraph 228.

66. Next, the Commission complains that the Court of First Instance considered that, where 'the anticipated dominant position would emerge only after a certain lapse of time', the 'analysis [by the Commission] of the future position must, whilst allowing for a certain margin of discretion, be particularly plausible'<sup>73</sup>. Such an approach would in fact excessively reduce the discretion enjoyed by the Commission in carrying out complex economic assessments, requiring it to rely exclusively on facts and evidence lending themselves to a single, unequivocal interpretation.

67. Lastly, the Commission challenges the Court of First Instance for considering that, in order for a conglomerate-type merger to be prohibited, the Commission must base its decision on facts that show that 'in all likelihood' the merger would produce the predicted anti-competitive effects<sup>74</sup>. In that manner, however, the Court of First Instance left very little opportunity of prohibiting that type of merger and introduced an unequal standard of proof, depending on whether the decision was to prohibit or to authorise the concentration. It argues that the Court of First Instance's interpretation is therefore contrary to art 2(2) and (3) of Regulation 4064/89, which provide perfectly symmetrical legal requirements whether a concentration is declared compatible or incompatible with the common market<sup>75</sup>.

68. Tetra counters those challenges by claiming, in essence, that the Commission's arguments are toothless, since they turn on a disquisition of a semantic nature on the terminology used by the Court of First Instance, rather than a specific examination of the kind of judicial review carried out by that court. In any case, according to Tetra, the Commission's complaints fall wide of the mark since the expressions used by the Court of First Instance, taking account also of the various language versions, do not materially depart from those used by the Court of Justice in the Kali and Salz case and by the Commission itself in its decisions.

69. In Tetra's opinion, furthermore, regardless of the expressions used, the Court of First Instance in substance respected the discretion enjoyed by the Commission in carrying out complex economic assessments. Just as the Court of Justice did in the Kali and Salz case, so the Court of First Instance simply established whether the Commission had discharged the burden of proof placed on it in relation to the requirements laid down by art 2(3) of the Merger Regulation.

70. Next, with regard to the Commission's argument concerning the perfectly symmetrical nature of the requirements laid down by art 2(2) and (3), Tetra maintains that if the Commission fails to prove that the requirements of art 2(3) are fulfilled, then it must approve the concentration, without any need for it to prove subsequently that those requirements are not fulfilled. If that were not so, indeed, the undertakings concerned would without justification be required to prove that the transaction notified was not incompatible with the common market.

<sup>73</sup> Paragraph 162 of the judgment under appeal; my emphasis.

<sup>74</sup> Paragraph 153 of the judgment under appeal; my emphasis.

<sup>75</sup> As we have seen, that provision states: on the one hand, that '[a] concentration which does not create or strengthen a dominant position as a result of which effective competition would be significantly impeded in the common market or in a substantial part of it shall be declared compatible with the common market' (art 2(2)); and, on the other, that '[a] concentration which creates or strengthens a dominant position as a result of which effective competition would be significantly impeded in the common market or in a substantial part of it shall be declared incompatible with the common market' (art 2(3)).

a 71. For my part, I agree with Tetra that the Court of Justice cannot linger over the carrying out of a purely formal linguistic or semantic assessment in order to establish whether or not the Court of First Instance committed an error of law in applying too rigorous a judicial review or in claiming a standard of proof too high for decisions prohibiting mergers. I believe rather that the Court of Justice must look to the heart of the matter, assessing in concrete terms whether, beyond the formal aspect, the Court of First Instance did in fact carry out a review inconsistent with the relevant provisions of Community law and incompatible with the particular judicial role entrusted to it by the Treaty.

b 72. In carrying out that assessment it must first and foremost bear in mind that, on the basis of the system laid down by Regulation 4064/89, the Commission is to prohibit a concentration—of any kind whatsoever—
c whenever it arrives at the conclusion that that concentration would lead to the creation or strengthening of a dominant position as a result of which effective competition would be significantly impeded in the common market or in a substantial part of it (see art 2(3) of the regulation).

73. It is plain, however, that the Commission's opinion regarding the creation or strengthening of such a dominant position involves more than a mere factual assessment as to the material existence or otherwise of certain requirements. In addition to that assessment, its opinion entails a complex technical evaluation, based not on the application of precise scientific rules but on criteria and principles which are open to question, such as economic ones. More particularly, the Commission is required to undertake a complex
e assessment predicting the effects of the concentration on the structure and competitive dynamics of the markets concerned, taking into consideration the many constantly evolving factors which may impinge on the future development of supply and demand on those markets.

74. It therefore cannot be claimed that in order to prohibit a concentration the Commission must establish with absolute certainty that the concentration
f would lead to the creation or strengthening of a dominant position as a result of which effective competition would be significantly impeded in the common market or in a substantial part of it. It seems to me sufficient for that purpose if, on the basis of solid elements gathered in the course of a thorough and painstaking investigation, and having recourse to its technical knowledge, the Commission is persuaded that the notified transaction would very probably g lead to the creation or strengthening of such a dominant position. If the Commission is not so convinced, it must on the contrary authorise the merger.

75. Unlike the Commission, I believe that application of such a test is not contrary to the perfectly symmetrical nature of the legal requirements laid down by art 2(2) and (3) of the regulation for a declaration that a concentration h is or is not compatible with the common market.

76. As a matter of fact, I consider that the symmetry of those requirements cannot be absolute, seeing that there is, between the cases in which the notified transactions would very probably create or strengthen a dominant position within the meaning of art 2 and the cases in which those transactions very probably would not create or strengthen such a dominant position, a 'grey area': an area, that is to say, in which cases are to be found where it is especially difficult to foresee the effects of the notified transaction and where it is therefore impossible to arrive at a clear distinct conviction that the likelihood that a dominant position will be created or strengthened is significantly greater or less than the likelihood that such a position will not be created or strengthened. The system laid down by Regulation 4064/89 must therefore necessarily provide a yardstick for the solution of those cases which are of doubtful or difficult classification. a
i

77. I believe that in such cases the most correct solution is quite certainly to authorise the notified transactions.

78. It appears to me that art 10(6) of the regulation provides to that effect, stating that where, within the deadlines set, the Commission has not taken a decision concerning a notifiable transaction, the concentration 'shall be deemed to have been declared compatible with the common market'. b

79. By stipulating that, if the Commission does not make a decision in good time, the concentration must be deemed to be authorised, the Community legislature demonstrates as a matter of fact that it considers that, in the case of uncertainty as to whether or not the transaction is compatible with the common market, the interest of the undertakings seeking to make the merger must prevail. In other words, in similar situations it has been thought preferable to run the risk of authorising a transaction incompatible with the common market, rather than the risk of prohibiting one that is compatible, so unjustifiably restraining the parties' freedom of economic activity. c

80. To my mind the same must hold good in cases falling within the 'grey area' of which I have spoken, those also being marked by appreciable uncertainty as to whether or not the notified concentrations are compatible with the common market. d

81. That notified concentrations are authorised in such situations seems moreover justified to me by the fact that, if they should lead to the creation or strengthening of a dominant position within the meaning of art 2 of the regulation, the Commission and the competent national authorities would nevertheless be able to limit the distortions of competition by making ex post use of the powers given them by art 86 of the Treaty. e

82. Having said that with regard to the evaluations which the Commission must carry out, I can now turn to the question of the bounds of judicial review. f

83. On this point, I shall begin with the observation that in accordance with settled case law—

'[e]xamination by the Community judicature of the complex economic assessments made by the Commission must necessarily be confined to verifying whether the rules on procedure and on the statement of reasons have been complied with, whether the facts have been accurately stated and whether there has been any manifest error of appraisal or misuse of powers.'<sup>76</sup> g

84. With specific reference to Regulation 4064/89, the Court of Justice in the Kali and Salz case had furthermore the opportunity to make it clear that— h

'the basic provisions of the Regulation, in particular Article 2 thereof, confer on the Commission a certain discretion, especially with respect to assessments of an economic nature ...

224. Consequently, review by the Community judicature of the exercise of that discretion, which is essential for defining the rules on i

<sup>76</sup> See Aalborg Portland A/S v European Commission joined cases C-204/00 P, C-205/00 P, C-211/00 P, C-213/00 P, C-217/00 P and C-219/00 P [2004] ECR I-123 (para 279). To the same effect, see inter multos Remia BV v EC Commission Case 42/84 [1985] ECR 2545 (para 34) and British American Tobacco Co Ltd v EC Commission joined cases 142/84 and 156/84 [1987] ECR 4487 (para 62).

a concentrations, must take account of the discretionary margin implicit in the provisions of an economic nature which form part of the rules on concentrations.<sup>77</sup>

85. It is clear from that case law that the Community judicature, in addition naturally to monitoring observance of the rules of law and in particular those relating to procedure and the obligation to state reasons, exercises a different review dealing with the accuracy of the findings of fact and economic assessments made by the Commission.

86. With regard to the findings of fact, the review is clearly more intense, in that the issue is to verify objectively and materially the accuracy of certain facts and the correctness of the conclusions drawn in order to establish whether certain known facts make it possible to prove the existence of other facts to be ascertained. By contrast, with regard to the complex economic assessments made by the Commission, review by the Community judicature is necessarily more limited, since the latter has to respect the broad discretion inherent in that kind of assessment and may not substitute its own point of view for that of the body which is institutionally responsible for making those assessments.

d 87. However, the fact that the Commission enjoys broad discretion in assessing whether or not a concentration is compatible with the common market does certainly not mean that it does not have in any case to base its conviction on solid elements gathered in the course of a thorough and painstaking investigation or that it is not required to give a full statement of reasons for its decision, disclosing the various passages of logical argument supporting the decision. The Commission has itself acknowledged in its appeal, moreover, that it is bound to examine the relevant market carefully; to base its assessment on elements which reflect the facts as they really are, which are not plainly insignificant and which support the conclusions drawn from them, and on adequate reasoning; and to take into consideration all relevant factors.

88. As is also clear from the approach taken by the Court of Justice in the Kali and Salz case, those duties imposed on the Commission make it possible for the Community judicature to exercise an adequate review. Without entering into the merits of the Commission's assessments, it can in particular ascertain whether the factual information on which such assessments are based is accurate and whether the conclusions drawn as to fact are correct<sup>78</sup>; whether the Commission undertook a thorough and painstaking investigation, and in particular whether it carefully inquired into and took sufficiently into consideration all the relevant factors<sup>79</sup>; and whether the various passages in the reasoning developed by the Commission in order to arrive at its conclusions in respect of the compatibility or otherwise of a concentration with the common market satisfy requirements of logic, coherence and appropriateness<sup>80</sup>.

h 89. The rules on the division of powers between the Commission and the Community judicature, which are fundamental to the Community institutional system, do not however allow the judicature to go further, and particularly—as

i
77 Cited above (paras 223, 224).

78 This for example is the kind of review carried out in paras 229–231 and 245 of the Kali and Salz case.

79 This type of review underlies for example the finding made in the last sentence of para 241 in the Kali and Salz case.

80 It seems that the assessments made by the Court of Justice in paras 228, 239, 241 (except the last sentence), 246 and 247 of the Kali and Salz case are referable to this type of review.

I have just said—to enter into the merits of the Commission's complex economic assessments or to substitute its own point of view for that of the institution. a

90. That having been expressed in general terms, it is now necessary to go on to assess specifically whether the Court of First Instance committed an error of law in applying too rigorous a standard of judicial review or too high a standard of proof in respect of a decision to prohibit a concentration (see para 71, above). b

(b) The 'concrete example' of the errors committed by the Court of First Instance

91. After putting forward the general criticisms just mentioned, in the second part of its first ground of appeal the Commission proposes to give a 'concrete example' of the errors made by the Court of First Instance. In this part of that ground, in addition to challenging the various passages in the judgment under appeal in which it claims the Court of First Instance overstepped the bounds of judicial review, the Commission puts forward other summary complaints relating to errors of various kinds committed by the Court of First Instance in carrying out its own assessments. c

92. In its first objection the Commission complains that the Court of First Instance overstepped the bounds of judicial review by rejecting its conclusion as to the foreseeable growth in PET packaging for long-life (UHT) milk of up to 1% of that market segment. In particular, according to the Commission, the Court of First Instance unlawfully and without reasoning overturned the conclusion reached by the institution, merely finding that 'the use of PET will not actually increase for UHT milk and, consequently, for approximately half of the LDP market'<sup>81</sup>. d

93. The objection seems to me to hit the mark. Indeed, I agree with the Commission that with that terse statement (especially if we look at the text of the judgment in the language of the case) the Court of First Instance incorrectly substituted its own point of view for the Commission's, formulating its own autonomous prediction of future developments in the market. e

94. Contrary to what Tetra maintains, the Court of First Instance's laconic assertion contains no criticism of the logic, coherence or appropriateness of the reasoning developed by the Commission on the basis of the elements available. Instead, that assertion clearly shows that the Court of First Instance took those elements into direct consideration in order to draw from it its own distinct conclusion that use of PET would not increase for the packaging of UHT milk or, consequently, for approximately half the LDP market. By so doing, that court therefore plainly overstepped the bounds of its judicial review (see paras 82–89, above). f

95. The Commission's objections relating to the Court of First Instance's opinion concerning the estimated increased use of PET for packaging fresh milk (increase put at 10–15%) and flavoured milk and milk-based drinks (increase put at up to 25%) seem to me to be equally well founded. g

96. In this respect I agree first of all with the Commission that the conclusion that 'the growth estimates adopted by the Commission ... are not really very convincing'<sup>82</sup> is invalidated by an incomplete or inaccurate assessment of the relevant factors and is not, in any case, supported by adequate reasoning. h a 97. As, in fact, the Commission has correctly observed, in stating its reasons for that conclusion:

<sup>81</sup> Paragraph 211 of the judgment.

<sup>82</sup> Paragraph 212. i

(i) the Court of First Instance did not even mention the extensive market investigation carried out by the Commission, which showed that market participants in the sector expected levels of growth even higher than those finally accepted by the Commission<sup>83</sup>. It is, by the way, clear that, contrary to b what Tetra maintains, the mere fact that the Commission opted for more prudent predictions can in no way justify the failure to assess one of the factors which the Commission had taken into account in arriving at its own conclusion;

(ii) the Court of First Instance appears to have distorted the sense of one of the studies considered in the decision (and placed in the file at its request)<sup>84</sup>, in which, examining the foreseeable growth of PET, it stated that 'for aseptic packaging, the Warrick report predicts only minimal growth, of 1%, for flavoured milk, and a slight decline for other milk-based drinks'<sup>85</sup>. It would indeed seem from that passage that the predictions of the Warrick report referred to the increase in PET for packaging flavoured milk and other
c milk-based drinks, whereas reading of the document clearly shows (and this is, moreover, not denied by Tetra) that those predictions referred only to the volume of the products concerned to be packaged, irrespective of the material used;

(iii) the Court of First Instance did not make any serious criticisms of the Commission's reasoning, but did no more than remark that 'the PCI report (p 64), the only independent study to concentrate on the LDP market, predicts growth as a result of which PET use will be 9.2% of the fresh non-flavoured milk market in 2005' (and that is a proportion not far distant from that predicted by the Commission); 'for aseptic packaging, the Warrick report predicts only minimal growth, of 1%, for flavoured milk, and a slight decline for other milk-based drinks' (which as we have seen is misleading, for those
d predictions did not relate to increased use of PET), 'whilst the Pictet report does not give any specific forecasts for LDPs'; and '[t]he PCI report ... provides the only proof which might possibly support the forecast of a 25% market share for PET in other milk-based drinks' (a proportion corresponding exactly to that predicted by the Commission)<sup>86</sup>. As may easily be established, those e summary observations concerning 'independent studies'<sup>87</sup> do not satisfactorily explain why, in the Court of First Instance's opinion, the Commission's estimates were not 'very convincing', especially when it is borne in mind that those estimates—based on a series of factors—were already more cautious than those appearing in the market investigation carried out by the Commission.

h 98. The Court of First Instance's statement that 'generally, the contested decision does not explain adequately how PET could displace HDPE as the i <sup>83</sup> On this point, recital (142) of the decision states: 'Generally, market participants suggested significant growth in PET use in the short term in the "sensitive" products. For those participants who felt able to quote the proportion of the "sensitive" products that would be packaged in PET in 2005, the Commission found that on average PET would represent around 40% in milk, 30% in juice, 40% in FFDs and over 50% in ice tea'.

<sup>84</sup> In that regard, see paras 75 and 76 of the judgment under appeal.

<sup>85</sup> Paragraph 212.

<sup>86</sup> The quotations are again from para 212 of the judgment.

<sup>87</sup> 'Independent studies' means those not commissioned by Tetra.

main material competing with carton by 2005, especially in the important fresh milk packaging segment' also appears inadequately reasoned to me<sup>88</sup>. a

99. As rightly pointed out by the Commission, the Court of First Instance as a matter of fact came to that conclusion without in any way criticising, or indeed even mentioning, the assessments made by that institution—on the basis of the findings of its market investigation and of information provided in independent studies—concerning the competitive advantages of PET in comparison with HDPE<sup>89</sup>. b

100. That the Court of First Instance referred particularly to fresh milk packaging raises the doubt that it did not take any account at all of those assessments, seeing that the contested decision reveals that that product was one of those for which PET offered major competitive advantages compared to HDPE. In the decision it is in fact clearly stated that '[t]he Commission's market investigation confirmed PCI's suggestion that PET has marketing advantages over HDPE, in particular, where visibility can be achieved'<sup>90</sup>, and especially for those products, such as fresh milk, which do not need a light barrier<sup>91</sup>. As observed by the Commission, the failure to take those assessments into consideration seems furthermore to be confirmed by the part of the judgment concerning the possible effects of leveraging, in which, wrongly substituting its own assessments for those of the Commission, the Court of First Instance tersely affirmed that '[f]resh milk is not a product for which the marketing advantages offered by PET have any particular importance'<sup>92</sup>. c
d

101. I would add, moreover, that the Court of First Instance's conclusion as to the reasons given for the decision finds no valid justification in the subsequent statement that— e

'the Commission does not dispute either the overall figure of 17.3% for the use of HDPE for LDPs given by Canadean for 2000 ... or the forecast [again Canadean's] that that figure could reach 19.5% by 2005.'<sup>93</sup>

102. Indeed I agree with the Commission that the Court of First Instance made reference to the Canadean study (commissioned by Tetra) without considering that the Commission had explained that it did not regard the predictions made in that study as generally reliable. The Court of First Instance ought instead to have taken account of the Commission's criticisms that, on the one hand, that study had wrongly 'used a model which considers previous growth as an indicator of future growth and ignores the future technological developments particular to barrier technology' and that, on the other, given f
g

---

<sup>88</sup> Paragraph 212.

<sup>89</sup> See, in particular, recitals (80), (95)–(97) and (101)–(102) of the decision.

<sup>90</sup> Recital (97) of the decision.

<sup>91</sup> It is clear from the decision that while 'UHT white milk requires a light barrier', 'fresh milk can successfully [be] packaged in standard PET without any barrier properties' (recitals (76), (77)). Furthermore, according to Tetra, limitations on the use of PET because of the need for a light barrier 'apply only to UHT white milk'. In that respect, Tetra notes that 'technical solutions to provide a light barrier for PET' 'involve high costs and complex manufacturing technology, raise recycling issues and eliminate transparency of the bottle which is one of the major advantages of PET' (recital (74) of the decision). i a 'that the decision to package products in PET is said to be customer driven, a study [such as Canadean's] excluding customer views is not particularly robust'<sup>94</sup>.

<sup>92</sup> Paragraph 289.

<sup>93</sup> Paragraph 212, end. h

103. Given the foregoing, I consider that the Commission's various charges in respect of foreseeable growth in the use of PET for packaging liquid dairy products must be upheld.

b 104. I believe, however, that the charge relating to the assessment of the foreseeable growth in the use of PET for packaging juices cannot be upheld.

c 105. In that objection, the Commission complains in particular that the Court of First Instance stated that, although 'the Commission itself acknowledged that the growth in question would be due mainly to a switch from glass to PET, it did not conduct any analysis of the glass market'<sup>95</sup>. By so doing, according to the Commission, the Court of First Instance ignored important evidence as to the decline of glass for non-premium products, which the Commission took as a basis in the contested decision, later examining them in more detail in its defence. According to the Commission, to proceed in such a way confirms that the Court of First Instance erred in regarding as d unimportant factors not mentioned in the contested decision, but referred to in the pleading in support of the necessarily more general considerations contained in the decision.

e 106. In that connection I must, nevertheless, agree with Tetra that the Court of First Instance did not make any mistake in asserting that the Commission had made no analysis of the market for glass, seeing that, apart from some vague and fleeting references, there is no trace of any such analysis in the decision. Contrary, therefore, to what the Commission maintains, that gap in the investigation could certainly not be filled by subsequent statements made in the pleadings, since the evidence and the assessments on which the decision was based had to be clearly indicated in that act and could not be supplied only f later in connection with proceedings before the Court of First Instance<sup>96</sup>.

f 107. Finally, the Commission's last objection seems to me to be well founded, in which it complains that the Court of First Instance took into account that 'the cost of PET is higher than that of carton' in assessing whether it was likely that Tetra's customers would switch from carton to PET as a result of leveraging<sup>97</sup>.

g 108. In fact, I agree with the Commission that no clear conclusion was reached in the contested decision as to the vexed question of the difference in cost between PET and carton and that, as a result, it was not open to the Court of First Instance to enter into the merits of that complex economic assessment, by deciding for itself that PET cost more than carton.

h

<sup>94</sup> Recital (123) of the decision.

<sup>95</sup> Paragraph 213.

i <sup>96</sup> It is clear from the Court of Justice's case law that 'a failure to state the reasons cannot be remedied by the fact that the person concerned learns the reasons for the decision during the proceedings before the [Community judiciary]' (see Michel v European Parliament Case 195/80 [1981] ECR 2861 (para 22)). To essentially the same effect, see Culin v EC Commission Case C-343/87 [1990] ECR I-225 (para 15) and Italy v European Commission Joined cases C-15/98 and C-105/99 [2000] ECR I-8855 (para 70).

<sup>97</sup> Paragraph 288 of the judgment under appeal. That assertion as to the difference in cost between PET and carton is then repeated by the Court of First Instance in para 326 in connection with the assessment of the reduction of potential competition in the carton markets.

109. On this point, in contrast to what Tetra submits and is affirmed in a later passage of the judgment under appeal<sup>98</sup>, I do not think that the Commission by implication accepted the finding of the Warrick report that, with regard to aseptic packaging, PET is 30–40% more expensive than carton. After recalling the conclusions at which that study arrived, the Commission as a matter of fact stated that its ‘market investigation did not produce a clear picture of the relative costs of PET and carton packaging systems’, since the persons questioned had given contradictory answers<sup>99</sup>. It seems plain enough to me that even if that last assertion does not in some way cast doubt on the findings of the Warrick study, it certainly does not make it possible to hold that the Commission by implication confirmed them.

110. Nor, moreover, do I think it possible to discern, as Tetra would have it, confirmation of the greater cost of PET in the Commission’s statement that some customers ‘indicated that they would only consider a switch from carton to PET if carton prices rose by a significant amount of 20% or more’<sup>100</sup>. That assertion does no more, in fact, than report the point of view of certain customers questioned by the Commission in the ambit of its market investigation: an investigation which, as we have seen, ‘did not produce a clear picture of the relative costs of PET and carton packaging systems’.

111. As matters stand, it seems clear to me that, while the Court of First Instance could possibly have found that the Commission’s investigation was incomplete, or have criticised the logic, consistency and appropriateness of its reasoning, it definitely could not carry out its own assessment of the information in that institution’s possession in order to conclude that PET was ‘more expensive than carton’.

(c) Conclusions on the first ground of appeal

112. In the light of all the considerations set out above, I believe that the first ground of appeal is in part well founded and that, in particular, the Commission’s objections concerning foreseeable growth in the use of PET for packaging of liquid dairy products and the difference in cost between PET and carton must be upheld.

Concerning the ground of appeal relating to the requirement that the unlawful nature of certain behaviour should be taken into consideration and that purely behavioural commitments should be taken into account

113. By its second ground of appeal, the Commission criticises certain general assessments made by the Court of First Instance in respect of ‘leveraging’ (see paras 36–39, above), charging the court with having asked it to take into consideration as a possible deterrent to such a practice: (i) the unlawfulness of given conduct inherent in that practice which would have led to abuse of a dominant position<sup>101</sup>; (ii) the purely behavioural commitments offered by Tetra, which consist of nothing more than a promise not to act abusively.

<sup>98</sup> Paragraph 326.

<sup>99</sup> Recital (92). Referring to the findings of its market investigation, the Commission stated in particular that: ‘Some market participants stated that for most applications and in particular for products requiring a barrier, PET is more expensive. The majority of respondents, however, were not able to identify the precise cost differences; for many, this was because they did not have experience in both materials. However, some third parties (notably those with greater experience in PET) informed the Commission that for them PET was actually cheaper than carton.’

<sup>100</sup> Recital (397) of the decision.

<sup>101</sup> On this point, I would note that ‘leveraging from the aseptic carton market ... would manifest itself—in addition to the possibility of the merged entity engaging in practices such as tying sales of a 114. Referring to the first aspect, the Commission recalls that Regulation 4064/89 introduced prior control of concentrations in order to avoid structural changes to the market that might involve abusive conduct. Where an undertaking dominant on one market acquires an undertaking operating on another neighbouring market, the concentration must be prohibited if the entity created by the merger would have the means and incentives to engage in abuses permitting it to oust its competitors from that other market<sup>102</sup>. In the Commission's view, therefore, by asking it to assess also whether economic incentives to abuse the dominant position held by the merged entity could not be counterbalanced by the disincentives of the unlawful nature of abuse, the Court of First Instance has misinterpreted art 2 of the regulation.

c 115. Furthermore, according to the Commission, yet another misinterpretation of that provision led the Court of First Instance to assert that—

d 'it is also appropriate to distinguish, on the one hand, between a situation where a merger having conglomerate effects immediately changes the conditions of competition on the second market and results in the creation or strengthening of a dominant position on that market due to the dominant position already held on the first market and, on the other hand, a situation where the creation or strengthening of a dominant position on the second market does not immediately result from the merger, but will occur, in those circumstances, only after a certain time and will result from conduct engaged in by the merged entity on the first market where it already holds a dominant position. In this latter case, it is not the structure resulting from the merger transaction itself which creates or strengthens a dominant position within the meaning of art 2(3) of the regulation, but rather the future conduct in question.'<sup>103</sup>

f In the Commission's opinion, indeed, in that latter case too, contrary to what the Court of First Instance maintains, it is the merger that creates or strengthens the dominant position since it has the direct immediate effect of bringing about the conditions in which abuse is not only possible but also economically rational.

g 116. Lastly, the Commission maintains that there are insuperable legal and practical obstacles to the engaging in an analysis of the possible deterrent effect of the unlawfulness of certain conduct. It would as a matter of fact be impossible to assess with a sufficient degree of certainty the inclination of particular undertakings to engage in unlawful conduct and the effect that the danger of being discovered and penalised might have on their actions.

h 117. With regard next to the second of those aspects, concerning the behavioural commitments offered by Tetra (see para 113, above), the Commission remarks that, given the purpose of prior control under Regulation 4064/89, commitments not to abuse a dominant position created or strengthened by a merger are unacceptable, because they do not make it possible to put right the structural problems which the regulation seeks to avoid. In its view, by requiring it to take into consideration such commitments, the Court of First Instance has therefore infringed the provisions of the regulation, in particular arts 2 and 8(2). In any case, according to the Commission, the Court of First Instance incorrectly stated that that institution had not taken account of the commitments offered by Tetra, since it is clear from the decision that those commitments had been analysed and rejected not only for reasons of principle, but also because they were 'extremely difficult if not impossible to monitor'.<sup>104</sup>

i carton packaging equipment and consumables to sales of PET packaging equipment and forced sales—firstly, by the probability of predatory pricing by the merged entity, secondly, by price wars; and, thirdly, by the granting of loyalty rebates' (see para 156 of the judgment under appeal).

102 In this connection, in its reply and at the hearing the Commission stated that a structural change in market conditions as a result of which the merged entity acquired such means and incentives constitutes the immediate creation of a dominant position on the other market.

103 Paragraph 154 of the judgment under appeal.

118. I do not find those arguments of the Commission persuasive.

119. The criticisms made of the Court of First Instance would in fact be justified only if the decision revealed that, as the Commission maintained in its reply and at the hearing, the merger would lead to structural changes in the market which would immediately and automatically create a second dominant position which the new entity could abuse by foreseeable actions on its part.

120. However, as Tetra rightly emphasises, the decision does not say that the merged entity would immediately and automatically acquire a dominant position on the PET packaging equipment markets, but predicts that that would happen only subsequently, by means of abuse of the dominant position already held by Tetra in carton.

121. That is clearly shown in, for example, the passage in the decision in which we read that the—

'bringing together of Tetra's dominant position in carton packaging and Sidel's leading position in PET packaging equipment ... would create a market structure which would enable the merged entity to leverage its dominant position in aseptic carton packaging to acquire a dominant position in the PET packaging equipment market.'<sup>105</sup>

From that passage it is to be deduced, in fact, that the merger would immediately create a market structure giving the merged entity the means and incentives to engage in certain leveraging practices and subsequently to acquire, by means of those practices, a dominant position in the PET packaging equipment markets.

122. As matters stand, the Court of First Instance rightly declared that the Commission ought to have taken into consideration the various factors that might have influenced the likelihood of the merged entity's behaving in such a way as to enable it to acquire the predicted dominant position on the PET packaging equipment markets.

123. In other words, as stressed by Tetra, the Court of First Instance correctly found that, just as the Commission had assessed the economic incentives for engaging in such conduct, so it ought to have taken into consideration the possible disincentive in that respect of the unlawful nature of the conduct in a question (which would have involved abuse of Tetra's pre-existing dominant position in carton) or of the commitments into which that company had offered to enter.

<sup>104</sup> Recital (431) of the decision.

<sup>105</sup> Recital (342) of the contested decision. To the same effect, see also recital (330), in which it is stated: '... By acquiring Sidel, Tetra would ensure that its dominant position in aseptic carton packaging was retained and strengthened by eliminating Sidel as a source of competitive constraint. In addition, leveraging its dominant position in carton, Tetra/Sidel would have the ability to reach a level of dominance in PET equipment and in particular SBM machines of high and low- capacity in the relevant end-use segments' (my emphasis). Similar assertions are made in many passages of the decision, such as, for example, recitals (331), (359) and (389).

124. Contrary to what the Commission maintains, by asking it to take into consideration the unlawful nature of certain conduct brought about by leveraging and the relevant commitments offered by Tetra, the Court of First Instance did not require the Commission to assess the likelihood of the merged entity's abusing the dominant position created by the merger. It simply requested that the Commission should assess the likelihood that, by exploiting Tetra's pre-existing dominant position in carton, the new entity might acquire a dominant position in the PET packaging equipment markets: that is to say, to assess whether the merger would lead to the creation of a dominant position for the purposes of art 2 of Regulation 4064/89.

125. Nor, moreover, do I believe that there were insurmountable legal and practical obstacles to carrying out the assessment requested by the Court of First Instance. The latter did not in fact expect the Commission to establish with certainty whether the unlawfulness of the conduct in question or the commitments proposed by Tetra would deter that undertaking from engaging in such conduct, nor on the other hand did it expect the Commission to demonstrate that the economic incentives identified in the decision would definitely drive Tetra to engage in that conduct. The Court of First Instance simply asked the Commission to take account of those factors in the ambit of its predictions, assessing, for example, whether—in view of the normal business practices in that sector—the Commission, the competent national authorities or injured competitors could easily learn of any unlawful conduct.

126. Lastly, the Commission's argument that the Court of First Instance wrongly ignored its analysis of the commitments as to conduct offered by Tetra does not seem to me to be persuasive. As that company rightly remarks, the Commission did no more than make the brief and unsupported assertion that the commitments in question were 'extremely difficult if not impossible to monitor', but made no adequate assessment of how they might possibly impinge on the merged entity's future conduct or, in particular, of whether they might constitute a significant disincentive to engaging the predicted leveraging practices.

127. Given the foregoing, it must be concluded that the Commission's allegations have not been justified. I repeat that it would have been otherwise had it been apparent from the decision that the merger would have brought about structural changes in the market liable to lead to the immediate and automatic creation of a dominant position on the PET markets. That is what the Commission maintained in its reply and at the hearing but, as we have seen, it is not what appears in the contested decision.

128. Having regard to the foregoing considerations, I therefore consider that the second ground of appeal must be rejected.

The ground of appeal relating to the definition of distinct markets for SBM machines depending on their end use

129. By its third ground of appeal the Commission criticises the Court of First Instance for not having upheld the Commission's assessment relating to the definition of distinct markets for SBM machines (high- and low-capacity) used for the packaging of 'sensitive' products. In that regard, the Commission formulates various grounds of complaint, distinguishing in particular between those relating to the characteristics of the supply of, and those relating to the characteristics of the demand for, those machines. a

130. Beginning with supply-side characteristics, the Commission challenges the conclusion that 'the contested decision fails to provide sufficiently convincing evidence to demonstrate the allegedly specific characteristics of SBM machines used for packaging sensitive products'<sup>106</sup>. In its opinion, to put it extremely briefly, the Court of First Instance arrived at that conclusion without taking account of the information provided in the decision and defence as to the adaptation of SBM machines to suit customers' particular requirements and mistakenly based its own conviction on statements which Tetra made to the contrary at the hearing. b

131. I think, however, that that company holds a strong position when it insists that the contested decision clearly asserts that 'the majority of SBM machines are "generic"', but that, '[n]evertheless, a PET packaging line, of which the SBM machine is only one component, is usually tailored to the specific products filled by the customer'<sup>107</sup>. Contrary therefore to the Commission's submission, it was clear from the contested decision that SBM machines were for the most part generic, that is to say suitable for packaging various kinds of products, whereas PET packaging lines, of which such machines were just one component, were generally 'tailored' to the specific products to be packaged. c

132. In the light of that reasoning in the decision, it was possible therefore for the Court of First Instance correctly to state that— d

'[t]he mere fact that each SBM machine must be installed in a PET line in order to be useful to its purchaser does not justify that specific characteristics of other PET equipment in that line should be attributed to the SBM machines themselves.'<sup>108</sup> e

133. With regard next to the further information supplied in the defence concerning the technical adaptations which must be made to SBM machines also in order for them to be integrated in specific PET packaging lines, the Court of First Instance correctly responded that 'the contested decision makes no reference to this information'<sup>109</sup>. As I have said, in fact, the evidence and the assessments on which the decision was based ought to have been clearly indicated in that act and could not be supplied only later in connection with proceedings before the Court of First Instance (see para 106, above). f

134. In view of the foregoing, the assessments subsequently made by the Court of First Instance in order to counter, in light of evidence furnished by Tetra, the subsequent technical arguments developed in the defence must be considered to be irrelevant. Although the Court of First Instance would have done better not to have ventured into that sort of appraisal, that does not alter the fact that it was not in any event open to the Commission to introduce evidence in proceedings before that court to which it had made no reference in the contested decision. g

135. Having said that in connection with the grounds of challenge relating to the supply-side characteristics of SBM machines, I can now turn to those relating to demand-side characteristics. h

<sup>106</sup> Paragraph 261 of the judgment under appeal.

<sup>107</sup> Recital (177) of the contested decision.

<sup>108</sup> Paragraph 265 of the judgment under appeal.

<sup>109</sup> See footnote above. i

a 136. In this respect, it has to be made clear that these grounds of challenge refer to the reasoning used by the Commission in defining specific markets for SBM machines used for the packaging of 'sensitive' products having regard to the price discrimination in the past practised by Sidel with regard to customers intending to package such products and to the possible continuance of that practice by the new entity.

b 137. That reasoning was based, in particular, on the twofold theoretical premise that 'a distinct group of customers for the relevant product may constitute a narrower, distinct product market when such a group could be subject to price discrimination' and that—

c '[t]his will usually be the case when two conditions are met: (a) it is possible to identify clearly the group to which an individual customer belongs at the moment it purchases the relevant products and (b) trade among customers or arbitrage by third parties should not be feasible.'<sup>110</sup>

d Starting from that premise, and considering that the conditions set out therein had been satisfied in the case in point, the Commission reached the conclusion that there existed distinct markets for SBM machines used for the packaging of 'sensitive' products.

e 138. By the grounds of challenge now under consideration, the Commission objects to the assessments made in the judgment under appeal relating to that reasoning, alleging in particular that the Court of First Instance: (i) wrongly omitted to take into consideration the price discrimination practised in the past by Sidel, on the grounds that it 'cannot constitute sufficiently convincing evidence that the merged entity will continue to behave in a similar way', since '[u]nlike Sidel prior to the merger, the merged entity would be bound not only by the commitments but also by the various obligations limiting Tetra's conduct'<sup>111</sup>; (ii) wrongly omitted to take into consideration many of the Commission's observations about the possibility of identifying those customers that intended to use SBM machines to package 'sensitive' products and, in any case, that it misunderstood the relevance of those observations, and (iii) misunderstood and wrongly failed to take into consideration the Commission's observations about the impossibility of buying a given producer's machines from other persons (who would essentially be other customers seeking to sell secondhand).

g 139. Nor do those objections appear to me to be well founded.

h 140. With regard to the first of them, I have in fact to concur with Tetra that the statement challenged has nothing to do with the identification of specific markets for SBM machines used for packaging of 'sensitive' products. Far from relating to the definition of the relevant markets, that statement is in point of fact to be found in that part of the judgment which examines the 'ways in which the merged entity could engage in leveraging', and indicates in particular that 'the leveraging practices which may be taken into consideration by the Court are limited to those which, at least probably, do not constitute an abuse of a dominant position on the aseptic carton markets' and refers to the need to take into account the commitments offered by Tetra (see para 43, above).

i 141. Contrary to what is alleged in the appeal, I believe therefore that the Court of First Instance properly considered and understood the various passages in which the Commission's reasoning is set out. The Court of First

<sup>110</sup> Recital (178) of the decision.

<sup>111</sup> Paragraph 223 of the judgment.

Instance none the less found that that reasoning was in essence vitiated by a defect in logic, seeing that the fact that it is possible for the new entity to identify those customers who intend to package 'sensitive' products (and in consequence to practise price discrimination against them) 'does not preclude those customers from turning to other suppliers of SBM machines if they become dissatisfied with the conditions offered by the merged entity'.<sup>112</sup>

142. Although it is terse in the extreme, it seems to me that we may in substance concur with that appraisal by the Court of First Instance. I in fact consider that, even if the new entity should be capable of identifying those customers who intend to package 'sensitive' products and, in view of its being impossible for those customers to buy its machines from other persons, should decide to demand from them a higher price than that asked of the other customers, that would not of itself make it possible to identify specific markets for SBM machines used for the packaging of 'sensitive' products, inasmuch as—as the Court of First Instance stated—the customers 'discriminated against' could turn to other suppliers that did not operate the same pricing policy.

143. To my mind, in other words, the fact that a single operator (not followed by its competitors) adopts a pricing policy that discriminates against a particular group of customers does not of itself make it possible to identify a specific market in relation to that group of customers, for the presence of other operators that do not practise the same policy may prevent the establishment of essentially different market conditions for the group of customers in question.

144. Therefore I do not think that the Court of First Instance erred in law in criticising the Commission's reasoning based on the price discrimination operated in the past by Sidel and on the possible continuance of such a practice by the new entity.

145. Having regard to all the foregoing considerations, I therefore believe that the third ground of appeal must be rejected.

The ground of appeal relating to the strengthening of Tetra's dominant position in carton

146. In its fourth ground of appeal the Commission challenges the Court of First Instance's conclusion that—

'the evidence relied on in the contested decision does not establish to the requisite legal standard that the effects of the modified merger on Tetra's position, principally on the aseptic carton markets, would, by eliminating Sidel as a potential competitor, be such as to fulfil the conditions of art 2(3) of Regulation 4064/89'.<sup>113</sup>

147. In that regard, the Commission objects, first, that the Court of First Instance did not recognise that a reduction in 'potential' competition from the PET equipment markets would in itself lead to a strengthening of Tetra's dominant position in carton. The Court of First Instance was wrong to require it to show that any such reduction in potential competition would tend 'to strengthen Tetra's dominant position in relation to its competitors on the aseptic carton markets'.<sup>114</sup>, given that that strengthening was not to be assessed with a reference to Tetra's competitors, but to the unavoidable consequences that reduction of 'potential' competition from PET would have for customers and consumers in the form of a price rise (or a failure to lower prices) for carton and less innovation in products.

<sup>112</sup> Paragraph 268 of the judgment.

<sup>113</sup> Paragraph 333 of the judgment.

<sup>114</sup> Paragraph 323. Emphasis added by the Commission.

b 148. According to the Commission, furthermore, in view of its submissions in connection with the first ground of appeal, the Court of First Instance was mistaken when it found that the Commission's assessment concerning the reduction in 'potential' competition was vitiated by the fact that growth in the use of PET for packaging of 'sensitive' products 'will probably be much less marked than the Commission believes'<sup>115</sup>.

c 149. The Commission also disputes the Court of First Instance's finding that it had not on any view been—

'shown that, in the event of elimination or significant reduction of competitive pressure from the PET markets, Tetra would have an incentive not to reduce its carton packaging prices and would stop innovating.'<sup>116</sup>

d 150. On this point it begins by remarking that the Court of First Instance's assessment of the effects of a reduction in 'potential' competition on carton prices was invalidated by the mistaken conviction that PET costs were higher than carton costs (here it refers to what it said in the first ground of appeal). Still in relation to that assessment, the Commission then criticises the comments made thereupon by the Court of First Instance, on account of the fact that the court reprimanded it for failing to explain why Tetra's competitors would not benefit from a rise in carton prices: by so doing, the Court of First Instance did not, in the Commission's opinion, consider that those competitors were ex hypothesi marginalised by Tetra's strongly dominant position. In addition, the Commission charges the Court of First Instance with failing to take into account the effects on carton prices of the fact that, as a result of acquiring the major operator on the PET markets, Tetra could safely assume that most of those of its customers who had switched from carton to PET would in any case be 'recaptured' through Sidel.

f 151. Again with reference to the effects of a reduction of 'potential' competition on innovation, the Commission alleges that the Court of First Instance overestimated the possible response of competitors marginalised by Tetra's dominant position. Finally, according to the Commission, the Court of First Instance erred: on the one hand, by passing over the difference between the pressure to innovate caused by the growth in the use of PET and the pressure proceeding from Tetra's competitors in the carton markets and, on the other, by claiming that recent innovations made by that company were not due to pressure exerted by PET.

g 152. Before evaluating those objections, it is necessary to specify that, as observed by Tetra, the 'potential' competition referred to in connection with this ground of appeal did not consist of competition on the part of undertakings able to enter the carton packaging markets which might therefore have represented potential competitors of Tetra on those markets. On the contrary, the issue was plainly indirect competition proceeding from undertakings active on markets distinct from the carton packaging markets (although closely neighbouring), which produced machinery for packaging in a material, PET, which was regarded by the Commission from the economic point of view as a 'weak substitute' for carton<sup>117</sup>. From this point on I shall therefore refer to indirect rather than potential competition exerted by PET.

115 Paragraph 324.

116 Paragraph 325.

153. Having said that, I must agree with Tetra that it cannot be held that a reduction in indirect competition, proceeding from the acquisition of the leading undertaking operating on a neighbouring market, leads of itself to the strengthening of a dominant position within the meaning of art 2 of Regulation 4064/89. In view of the well-known notion of 'dominant position' used in the Court of Justice's case law, it falls instead to be determined whether such a reduction in indirect competition may increase the 'economic strength' of the dominant undertaking, with the result that it is in a position to impede yet further (or with greater facility) 'effective competition's being maintained on the relevant market' and has the power to behave still more 'independently of its competitors, its customers and ultimately of the consumers'<sup>118</sup>.

154. It therefore follows also that it is to that concept that the Court of First Instance ought more correctly to have referred in its analysis, instead of asserting that it was for the Commission to show that a reduction in indirect competition by PET could have strengthened 'Tetra's dominant position in relation to its competitors on the aseptic carton markets'. Nevertheless, I believe that this is not such a particularly serious mistake as to vitiate the conclusion reached by the Court of First Instance, since the latter did in any case assess, and find to be marred by several errors, the reasoning developed by the Commission in showing the effects that the predicted reduction in indirect competition by PET would have for customers and consumers in the shape of a rise (or a reduction that never took place) in carton prices and less innovation of the products.

155. Likewise, I consider that the conclusion arrived at by the Court of First Instance is not vitiated by the errors it may have made in respect of the assessment of foreseeable growth in the use of PET for packaging of liquid dairy products (see paras 103, 112, above)<sup>119</sup>.

156. Undoubtedly, the finding that growth in the use of PET for packaging of 'sensitive' products 'with the exception of growth in FFDs and tea/coffee drinks, will probably be much less marked than the Commission believes' led the Court of First Instance to hold that—

'it is, therefore, not possible, on the basis of the evidence relied on in the contested decision, to determine, with the certainty required to justify the prohibition of a merger, whether the implementation of the modified merger would place Tetra in a situation where it could be more independent than in the past in relation to its competitors on the aseptic carton markets.'<sup>120</sup>

117 See in particular recital (332) of the contested decision, which states that carton and PET are 'technical substitutes in that both packaging materials can package the relevant end-use product segments', and might be considered 'weak substitutes' in an economic sense. To that effect see also recital (163) of the decision (referred to in para 10, above), in which moreover attention is drawn to the fact that the definition of the markets for packaging in PET and carton may change in the future.

118 See Hoffmann-La Roche & Co AG v EC Commission Case 85/76 [1979] ECR 461 (para 38); my emphasis.

119 It is in this connection to be borne in mind that the Commission's objection concerning errors allegedly committed by the Court of First Instance in assessing the foreseeable growth of the use of PET for packaging of juices has been considered to be without foundation (see para 104, above).

120 Paragraph 324.

a Yet the Court of First Instance did not come to a stop with that assertion, but went on with its analysis, reaching the conclusion—

‘that the two factual elements regarding Tetra’s future conduct, on which the Commission relies in order to prove the alleged negative effects which the modified merger would have on the aseptic carton markets, have, on any view, not been established to the requisite legal standard’ (my emphasis).

b

In particular, as we have seen, according to the Court of First Instance—

‘it has not been shown that, in the event of elimination or significant reduction of competitive pressure from the PET markets, Tetra would have an incentive not to reduce its carton packaging prices and would stop innovating.’<sup>121</sup>

c

157. So, moving on to consider the Commission’s objections to that conclusion, I shall start by remarking that, contrary to what the Commission maintains, the Court of First Instance’s assessment of the effects of a reduction in indirect competition by PET on the prices of carton is not, to my mind, invalidated by the mistaken belief that PET costs were higher than those of carton (concerning the mistake actually made by the Court of First Instance, see paras 111, 112, above).

d

158. As a matter of fact, I would point out that, referring to the Commission’s notion that the merger would enable Tetra to avoid the reduction in carton prices which it would otherwise have been led to make, the Court of First Instance stated that:

e

(i) ‘As regards the “more price-sensitive” carton customers who indicated to the Commission, during its market investigation, “that they would only consider a switch from carton to PET if carton prices rose by a significant amount of 20% or more” ... it is clear that a lowering of carton prices is not necessary to keep them in the carton markets. In finding simply that “[t]hese same price-sensitive customers would presumably be dissuaded from making a switch from carton to PET if a carton-price reduction increased the price difference between a carton and PET packaging line” ... the contested decision does not explain why, without the merger, Tetra would be obliged to make such price reductions in order to keep those customers. These customers would not switch to PET unless carton prices rose by at least 20% or there was a corresponding reduction in PET prices’<sup>122</sup>;

f

g

(ii) ‘Inasmuch as the Commission pleads before the court that, once the merger is implemented, it is possible that Tetra might find it more easy to raise its prices on the aseptic carton markets for those customers, it does not explain, in particular, why this would not enable Tetra’s competitors on the carton markets who are also active on the PET market, such as SIG and Elopak, to benefit from this’<sup>123</sup>;

h

(iii) ‘As for beverage producers who will switch from carton to PET for commercial reasons despite the fact that PET is considerably more costly

i

121 Paragraph 325.

122 Paragraph 327.

123 See footnote above.

than carton, a reduction in carton prices would not necessarily persuade those “non-price-sensitive customers” to keep carton packaging<sup>124</sup>; a

(iv) ‘The contested decision does not show why companies active in the PET equipment markets which, without the modified merger, “would be expected to compete vigorously to gain market share from carton” ... would modify their behaviour following the transaction in question here. If the pressure from Sidel were to disappear, the contested decision does not explain why, if Sidel’s competitors had not been marginalised through successful leveraging, the other companies active in the PET equipment markets would no longer be able to promote the advantages of PET to Tetra’s customers on the carton markets’<sup>125</sup>. b

159. As may easily be verified, with those statements the Court of First Instance pointed out flaws of logic inherent in the Commission’s reasoning, but never founded its own opinion on the mistaken persuasion that the costs of PET were greater than those of carton, even in (iii), which contains the only reference to that aspect. Careful reading of that passage makes it clear, indeed, that the Court of First Instance was doing no more than refer to the Commission’s claim that some customers would in any case switch to PET, despite its ‘being more expensive or despite no change at all in carton prices’<sup>126</sup>, logically deducing therefrom that ‘a reduction in carton prices would not necessarily persuade those “non-price-sensitive customers” to keep carton packaging’. c

160. Having made it clear, therefore, that the Court of First Instance’s assessment is not vitiated by the mistaken belief that PET costs are higher than those of carton, I would observe that I do not consider well founded the Commission’s objection concerning (ii) above, by which that institution charges the Court of First Instance with incorrectly failing to take into account the fact that Tetra’s competitors on the carton markets were ex hypothesi marginalised by the strongly dominant position held by that company. d

161. On this subject, first of all I agree with Tetra that such an objection runs the risk of proving too much. If one did no more than consider theoretically that, by virtue of its dominant position, Tetra could by definition ‘behave to an appreciable extent independently of its competitors’<sup>127</sup> in the carton markets, and therefore even raise prices without any fear of a response on their part, it would be hard to explain why, if the merger did not take place, that company, given its dominant position in carton, should not be able to do the same and ought rather to fear the indirect competition of operators active solely on neighbouring markets (Sidel), which produced machinery for packaging in a material regarded as just a ‘weak substitute’ for carton. e

162. I would furthermore remark that, contrary to what would appear to emerge from the Commission’s appeal, the Court of First Instance did not take into consideration Tetra’s competitors active solely on carton markets, but also those competitors already active on PET markets. It therefore referred to operators which could benefit from a rise in the price of carton in the PET f

124 Paragraph 328.

125 See footnote above.

126 The quotation is taken from recital (397) of the decision, where it is stated that many of the companies questioned in the scope of the market investigation carried out by the Commission ‘clearly stated that they have already switched or would switch from carton to PET despite PET being more expensive or despite no change at all in carton prices’.

127 See the Hoffmann-La Roche case, cited in footnote 118, above (para 38). g

- a markets too and which could therefore exert greater competitive pressure by virtue of the concomitant presence on the markets of the two packaging materials, considering also that they, 'unlike the merged entity, would not be subject to any constraints as to joint offers of carton and SBM machines'<sup>128</sup>.

b 163. Still in relation to the effect of reduction in indirect competition by PET on carton prices, I do not, in short, believe to be well founded the Commission's objection that the Court of First Instance failed to consider that, as a result of acquiring the leading operator on the PET markets, Tetra would have greater liberty to raise carton prices, knowing that through Sidel it could recapture most of the customers that had for that reason switched to PET.

c 164. As rightly emphasised by Tetra, the Court of First Instance really cannot be reproached for not considering that aspect, when it had not been developed in the contested decision. In any event, I would note that, even following the acquisition of Sidel, for Tetra's customers to switch from carton to PET would certainly not be a matter of economic indifference to the new entity. In point of fact it is obvious that the certain loss of Tetra's customers on markets which it dominated and on which it was in a position to make big profit margins could d be offset only in part by the hope of recapturing those customers on markets, such as those of PET, under full development and notable for lively competition<sup>129</sup>.

e 165. Coming next to the effects of reduction in indirect competition by PET upon innovation, I would remark that the ground of complaint relating to the overestimation of the response of Tetra's competitors must be rejected for the same reasons, mutatis mutandis, as set out in relation to the similar complaint concerning the effects on carton prices (see paras 161, 162, above).

f 166. Lastly, as regards the ground of challenge in which the Commission alleges that the Court of First Instance did not adequately consider the kind of pressure to innovate created by the growth in the use of PET and that it mistakenly held that the recent innovations made by Tetra were not due to the pressure exerted by that material, I too think that the Commission is in fact raising questions of fact that the Court of Justice has no jurisdiction to resolve (see paras 59–61, above).

167. In the light of all the foregoing considerations, I consider that the fourth ground of appeal must be rejected.

g The ground of appeal relating to the creation of a dominant position for Tetra in SBM machines

168. In its final ground of appeal the Commission criticises the Court of First Instance's conclusion that—

h 'the contested decision does not prove to the requisite legal standard that by 2005 the merged entity could acquire a dominant position on the market for low- and high-capacity machines, thereby fulfilling the conditions of art 2(3) of Regulation 4064/89 as regards those markets.'<sup>130</sup>

i <sup>128</sup> Paragraph 330.

<sup>129</sup> Clearly things would be otherwise (at least in part), were the new entity successful in leveraging Tetra's position in carton in order to drive towards Sidel those of its customers wishing to switch to PET and thus to acquire a dominant position on some or all of the PET markets. However, given that the assessments made on that subject by the Commission have been dropped by the Court of First Instance, that scenario cannot be taken into consideration.

<sup>130</sup> Paragraph 307 of the judgment.

169. Here I shall straight away briefly examine the summary objections raised by the Commission concerning errors supposedly committed by the Court of First Instance in relation to both the SBM machine markets (low- and high-capacity), in order to assess next whether the errors actually identified are such as to invalidate the conclusion reached by the Court of First Instance.

(a) The objections raised by the Commission

170. Starting with the allegations relating to the low-capacity SBM machines, the Commission first of all objects that the Court of First Instance referred to the share of the market held by Sidel during the period 1998–2000 (which was less than 40%), without taking into account the fact that the contested decision shows that in 2001 that share rose to a level of between 40 and 50%<sup>131</sup>.

171. I believe, however, that, as pointed out by Tetra, the Court of First Instance could legitimately take into account the period from 1998 to 2000, since that was the period in essence referred to by the Commission. The paragraph of the decision mentioned by the Commission (as, furthermore, in an earlier paragraph quoted by the Court of First Instance<sup>132</sup>) in fact showed the market shares held by Sidel, Tetra and their chief competitors 'during the period 1998–2000', whilst only in a footnote were Sidel and Tetra's shares in 2001 mentioned (and they were not, moreover, compared with those held for the same period by their main competitors).

172. Just as baseless seems to me the next objection in which the Commission challenges the Court of First Instance for asserting that 'with Tetra's exit from that market, the merged entity's position will remain basically unchanged as compared to Sidel's current position'<sup>133</sup>, without taking into account the immediate strengthening of Sidel's position proceeding from a series of factors indicated in the decision (Tetra's financial and commercial power, the 'first-mover's' advantage it enjoys vis-à-vis customers seeking to switch from carton to PET and its dominant position in carton)<sup>134</sup>.

173. In point of fact I agree with Tetra that those factors were indicated generally in the decision (but on the other hand no account was taken of the commitments offered by that company) in order to stress the new entity's leadership and global strength due also to its presence on all the markets concerned and not to highlight a particular and immediate strengthening of Sidel's position on the low-capacity SBM machine market. As matters stand, I consider that the Court of First Instance could legitimately declare that, as a result of Tetra's leaving that market, the new entity's position would remain in essence unchanged in relation to Sidel's.

<sup>131</sup> The Commission would appear to refer to para 272 of the judgment under appeal, in which it is stated that '[t]he Commission admits in the contested decision that, in low-capacity SBM machines, Sidel had "a market share of [30–40%] both in terms of capacity and by unit sales in the EEA in 2000" (recital (233))'. In order to demonstrate the Court of First Instance's error, the Commission refers instead to recital (266) of the decision. Since, for reasons of confidentiality, the version of the decision published in the Official Journal does not contain the exact share but just a bracket given for information purposes, it seems to me to be proper to follow the same yardstick in my opinion.

<sup>132</sup> See the previous footnote.

<sup>133</sup> Paragraph 280 of the judgment under appeal.

<sup>134</sup> On this subject, the Commission refers to recitals (376)–(387) of the contested decision.

a 174. Lastly, I do not think it possible to accept the objection relating to the Court of First Instance's statement that 'the contested decision does not contain a sufficient analysis of current and future use of low-capacity SBM machines' either<sup>135</sup>.

b 175. With that objection the Commission charges the Court of First Instance with basing its decision on two irrelevant aspects: first, the importance of low-capacity SBM machines in packaging non-'sensitive' products, which is irrelevant if the segmentation of the market in SBM machines proposed by the Commission is accepted; second, the proportion of customers that would opt for high- or low-capacity SBM machines for the packaging of 'sensitive' products<sup>136</sup>, a proportion that also is of no relevance to the assessing of Tetra's ability to leverage its dominant position in carton in order to gain a dominant position in the market for low-capacity SBM machines too.

c 176. With regard to the first aspect, it is nevertheless easy to establish that the Commission's assessment of the definition of specific markets for SBM machines for the packaging of 'sensitive' products has not been accepted (see para 145, above). As regards the second, I observe that it is not at all clear that choices made by customers intending to package 'sensitive' products in PET would be irrelevant in assessing development in the market for low-capacity SBM machines and the opportunity for the new entity to gain a dominant position in it. More generally, I cannot see how the Court of First Instance can be reproached for ascertaining whether the Commission's assessment concerning the acquiring of such a dominant position was based on an accurate and thorough analysis of the dynamics of the relevant market.

d 177. Turning then to the grounds of complaint relating to the high-capacity SBM machine market, I shall observe immediately that the objection raised by the Commission alleging that the Court of First Instance failed to take into account the immediate strengthening of Sidel's position as a result of the factors referred to in para 172, above<sup>137</sup>, must, in my opinion, mutatis mutandis, be rejected for the same reasons as those set out in para 173, above.

e 178. On the other hand, the objection relating to the Court of First Instance's assertion that 'the "first-mover" advantage [enjoyed by Tetra vis-à-vis customers intending to switch to PET] has been overestimated'<sup>138</sup> appears to me to be in part well founded.

f 179. In fact, I consider that with regard to the packaging of liquid dairy products the Commission rightly argues that the assessment made by the Court of First Instance is marred by errors it committed in relation to its estimates of growth in the use of PET (see para 103, above) and, in particular, the relationship between that material and HDPE (see para 98, above). The judgment under appeal makes it apparent that, as regards the packaging of the products in question, the Court of First Instance considered 'overestimated' the first mover advantage, in substance: (i) because '[t]he foreseeable growth in PET use among Tetra's ... customers on the aseptic carton market is not

i <sup>135</sup> Paragraph 280.

<sup>136</sup> On this point the Commission mentions in particular the Court of First Instance's statement that 'a significant proportion of the SBM machines used to package sensitive products will, in all likelihood, be low-capacity machines' (see para 279 of the judgment).

<sup>137</sup> Here the Commission refers in particular to the statement that 'Tetra would add nothing to the merged entity on this market [high-capacity SBM machines]' (see para 284 of the judgment).

<sup>138</sup> Paragraph 288.

considerable'<sup>139</sup>; and (ii) because '[a]s regards fresh milk in particular, the contested decision does not give an adequate explanation of the relationship between HDPE and PET'<sup>140</sup>. a

180. By contrast, I believe that that part of the Commission's objection cannot be accepted which criticises the assessment of the first mover advantage in relation to customers intending to switch from glass to PET, alleging in particular that the Court of First Instance: (i) failed to take into consideration the fact that only rarely do customers packaging drinks in glass use that material exclusively; (ii) distorted the facts when it stated that, with reference to those customers, Tetra's competitors 'active on the glass and PET packaging markets', such as SIG, Krones and KHS, could 'enjoy [a]... "first-mover" advantage'<sup>141</sup>. b

181. In fact I agree with Tetra that those arguments of the Commission's must be rejected, since they are based on matters not mentioned in the contested decision<sup>142</sup> (see para 106, above) and, in any event, especially as regards (ii), raise questions of fact which the Court of Justice has no jurisdiction to resolve (see paras 59–61, above). c

182. Then that objection seems to me baseless in which the Commission charges the Court of First Instance with stating: first, that 'the contested decision should have examined in more detail the ability of that competition to resist leveraging on the part of the merged entity'<sup>143</sup>; and, second, that 'the Commission committed an error in underestimating the importance of SIG's current position on the market for high-capacity machines and by playing down the positions held on that market by the merged entity's other principal competitors, in particular SIPA and Krones'<sup>144</sup>. d

183. I do not in fact believe that, as the Commission submits, the Court of First Instance distorted the contents of the decision (in particular, by denying that it contained any analysis of Sidel's position on the SBM machine markets vis-à-vis its competitors)<sup>145</sup> or that it substituted its own point of view for that of the Commission. e

184. Rather, the Court of First Instance simply found that, in view of the considerable and unchallenged increase in market shares recorded in recent years by those three competitors of Sidel (SIG, SIPA and Krones), and having regard to the timely observations made by Tetra during the administrative procedure, the Commission ought not to have confined itself to the generic observations contained in the decision, but ought to have examined more particularly those three companies' competitive power and ability to respond. f

139 Paragraph 288.

140 Paragraph 289. With reference to the relationship between HDPE and PET, the Court of First Instance considers in particular that 'it is at least as likely that Tetra's existing customers who wish to switch part of their fresh milk production to plastic will choose HDPE rather than PET' (see footnote above). h

141 Paragraph 290.

142 Only in relation to (i) does the Commission attempt to find a pretext in the decision for its assertions (recitals (14), (335)). Nevertheless, far from demonstrating that the decision makes it clear that glass customers are only rarely exclusively glass customers, the Commission quotes passages in which it is stated generally that '[i]ncreasingly, beverage companies use a mix of different materials to package their products', providing the single example of Coca Cola as a drink which 'can be found in glass, PET and aluminium cans' (recital (14)). i

143 Paragraph 294.

144 Paragraph 297.

145 On this subject, the Commission refers in particular to recitals (232) (248), (293)–(300), (303)–(310) and (369)–(387) of the decision.

- a The Court of First Instance did actually remark that it was only in relation to SIG that the contested decision contained any specific assessment (which cannot, it seems to me, be disputed in any substance) and considered that those assessments did not adequately answer the specific and pertinent points raised by Tetra<sup>146</sup>. It is from that point of view, therefore, that the statement must be read that in the decision the position of those three companies was
- b 'underestimated' or 'played down': meaning, that is, that the Commission did not give the consideration of their position that attention which, given the circumstances of the case, was necessary.

c 185. Furthermore, I would add that the part of the objection that goes so far as to accuse the Court of First Instance of distorting the facts in the definition of certain advantages enjoyed by Sidel's competitors raises questions of fact which the Court of Justice has no jurisdiction to resolve (see paras 59–61, above).

d 186. On the other hand the final objection, concerning the opportunity for converters to resist leveraging, does seem to me to be well founded. In this objection the Commission alleges that the Court of First Instance did not provide adequate reasons for its statements, did not answer the arguments put forward by the Commission in its decision and unlawfully substituted its own point of view for that of the appellant.

e 187. Indeed, I agree with the Commission that the Court of First Instance did not adequately explain what were the errors, the deficiencies of investigation or flaws of logic that, in its view, invalidated the Commission's conclusion that converters were 'to a certain extent dependent on Sidel and would continue to be dependent on the merged entity'<sup>147</sup>. Without making any assessment of the wide-ranging analysis carried out by the Commission in order to arrive at that conclusion<sup>148</sup>, the Court of First Instance did in fact no more than assert: (i) that, 'given the current level of existing competition, also in the high-capacity SBM machine market, the finding of the converters' dependency

f on Sidel is not convincing'; (ii) that, 'if the sales conditions offered by the merged entity were to become less attractive, converters could always purchase such machines from one of Sidel's current competitors'<sup>149</sup>.

g 188. From what is apparently to be understood, the Court of First Instance therefore found the Commission's conclusion that the converters were dependent on Sidel 'not convincing' just because they could have bought SBM machines from that company's competitors. By so doing, the Court of First Instance failed, however, to consider that, although the Commission had acknowledged that converters could 'turn to other suppliers of SBM machines for purchases of new machinery and design and testing of preforms', none the less—in the light of its market analysis—it considered that 'switching costs and

h the continued need to use the large number of Sidel machines they have already acquired will prolong converters' current degree of dependency on Sidel'<sup>150</sup>.

146 See, in particular, the observations in para 295 of the judgment under appeal.

147 Recital (310).

i 148 See recitals (303)–(310) of the decision.

149 Paragraph 305 of the judgment. For our purposes here no particular importance seems to attach to the later clarification that 'SIG and Elopak could also offer [to converters] carton equipment if the converters' customers want the joint supply of PET and carton packaging equipment', since the Commission had in no manner linked the converters' dependency on Sidel or on the merged entity to the need for joint supplies of PET and carton packaging equipment.

150 Recital (310) of the decision.

189. It therefore seems obvious to me that, while the Court of First Instance might possibly discover mistakes, deficiencies of investigation or flaws of logic in the Commission's reasoning, it could not reject the conclusion reached by that institution without stating sufficient reasons. I would moreover observe that the line of argument used by Tetra to justify the Court of First Instance's opinion as to the converters' chance to respond, regardless of its merits, cannot make good the defective reasoning which mars the judgment under appeal.

(b) The effect of the errors detected on the conclusion arrived at by the Court of First Instance

190. Of the foregoing considerations the following must, to my mind, be regarded as well founded: (i) the objection concerning the first mover advantage, in so far as it relates to the packaging of LDPs (see paras 178, 179, above), and (ii) the objection concerning the opportunity for converters to resist leveraging (see para 186, above).

191. I consider, nevertheless, that the errors made by the Court of First Instance and made clear in those objections are not such as to vitiate the conclusion reached by that court—

'that the contested decision does not prove to the requisite legal standard that by 2005 the merged entity could acquire a dominant position on the market for low- and high-capacity machines, thereby fulfilling the conditions of art 2(3) of Regulation 4064/89 as regards those markets.'<sup>151</sup>

192. Indeed, that conclusion seems to me to be most certainly justified by the many defects in the decision which the Court of First Instance has identified in assessments not challenged in these proceedings or challenged in objections here held to be unfounded. Since there is no need to dwell on this point, drawing up a long list of the defects in question, I can confine myself to the observation that, in addition to the flaws identified in the course of assessments which have been the subject of unsuccessful objections in this ground of appeal, it is necessary to bear in mind the defects relating to: (i) the failure to take into consideration, as a possible disincentive to leveraging, the unlawfulness of certain conduct and the commitments as to conduct offered by Tetra (defect identified in the assessments unsuccessfully challenged in the second ground of appeal); (ii) the identification of specific markets for SBM machines for packaging 'sensitive' products (defect identified in assessments unsuccessfully challenged in the third ground of appeal).

193. It follows therefore that acceptance of the two objections mentioned in para 190, above cannot of itself vitiate the conclusion arrived at by the Court of First Instance in relation to the creation of a dominant position on the low- and high-capacity SBM machine markets.

Concluding considerations on the outcome of the appeal

194. In the light of all the foregoing considerations, it must be found that, even though various of the objections raised by the Commission have proved to be founded, they are not enough to vitiate the conclusions arrived at by the Court of First Instance concerning the strengthening of Tetra's dominant position on the carton markets and the creation of a dominant position on the low- and high-capacity SBM machine markets.

<sup>151</sup> Paragraph 307 of the judgment.

a 195. In such a situation I must point out that, in accordance with settled case law—

‘where the grounds of a judgment of the Court of First Instance disclose an infringement of Community law but the operative part of the judgment is shown to be well founded for other legal reasons, the appeal must be dismissed.’<sup>152</sup>

b 196. Taking into account, therefore, that the operative part of the judgment under appeal, relating to the annulment of the decision, is certainly well founded on the many grounds of law that support the Court of First Instance’s conclusions as to the strengthening of Tetra’s dominant position on the carton markets and the creation of a dominant position on the low- and high-capacity SBM machine markets, I consider that the Commission’s appeal must be dismissed.

c Costs

d 197. In the light of art 69(2) of the Rules of Procedure, and having regard to the conclusions I have reached concerning the dismissal of the appeal, I consider that the Commission must bear the costs.

IV—CONCLUSION

198. In the light of the foregoing conclusions, I propose that the Court of Justice should declare that:

- e —the appeal is dismissed;
—the Commission is to bear the costs.

15 February 2005. THE COURT OF JUSTICE (Grand Chamber) delivered the following judgment.

f 1. By its appeal, the Commission of the European Communities asks the Court of Justice to set aside the judgment of the Court of First Instance in Tetra Laval BV v European Commission Case T-5/02 [2003] All ER (EC) 762, [2002] ECR II-4381 (the judgment under appeal), by which the Court of First Instance annulled Commission Decision (EC) 2004/124 declaring a concentration to be incompatible with the common market and the EEA Agreement (Case No COMP/M.2416—Tetra Laval/Sidel) (OJ 2004 L43 p 13) (the contested decision).

g REGULATION (EEC) 4064/89

h 2. Article 2 of Council Regulation (EEC) 4064/89 (on the control of concentrations between undertakings) (OJ 1989 L395 p 1, corrected version in OJ 1990 L257 p 13), as amended by Council Regulation (EC) 1310/97 (OJ 1997 L180 p 1) (the regulation), provides:

‘1. Concentrations within the scope of this Regulation shall be appraised in accordance with the following provisions with a view to establishing whether or not they are compatible with the common market.

i In making this appraisal, the Commission shall take into account:

<sup>152</sup> See European Commission v Camar Srl Case C-312/00 P [2002] ECR I-11355 (para 57). To the same effect see Lestelle v EC Commission Case C-30/91 P [1992] ECR I-3755 (para 28), Società Finanziaria Siderurgica Finsider SpA (in liq) v European Commission Case C-320/92 P [1994] ECR I-5697 (para 37) and Salzgitter AG (formerly Preussag Stahl AG) v European Commission Case C-210/98 P [2000] ECR I-5843 (para 58).

(a) the need to preserve and develop effective competition within the common market in view of, among other things, the structure of all the markets concerned and the actual or potential competition from undertakings located either within or without the Community; a

(b) the market position of the undertakings concerned and their economic and financial power, the opportunities available to suppliers and users, their access to supplies or markets, any legal or other barriers to entry, supply and demand trends for the relevant goods and services, the interests of the intermediate and ultimate consumers, and the development of technical and economic progress provided that it is to consumers' advantage and does not form an obstacle to competition. b

2. A concentration which does not create or strengthen a dominant position as a result of which effective competition would be significantly impeded in the common market or in a substantial part of it shall be declared compatible with the common market. c

3. A concentration which creates or strengthens a dominant position as a result of which effective competition would be significantly impeded in the common market or in a substantial part of it shall be declared incompatible with the common market ... d

THE CONTESTED DECISION

3. It is apparent from the contested decision that four types of packaging are used for liquid food: carton packaging, plastic packaging (the material being either polyethylene terephthalate, PET, or high-density polyethylene, HDPE), cans and glass. The type of packaging used for a product is dependent on several factors. The most important factors are the technological characteristics of the product, those of the packaging material and those relating to the method of packaging. e

4. The contested decision focuses on 'sensitive' products. These include milk and liquid dairy products (LDPs), fruit juices and nectars, fruit-flavoured still drinks (FFDs) and tea and coffee drinks. In some cases, the products must be protected against light, as in the case of milk, or against oxygen, as in the case of fruit juices and, to a lesser extent, FFDs and tea and coffee drinks. Since PET is a porous resin through which oxygen and light can pass, it is less appropriate for such products than carton. Nevertheless, research is being carried out into methods of 'barrier' technology, that is to say, methods which ensure protection against oxygen and light. f

5. The packaging technology is also an important factor in choosing the type of packaging. Certain acidic products, such as milk and fruit juices, must either be packaged in aseptic conditions or distributed in chilled form. It is apparent from the file that aseptic conditions can be better maintained if those types of products are packaged in carton because the packaging process is carried out in a single step by the producer of the liquid food in question. In the majority of cases, the producer has an integrated packaging line. It purchases the carton in reels and then cuts, shapes, fills and seals the packaging. g

6. By contrast, the packaging of a liquid product in PET is, in most cases, carried out in several stages, which makes it more difficult to guarantee aseptic conditions. First of all, a plastic tube made of resin called a preform must be produced, then an empty bottle must be formed by placing the preform in a 'stretch blow moulding' machine (SBM machine) containing the appropriate mould for the desired shape and, in a final step only, the bottle must be filled and closed. These various stages may be carried out by different undertakings. h

i

a Thus, there are 'converters', who manufacture empty packaging and supply it to liquid producers. However, integrated production lines and production techniques whereby packaging in aseptic conditions can be more easily guaranteed are currently being developed.

b 7. By the contested decision, the Commission declared incompatible with the common market and the functioning of the Agreement on the European Economic Area of 2 May 1992 (OJ 1994 L1 p 3) the acquisition of Sidel SA by Tetra Laval BV (the notified merger). Tetra Laval BV (Tetra) is a holding company of the Tetra group, which also includes the Tetra Pak company, which is the world leader in the carton packaging sector and is regarded as holding a dominant position in aseptic packaging on that market, whereas c Sidel SA (Sidel) is a leading company in the sector of production and supply of SBM machines and is active in the area of 'barrier' technology. The decision was adopted pursuant to art 8(3) of the regulation.

d 8. In the contested decision, the Commission concluded that the markets for carton and PET packaging systems are distinct but closely related and potentially converging markets which have a growing number of common customers. It also found that there are, in particular, distinct markets for high and low capacity SBM machines and that those markets can, in turn, be subdivided into markets for sensitive and non-sensitive products. This distinction according to end use can be explained by the differences in the specifications for those machines, since their producers may charge different prices according to the end use, which can be determined at the time of e purchase. Such price discrimination cannot be avoided by way of arbitrage.

f 9. According to the Commission, the notified merger would encourage Tetra to 'leverage' its dominant position on the market for equipment and consumables for carton packaging so as to persuade its customers on that market who are switching to PET in order to package certain sensitive products to choose Sidel's SBM machines, thereby excluding much smaller competitors and turning Sidel's leading position on the market for SBM machines for sensitive products into a dominant position. Tetra would be helped in this by its close and sustained relationship with its customers, its financial strength, its know-how and its reputation in the aseptic and ultra-clean sector, by Sidel's current strength, technology and reputation for quality and by the vertical integration from which the entity emerging from g the notified merger (the merged entity) will profit in relation to the three packaging systems (carton, PET and HDPE).

h 10. The Commission also concluded that, given the weak competition on the markets for equipment and consumables for carton packaging, the merger of Tetra with the leading producer on the growing market for PET equipment, a market which is closely related to that for carton, would eliminate an important source of potential competition. This would strengthen Tetra's dominant position on the carton packaging markets and reduce its incentive to adjust its prices and innovate to face the threat which PET poses to its position.

i 11. Tetra entered into a number of commitments, including a commitment to keep Tetra and Sidel separate for ten years, not to make joint offers for both its carton products and SBM machines made by Sidel and to comply with its obligations under Commission Decision (EEC) 92/163 (relating to a proceeding pursuant to art 86 of the EEC Treaty (now art 82 EC) (IV/31.043—Tetra Pak II)) (OJ 1992 L72 p 1). The Commission took the view that such commitments were insufficient to resolve the structural competition concerns raised by the notified merger and argued that it would be virtually impossible to monitor compliance with them. Therefore, in art 1 of the contested decision, the Commission declared the merger incompatible with the common market and the functioning of the Agreement on the European Economic Area. a

THE JUDGMENT UNDER APPEAL

12. By application lodged at the Registry of the Court of First Instance on 15 January 2002, Tetra brought an action for annulment of the contested decision. In the judgment under appeal, the Court of First Instance held that the Commission had committed manifest errors of assessment in its findings as to leveraging and the strengthening of Tetra's dominant position in the carton sector and therefore annulled the contested decision. b

13. As regards the Commission's claims that the notified merger would have anti-competitive conglomerate effects and, in particular, give the merged entity the capacity and incentive to engage in leveraging by exploiting its overall position in the carton sector with a view to attaining a dominant position on the market for SBM machines, the Court of First Instance observed that the Commission itself had taken the view that such a dominant position would not arise from the merger itself but rather from the foreseeable conduct of the merged entity. However, the Court of First Instance held that, where the Commission takes the view that a merger should be prohibited because it will create or strengthen a dominant position within a foreseeable period, it is incumbent upon it to produce convincing evidence thereof. c

14. The Court of First Instance also stated that in order to assess the foreseeability of the merged entity's conduct the Commission must examine all the circumstances which might determine that conduct. Given that, in the case of a dominant undertaking such as Tetra, the supposed leveraging could constitute an abuse of the pre-existing dominant position, the Court of First Instance held that, when examining the likelihood of the adoption of anti-competitive conduct, the Commission must have regard not only to the incentives to adopt such conduct but also to the factors liable to reduce, or even eliminate, those incentives, such as the probability of legal action against and penalties for such conduct. Since the Commission had failed to carry out such an examination, its findings could not be upheld. Consequently, the Court of First Instance examined whether the Commission could nevertheless establish the merits of its argument in the absence of those findings. d

15. The Court of First Instance found that there was, in principle, a possibility of leveraging by the merged entity. Nevertheless, it also found that the Commission had overestimated the likely level of growth in the PET sector and that, for the reasons set out above, the leveraging methods which could be taken into consideration by the Court of First Instance were limited to those which do not infringe Community law. It concluded that the Commission had on the whole failed to fulfil its obligation to establish that the potential leveraging would lead to the creation or strengthening of a dominant position on the relevant markets by 2005. With regard, in particular, to SBM machines, the Court of First Instance held that the contested decision did not contain sufficient evidence to justify the definition by the Commission of distinct SBM machine markets for sensitive and for non-sensitive products. e

16. As regards the Commission's claim that '[Tetra's] current dominant position in carton packaging' would be strengthened by the elimination of a source of constraints on competition from neighbouring markets as a result of the elimination of competition from Sidel on the PET packing market, the f a Court of First Instance held that the Commission had to prove that strengthening, which cannot be inferred automatically from the fact that there is a dominant position. It found that the Commission had failed to provide such proof.

b THE APPEAL

17. The Commission relies on five grounds of appeal. The first ground alleges an error in law as to the standard of proof which it is required to satisfy and as to the scope of the Court of First Instance's power of judicial review. The second ground alleges infringement of arts 2 and 8 of the regulation in so far as the Court of First Instance required the Commission, first, to take account of the impact which the illegality of certain conduct has on the incentives for the merged entity to engage in leveraging and, secondly, to assess, as a potential remedy, the commitments not to adopt any abusive conduct. The third ground alleges that the Court of First Instance erred in law by applying an erroneous test of judicial review and infringed art 2 of the regulation by failing to uphold the definition of distinct markets for SBM machines according to end use. The fourth ground alleges infringement of art 2 of the regulation, distortion of the facts and failure to take account of the Commission's arguments in that the Court of First Instance failed to recognise the merits of the Commission's finding that Tetra would strengthen its dominant position in the carton sector. The fifth ground alleges infringement of art 2(3) of the regulation in that the Court of First Instance rejected the Commission's conclusions as to the creation of a dominant position on the market for SBM machines.

e 18. In its reply, Tetra requested, as a measure of inquiry, an order that a French version of the appeal be produced. The court rejected that request by order of 24 July 2003.

f The first ground of appeal

19. By its first ground of appeal, the Commission complains that the Court of First Instance, whilst claiming to apply the test of manifest error of assessment, in fact applied a different test requiring the production of 'convincing evidence'. In doing so, the Court of First Instance infringed art 230 EC (formerly art 173 of the EC Treaty) by failing to take account of the discretion conferred on the Commission with regard to complex factual and economic matters. It also infringed art 2(2) and (3) of the regulation in that it applied a presumption of legality in respect of concentrations with conglomerate effect. Taking the example of the review of the Commission's forecast of significant growth in the use of PET packaging for sensitive products, the Commission claims that the Court of First Instance distorted the facts, failed to give adequate reasons for the rejection of its arguments and failed to take account of factors, arguments and evidence put forward by it in the contested decision and in its defence, and even refrained from referring to that defence.

i 20. In para 119 of the judgment under appeal, the Court of First Instance set out as follows the criteria for judicial review of a Commission decision on a concentration:

'As a preliminary point, it must be recalled that the substantive rules of the regulation, in particular art 2, confer on the Commission a certain discretion, especially with respect to assessments of an economic nature.'

Consequently, review by the Community judicature of the exercise of that discretion, which is essential for defining the rules on concentrations, must take account of the discretionary margin implicit in the provisions of an economic nature which form part of the rules on concentrations (see France v European Commission Joined cases C-68/94 and C-30/95 [1998] ECR I-1375 (paras 223, 224) (the Kali and Salz case), Gencor Ltd v European Commission (Germany intervening) Case T-102/96 [1999] All ER (EC) 289 at 315, [1999] ECR II-753, at 805 (paras 164, 165) and Airtours plc v European Commission Case T-342/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 783 at 796, [2002] ECR II-2585 (para 64)).'

21. In para 120 of the judgment under appeal, the Court of First Instance interpreted art 2(3) of the regulation as follows:

'It must also be recalled that under art 2(3) of Regulation 4064/89 a concentration which creates or strengthens a dominant position as a result of which effective competition would be significantly impeded in the common market or in a substantial part of it must be declared incompatible with the common market. Conversely, the Commission is bound to declare a concentration falling within the scope of application of the regulation compatible with the common market where the two conditions laid down in that provision are not fulfilled (see SA à Participation Ouvrière Cie Nationale Air France v European Commission Case T-2/93 [1994] ECR II-323 (para 79); see also, to this effect, the Gencor case [1999] All ER (EC) 289 at 316, [1999] ECR II-753 at 807 (para 170) and the Airtours case [2002] All ER (EC) 783 at 794, 799–800, [2002] ECR II-2585 (paras 58, 82)). If, therefore, a dominant position is not created or strengthened, the transaction must be authorised and there is no need to examine the effects of the transaction on effective competition (see the Air France case (para 79)).'

22. The first ground of appeal relied on by the Commission relates to a number of paragraphs in the judgment under appeal. However, it is appropriate to reproduce the passages from that judgment which relate to the conglomerate nature of the notified merger, which is defined in para 142 of that judgment as 'a merger of undertakings which, essentially, do not have a pre-existing competitive relationship, either as direct competitors or as suppliers and customers', a merger which does not give rise to true horizontal overlaps between the activities of the parties to it or to a vertical relationship between the parties in the strict sense of the term and in respect of which it therefore cannot be presumed, as a general rule, that it produces anti-competitive effects.

23. In para 146 of the judgment under appeal, the Court of First Instance interpreted the regulation, in so far as it applies to conglomerates, as follows:

'It should be observed, first, that Regulation 4064/89, particularly at art 2(2) and (3), does not draw any distinction between, on the one hand, merger transactions having horizontal and vertical effects and, on the other hand, those having a conglomerate effect. It follows that, without distinction between those types of transactions, a merger can be prohibited only if the two conditions laid down in art 2(3) are met (see para 120, above). Consequently, a merger having a conglomerate effect must, like any other merger (see para 120, above), be authorised by the Commission if it is not established that it creates or strengthens a dominant position in a the common market or in a substantial part of it and that, as a result, effective competition will be significantly impeded.'

24. With respect to the impact on competition of a conglomerate-type merger and to the Commission's analysis in that regard, the Court of First Instance held as follows:

b '148. It is necessary first to determine whether a merger transaction creating a competitive structure which does not immediately confer on the merged entity a dominant position may nevertheless be prohibited under art 2(3) of Regulation 4064/89, when in all likelihood it will allow that entity, as a result of leveraging by the acquiring party from a market in which it is already dominant, to obtain in the relatively near future a dominant position on another market in which the party acquired currently holds a leading position, and when the acquisition in question has significant anti-competitive effects on the relevant markets ...

c 150. The court observes that, in principle, a merger between undertakings which are active on distinct markets is not usually of such a nature as immediately to create or strengthen a dominant position due to the combination of the market shares held by the parties to the merger. The factors which are of significance for the relative positions of competitors within a given market are generally to be found within the market itself, namely in particular the market shares held by the competitors and the conditions of competition on the market. It does not follow, however, that the conditions of competition on a market can never be affected by factors external to that market.

d 151. Thus, by way of example, in a case where the markets in question are neighbouring markets and one of the parties to a merger transaction already holds a dominant position on one of the markets, the means and capacities brought together by the transaction may immediately create conditions allowing the merged entity to leverage its way so as to acquire, in the relatively near future, a dominant position on the other market. This could especially be the case where the relevant markets are tending to converge and where, in addition to the dominant position held by one of the parties to the transaction on a market, the other party, or one of the other parties, to the transaction holds a leading position on another market.

e 152. Any other interpretation of art 2(3) of the regulation could deprive the Commission of the power to exercise control over merger transactions which have solely or principally a conglomerate effect.

f 153. Consequently, in a prospective analysis of the effects of a conglomerate-type merger transaction, if the Commission is able to conclude that a dominant position would, in all likelihood, be created or strengthened in the relatively near future and would lead to effective competition on the market being significantly impeded, it must prohibit it (see, in this regard, the Kali and Salz case (para 221), the Gencor case [1999] All ER (EC) 289 at 315, [1999] ECR II-753 at 804 (para 162) and the Airtours case [2002] All ER (EC) 783 at 796, [2002] ECR II-2585 (para 63)).

g 154. In this context, it is also appropriate to distinguish, on the one hand, between a situation where a merger having conglomerate effects immediately changes the conditions of competition on the second market and results in the creation or strengthening of a dominant position on that market due to the dominant position already held on the first market and, on the other hand, a situation where the creation or strengthening of a dominant position on the second market does not immediately result from the merger, but will occur, in those circumstances, only after a certain time and will result from conduct engaged in by the merged entity on the first market where it already holds a dominant position. In this latter case, it is not the structure resulting from the merger transaction itself which creates or strengthens a dominant position within the meaning of art 2(3) of the regulation, but rather the future conduct in question. a

155. The Commission's analysis of a merger producing a conglomerate effect is conditioned by requirements similar to those defined by the court with regard to the creation of a situation of collective dominance (see the Kali and Salz case (para 222) and the Airtours case [2002] All ER (EC) 783 at 796, [2002] ECR II-2585 (para 63)). Thus the Commission's analysis of a merger transaction which is expected to have an anti-competitive conglomerate effect calls for a particularly close examination of the circumstances which are relevant for an assessment of that effect on the conditions of competition in the reference market. As the court has already held, where the Commission takes the view that a merger should be prohibited because it will create or strengthen a dominant position within a foreseeable period, it is incumbent upon it to produce convincing evidence thereof (see the Airtours case (para 63)). Since the effects of a conglomerate-type merger are generally considered to be neutral, or even beneficial, for competition on the markets concerned, as is recognised in the present case by the economic writings cited in the analyses annexed to the parties' written pleadings, the proof of anti-competitive conglomerate effects of such a merger calls for a precise examination, supported by convincing evidence, of the circumstances which allegedly produce those effects (see, by analogy, the Airtours case (para 63)).' b

Arguments of the parties

25. The Commission claims that the Court of First Instance departed from principles laid down by the court in its judgment in the Kali and Salz case in terms of both the nature of the judicial review carried out by it and the standard of proof which it required the Commission to satisfy. It submits that the following paragraphs of that judgment are relevant in this regard: c

'220. As stated above, under Article 2(3) of the Regulation, concentrations which create or strengthen a dominant position as a result of which effective competition would be significantly impeded in the common market or in a substantial part of it must be declared incompatible with the common market. d

221. In the case of an alleged collective dominant position, the Commission is therefore obliged to assess, using a prospective analysis of the reference market, whether the concentration which has been referred to it leads to a situation in which effective competition in the relevant market is significantly impeded by the undertakings involved in the concentration and one or more other undertakings which together, in particular because of correlative factors which exist between them, are able to adopt a common policy on the market and act to a considerable extent independently of their competitors, their customers, and also of consumers. e

- a* 222. Such an approach warrants close examination in particular of the circumstances which, in each individual case, are relevant for assessing the effects of the concentration on competition in the reference market.
223. In this respect, however, the basic provisions of the Regulation, in particular Article 2 thereof, confer on the Commission a certain discretion, especially with respect to assessments of an economic nature.
- b* 224. Consequently, review by the Community judicature of the exercise of that discretion, which is essential for defining the rules on concentrations, must take account of the discretionary margin implicit in the provisions of an economic nature which form part of the rules on concentrations.'
- c* 26. The Commission concludes from the principles referred to in the Kali and Salz case and from the review carried out by the court in that case that it is required to examine the relevant market closely, weigh up all the relevant factors, and base its assessment on evidence which is factually accurate, is not clearly insignificant and is capable of substantiating the conclusions drawn from it and that it must reach its conclusions on the basis of consistent reasoning.
- d* 27. The Commission takes the view, first of all, that the standard of 'convincing evidence' differs substantially, in degree and in nature, both from the obligation to produce 'cogent and consistent' evidence, established in the Kali and Salz case, and from the principle that the Commission's assessment must be accepted unless it is shown to be manifestly wrong. The standard is different in degree because, unlike the standard of 'convincing evidence', that of cogent and consistent evidence does not rule out the possibility that another body might reach a different conclusion if it were competent to give a decision on the matter. The standard required is likewise different in nature inasmuch as it transforms the role of the Community courts into that of a different body
- e* which is competent to rule on the matter in all its complexity and which is entitled to substitute its views for those of the Commission. The Court of First Instance was inconsistent in that it referred to the test of manifest error of assessment yet applied a very different test.
- f* 28. Next, the Commission submits that a margin of discretion is inherent in any prospective analysis. The likelihood of certain market developments within a foreseeable time frame must be determined on the basis of the current market situation, observable trends and other appropriate indicators. To require that the Commission's assessment be, in effect, based on undisputed or virtually unequivocal evidence, irrespective of its merit, would deprive the Commission of its function of evaluating the evidence and attaching, for
- g* justifiable reasons, more weight to some sources than to others.
- h* 29. Finally, the Commission submits that the standard of proof required by the Court of First Instance means that it is placed under an obligation to authorise the transaction in cases in which the evidence does not meet the requisite standard, which is tantamount to a general, de facto presumption of the legality of certain concentrations or, at the very least, to the establishment
- i* of a bias in their favour. However, art 2(3) and (3) imposes on the Commission a double obligation, namely either to prohibit a concentration if it creates or strengthens a dominant position or, as a symmetrical but opposite obligation, to approve it if it neither creates nor strengthens such a position. That obligation reflects the intention of the Community legislature to protect equally the private interests of the parties to the concentration and the public interest in maintaining effective competition and in consumer protection. This symmetrical double obligation calls for the application of a symmetrical test in relation to the standard of proof required of the Commission since it must prove the merits of its assessment equally in both cases. a

30. By way of illustration of the judicial review carried out by the Court of First Instance in the judgment under appeal, the Commission refers, in particular, to the assessment of the growth in the use of PET packaging for sensitive products. In that connection, the Court of First Instance held as follows: b

‘210. At the hearing, the Commission stated that its reasoning is not based on the precise accuracy of its forecasts, inasmuch as it is accepted that there will be significant future growth. It also acknowledged there that, in the light of the remaining uncertainties surrounding the commercial applicability of the necessary barrier technologies, it could not assume significant PET growth for the [non-flavoured] UHT milk market, and that even the weak growth predicted in the contested decision could turn out to be an overestimation. It did, however, emphasise that its forecasts for probable strong growth in the use of PET for fresh milk, juices, FFDs and particularly tea/coffee drinks in the period up to 2005 were entirely plausible. c

211. The court finds that the use of PET will not actually increase for UHT milk and, consequently, for approximately half of the LDP market. d

212. As regards the rest of the LDP market, it must be found that the PCI report, [entitled The Potential for PET in the Packaging of Liquid Dairy Products (2001)] (p 64), the only independent study to concentrate on the LDP market, predicts growth as a result of which PET use will be 9.2% of the fresh non-flavoured milk market in 2005. In addition there is the fact that, for aseptic packaging, the Warrick report [entitled Warrick Research Report Packaging Markets—Aseptic Packaging Markets World & Western Europe—(2000)] predicts only minimal growth, of 1%, for flavoured milk, and a slight decline for other milk-based drinks, whilst the Pictet report [entitled Analysts’ Report Pictet—European Packaging Machinery, Move into PET] does not give any specific forecasts for LDPs. On the basis of that evidence, the Commission has not shown what it claims to have shown in its defence, namely that its forecasts for LDPs are based on a prudent analysis of the independent studies or on a solid, coherent body of evidence obtained by it through its market investigation. The growth estimates adopted by the Commission (para 209, above) are not really very convincing. The PCI report (pp 63, 64), on the other hand, provides the only proof which might possibly support the forecast of a 25% market share for PET in other milk-based drinks (namely flavoured milk and drinks based on milk and yoghurt) by 2005. However, if that growth were to be realised, the relevant volume would increase only by 62,000 tonnes for 2000, to reach 92,800 tonnes in 2005, an increase which is not very significant in relation to the roughly 120 million tonnes of milk produced in the Community each year (PCI p 9). More generally, the contested decision does not explain adequately how PET could displace HDPE as the main material competing with carton by 2005, especially in the important fresh milk packaging segment. It must be pointed out that the Commission does not dispute either the overall figure of 17.3% for the use of HDPE for e
f
g
h
i

a LDPs given by [the consulting company] Canadean for 2000 (see table 3 in recital (66)) or the forecast that that figure could reach 19.5% by 2005 (see table 5 in recital (105)).

b 213. As regards juices, the Commission's forecast is even less convincing. Although the Commission itself acknowledged that the growth in question would be due mainly to a switch from glass to PET, it did not conduct any analysis of the glass market. In the absence of such an analysis, the court is unable to ascertain the accuracy of the Commission's forecasts for juices. An analysis of that kind would have been indispensable to enable the court to determine the likely level of switch from glass to carton, PET and HDPE. It was all the more indispensable given the differences between the relevant forecasts made in the Canadean and Warrick studies, on the one hand, and the Pictet study, on the other, as regards levels of growth and the time periods used in the analyses.

c 214. It follows that the growth forecasts for LDPs and juices as stated by the Commission in the contested decision have not been proven to the requisite legal standard. Although a certain amount of growth in those segments is likely, especially for premium products, convincing evidence of the extent of the growth is lacking.

d 215. By contrast, the independent studies do show that, by 2005, there will in all likelihood be a significant increase in the use of PET for packaging FFDs and tea/coffee drinks, including isotonic drinks. Since the level of growth forecast in the contested decision was not seriously called into question by the applicant at the hearing and is not overestimated compared with the forecast in the studies, the court finds that the Commission did not commit an error on this point.

e 31. The Commission complains, in essence, that the Court of First Instance failed to demonstrate that the Commission's estimates of the growth in use of PET were based, first, on factual errors, secondly, on findings of fact which were not established or on conclusions drawn from manifestly insignificant evidence, thirdly, on inconsistencies or errors in reasoning or, fourthly, on the omission of relevant factors. The Court of First Instance rejected, without explanation, the Commission's assessment of the evidence, distorted the factual evidence, for example in finding, in para 213 of the judgment under appeal, that the Commission had failed to analyse the glass market, and imposed its own findings, which were contrary to those of the Commission and manifestly wrong, for example in finding, in para 289 of the judgment, that '[f]resh milk is not a product for which the marketing advantages offered by PET have any particular importance' or, in paras 288 and 328, that PET is more expensive than carton.

f 32. Tetra contends that the Commission's first ground of appeal is merely a semantic discussion of the terms used in the judgment under appeal and does not relate to the substantive examination carried out by the Court of First Instance. The Commission's argument is to no avail since there is no consistent terminology with regard to the requisite standard of proof.

g 33. Tetra also points out that the terminology used by the court in the judgment in the Kali and Salz case, to which the Commission refers in connection with the rules on evidence, did not preclude the court, in that case, from examining in detail both the facts relied on by the Commission in support of its arguments and the conclusions which it had reached in the decision at issue.

34. According to Tetra, the Court of First Instance respected the Commission's margin of discretion and did not exceed the bounds of its power of judicial review by rejecting the statement of reasons for the contested decision, but merely found that the Commission had failed to establish leveraging. a

35. Tetra contends that the Commission has misinterpreted para 153 of the judgment under appeal in inferring from it that it establishes an asymmetrical standard of proof and a de facto presumption of the legality of concentrations. In that paragraph, the Court of First Instance merely set out the rules governing the obligation to prove the effects of concentrations. b

36. With regard to the example put forward by the Commission in relation to the Court of First Instance's analysis of the growth in the use of PET for packaging-sensitive products, Tetra carries out a comparative analysis of the appeal and the judgment under appeal with a view to showing that the Commission has misread or distorted the judgment and has quoted certain passages out of context. c

Findings of the court as to the first ground of appeal d

37. By its first ground of appeal, the Commission contests the judgment under appeal in so far as the Court of First Instance required it, when adopting a decision declaring a concentration incompatible with the common market, to satisfy a standard of proof and to provide a quality of evidence in support of its line of argument which are incompatible with the wide discretion which it enjoys in assessing economic matters. It thus complains that the Court of First Instance infringed art 230 EC by exceeding the limits of its power of review established by case law and, as a result, misapplied art 2(2) and (3) of the regulation by creating a presumption of legality in respect of certain concentrations. e

38. It should be observed that, in para 119 of the judgment under appeal, the Court of First Instance correctly set out the tests to be applied when carrying out judicial review of a Commission decision on a concentration as laid down in the judgment in the Kali and Salz case. In paras 223 and 224 of that judgment, the court stated that the basic provisions of the regulation, in particular art 2, confer on the Commission a certain discretion, especially with respect to assessments of an economic nature, and that, consequently, review by the Community courts of the exercise of that discretion, which is essential for defining the rules on concentrations, must take account of the margin of discretion implicit in the provisions of an economic nature which form part of the rules on concentrations. f

39. Whilst the court recognises that the Commission has a margin of discretion with regard to economic matters, that does not mean that the Community courts must refrain from reviewing the Commission's interpretation of information of an economic nature. Not only must the Community courts, inter alia, establish whether the evidence relied on is factually accurate, reliable and consistent but also whether that evidence contains all the information which must be taken into account in order to assess a complex situation and whether it is capable of substantiating the conclusions drawn from it. Such a review is all the more necessary in the case of a prospective analysis required when examining a planned merger with conglomerate effect. g

40. Thus, the Court of First Instance was right to find, in para 155 of the judgment under appeal, in reliance on, in particular, the judgment in the Kali h

a and Salz case, that the Commission's analysis of a merger producing a conglomerate effect is subject to requirements similar to those defined by the court with regard to the creation of a situation of collective dominance and that it calls for a close examination of the circumstances which are relevant for an assessment of that effect on the conditions of competition on the reference market.

b 41. Although the Court of First Instance stated, in para 155, that proof of anti-competitive conglomerate effects of a merger of the kind notified calls for a precise examination, supported by convincing evidence, of the circumstances which allegedly produce those effects, it by no means added a condition relating to the requisite standard of proof but merely drew attention to the essential function of evidence, which is to establish convincingly the merits of an argument or, as in the present case, of a decision on a merger.

c 42. A prospective analysis of the kind necessary in merger control must be carried out with great care since it does not entail the examination of past events—for which often many items of evidence are available which make it possible to understand the causes—or of current events, but rather a prediction of events which are more or less likely to occur in future if a decision prohibiting the planned concentration or laying down the conditions for it is not adopted.

d 43. Thus, the prospective analysis consists of an examination of how a concentration might alter the factors determining the state of competition on a given market in order to establish whether it would give rise to a serious impediment to effective competition. Such an analysis makes it necessary to envisage various chains of cause and effect with a view to ascertaining which of them are the most likely.

e 44. The analysis of a 'conglomerate-type' concentration is a prospective analysis in which, first, the consideration of a lengthy period of time in the future and, secondly, the leveraging necessary to give rise to a significant impediment to effective competition mean that the chains of cause and effect are dimly discernible, uncertain and difficult to establish. That being so, the quality of the evidence produced by the Commission in order to establish that it is necessary to adopt a decision declaring the concentration incompatible with the common market is particularly important, since that evidence must support the Commission's conclusion that, if such a decision were not adopted, the economic development envisaged by it would be plausible.

f 45. It follows from those various factors that the Court of First Instance did not err in law when it set out the tests to be applied in the exercise of its power of judicial review or when it specified the quality of the evidence which the Commission is required to produce in order to demonstrate that the requirements of art 2(3) of the regulation are satisfied.

g 46. With respect to the particular case of judicial review exercised by the Court of First Instance in the judgment under appeal, it is not apparent from the example given by the Commission, which relates to the growth in the use of PET packaging for sensitive products, that the Court of First Instance exceeded the limits applicable to the review of an administrative decision by the Community courts. Contrary to what the Commission claims, para 211 of the judgment under appeal merely restates more concisely, in the form of a finding by the Court of First Instance, the admission made by the Commission at the hearing, which is summarised in para 210 of the judgment, that its forecast in the contested decision with regard to the increase in the use of PET for packaging UHT milk was exaggerated. In para 212 of the judgment under appeal, the Court of First Instance gave the reasons for its finding that the evidence produced by the Commission was unfounded by stating that, of the three independent reports cited by the Commission, only the PCI report contained information on the use of PET for milk packaging. It went on, in that paragraph, to show that the evidence produced by the Commission was unconvincing by pointing out that the increase forecast in the PCI report was of little significance and that the Commission's forecast was inconsistent with the undisputed figures on the use of HDPE contained in the other reports. In para 213 of the judgment under appeal, the Court of First Instance merely stated that the Commission's analysis was incomplete, which made it impossible to confirm its forecasts, given the differences between those forecasts and the forecasts made in the other reports. a

b

47. Amongst the other examples given by it, the Commission challenges the Court of First Instance's finding, in para 289 of the judgment under appeal, that '[f]resh milk is not a product for which the marketing advantages offered by PET have any particular importance' and its conclusions as to the cost of PET in comparison to that of carton, which are set out in paras 288 and 328 of the judgment under appeal. It should be noted that these are findings of fact, which are not subject to review by the court in appeal proceedings. It is therefore unnecessary to give a ruling on the merits of those findings by the Court of First Instance and it need be stated only that the Court of First Instance was able to base those findings on various items in the contested decision. c
d

48. It follows from these examples that the Court of First Instance carried out its review in the manner required of it, as set out in para 39 of this judgment. It explained and set out the reasons why the Commission's conclusions seemed to it to be inaccurate in that they were based on insufficient, incomplete, insignificant and inconsistent evidence. e

49. In doing so, the Court of First Instance observed the criteria to be applied in exercising the Community courts' power of judicial review and, accordingly, complied with art 230 EC. f

50. Consequently, the above analyses do not show that the Court of First Instance infringed art 2(2) or (3) of the regulation.

51. It follows from all of the above considerations that the first ground of appeal is unfounded. g

The second ground of appeal

52. By its second ground of appeal, the Commission complains that the Court of First Instance infringed arts 2 and 8 of the regulation in that it required the Commission to take account of the impact which the illegality of certain conduct would have on the incentives for the merged entity to engage in leveraging and to assess, as a possible remedy, the commitment not to engage in abusive conduct. h

53. The contested parts of the judgment under appeal are in the section examining the plea alleging a lack of foreseeable conglomerate effect, in which, more specifically, the Court of First Instance analysed the likelihood of leveraging. According to the Commission's line of argument, the merged entity would have been capable of exploiting its dominant position on the market for aseptic carton and would have been encouraged to do so in order to leverage its leading position on the market for PET equipment, in particular that for high and low capacity SBM machines used for sensitive products, so as to create a dominant position. i a 54. The forms of leveraging are described as follows in recital (364) in the contested decision (reproduced in para 49 of the judgment under appeal):

b 'Leveraging [this position] ... in a number of ways ... Tetra/Sidel would have the ability to tie carton packaging equipment and consumables with PET packaging equipment and, possibly, preforms (in particular barrier-enhanced preforms). Tetra/Sidel would also have the ability to use pressure or incentives (such as predatory pricing or price wars and loyalty rebates) so that its carton customers buy PET equipment and, possibly, preforms from ... Tetra/Sidel and not from its competitors or converters.'

c 55. In response to the Commission's criticisms, Tetra proposed to enter into various commitments. However, the Commission took the view that those commitments could not be regarded as eliminating the competition concerns identified by it effectively. With respect to the behavioural commitments, the following reasons were stated for the contested decision in recitals (429)–(432), under the heading 'Separation of Sidel from Tetra and Article 82 Commitments':

d '(429) The behavioural commitment, namely the separation of Sidel from Tetra Pak, together with the confirmation of pre-existing Article 82 undertakings, are submitted in particular with regard to the concerns on the ability of the merged entity to leverage its dominant position in carton packaging to gain a dominant position in PET packaging equipment. This commitment and the pre-existing Article 82 commitments are, however, purely behavioural. As such, they are not suitable to restore conditions of effective competition on a permanent basis, since they do not address the permanent change in the market structure created by the notified operation that causes these concerns.

e (430) The "separation" of Sidel from Tetra Pak companies does not alter the fact that, as expressly acknowledged in the commitment itself, Sidel's board will "be held responsible directly by the Tetra Laval Group board". It cannot be expected that such separation will prevent Sidel from implementing the commercial strategy of the Tetra Laval Group. In addition Sidel's legal status could be changed, i.e. Sidel might be de-listed and turned into a private company like Tetra Laval which would make monitoring of "firewalls" virtually impossible.

f (431) The commitment not to "bundle" as well as the confirmation of the pre-existing Article 82 commitments, constitute pure promises not to act in a certain manner, indeed not to act in contravention of Community law. Such behavioural promises are in contrast with the Commission's stated policy on remedies and with the purpose of the Merger Regulation itself ... and are extremely difficult if not impossible to monitor effectively.

g (432) Overall, in addition to being complex in their implementation and in their monitoring, these commitments cannot be considered as capable of removing effectively the competition problems identified.

h 56. The Commission's argument challenges paras 156–162 of the judgment under appeal, which immediately follow paras 148–155, which were likewise challenged by the Commission and were examined by the court in connection with the first ground of appeal. In those paragraphs, the Court of First Instance held as follows:

i '156. In the present case, the leveraging from the aseptic carton market, as described in the contested decision, would manifest itself—in addition to the possibility of the merged entity engaging in practices such as tying sales of carton packaging equipment and consumables to sales of PET packaging equipment and forced sales (recitals (345), (365))—firstly, by the probability of predatory pricing by the merged entity (recital (364), cited in para 49, above); secondly, by price wars; and, thirdly, by the granting of loyalty rebates. Engaging in these practices would enable the merged entity to ensure, as far as possible, that its customers on the carton markets obtain from Sidel any PET equipment they may require. The contested decision (recital (231)) finds that Tetra holds a dominant position on the aseptic carton markets, that is to say, the markets for aseptic carton packaging systems and aseptic cartons (see para 40, above), a finding which is not disputed by the applicant.

157. It should be recalled that, according to settled case law, where an undertaking is in a dominant position it is in consequence obliged, where appropriate, to modify its conduct so as not to impair effective competition on the market regardless of whether the Commission has adopted a decision to that effect (see NV Nederlandsche Banden-Industrie Michelin v EC Commission Case 322/81 [1983] ECR 3461 (para 57), Tetra Pak International SA v EC Commission Case T-51/89 [1990] ECR II-309 (para 23) and Coca-Cola Co v European Commission (supported by The Virgin Trading Co Ltd and anor, interveners) joined cases T-125/97 and T-127/97 [2000] All ER (EC) 460, [2000] ECR II-1733 (para 80)).

158. Moreover, in response to the questions put by the court at the hearing, the Commission did not deny that leveraging by Tetra through the conduct described above could constitute abuse of Tetra's pre-existing dominant position in the aseptic carton markets. This could also be the case, according to the concerns expressed by the Commission in its defence, in circumstances where the merged entity refused to participate in the installation and any necessary conversion of Sidel SBM machines, to provide after-sales service or to honour the guarantees for such machines when sold by converters. However, the Commission went on to state that the fact that a type of conduct may constitute an independent infringement of art 82 EC [formerly art 86 of the EC Treaty] does not preclude that conduct from being taken into account in the Commission's assessment of all forms of leveraging made possible by a merger transaction.

159. In this regard, it must be stated that, although Regulation 4064/89 provides for the prohibition of a merger creating or strengthening a dominant position which has significant anti-competitive effects, these conditions do not require it to be demonstrated that the merged entity will, as a result of the merger, engage in abusive, and consequently unlawful, conduct. Although it cannot therefore be presumed that Community law will not be complied with by the parties to a conglomerate-type merger transaction, such a possibility cannot be excluded by the Commission when it carries out its control of mergers. Accordingly, when the Commission, in assessing the effects of such a merger, relies on foreseeable conduct which in itself is likely to constitute abuse of an existing dominant position, it is required to assess whether, despite the prohibition of such conduct, it is none the less likely that the entity resulting from the merger will act in such a manner or whether, on the contrary, the illegal nature of the conduct and/or the risk of detection will make such a strategy unlikely. While it is appropriate to take account, a in its assessment, of incentives to engage in anti-competitive practices, such as those resulting in the present case for Tetra from the commercial advantages which may be foreseen on the PET equipment markets (recital (359)), the Commission must also consider the extent to which those incentives would be reduced, or even eliminated, owing to the illegality of b the conduct in question, the likelihood of its detection, action taken by the competent authorities, both at Community and national level, and the financial penalties which could ensue.

c 160. Since the Commission did not carry out such an assessment in the contested decision, it follows that, in so far as the Commission's assessment is based on the possibility, or even the probability, that Tetra will engage in such conduct in the aseptic carton markets, its findings in this respect cannot be upheld.

d 161. Moreover, the fact that the applicant offered commitments regarding its future conduct is also a factor which the Commission should have taken into account in assessing whether it was likely that the merged entity would act in a manner which could result in the creation of a dominant position on one or more of the relevant PET equipment markets. There is no indication in the contested decision that the Commission took account of the implications of those commitments when it assessed the creation of such a position in future through leveraging.

e 162. It follows from the foregoing that it is necessary to examine whether the Commission based its analysis of the likelihood of leveraging from the aseptic carton markets, and of the consequences of such leveraging by the merged entity, on sufficiently convincing evidence. In the course of that examination it is necessary, in the present case, to take account only of conduct which would, at least probably, not be illegal. In addition, since f the anticipated dominant position would only emerge after a certain lapse of time, by 2005 according to the Commission, its analysis of the future position must, whilst allowing for a certain margin of discretion, be particularly plausible.'

57. Examining the forms of leveraging in detail, the Court of First Instance held as follows:

g '217. The leveraging methods referred to in recital (364) of the contested decision (cited in para 49, above) are based on Tetra's dominant position on the aseptic carton markets. Given, in particular, Tetra's commitment to divest itself of its preforms operations, the leveraging would be carried out by two types of measures: first, through pressure leading to tied sales or h sales which bundle equipment and consumables for carton packaging jointly with PET packaging equipment. That pressure could be put on Tetra customers needing to continue to use carton packaging for some of their production and especially those customers with long-term agreements with Tetra for their carton packaging needs (recital (365), cited in para 50, above). Second, measures could be adopted to offer incentives, i such as predatory pricing, price wars and loyalty rebates.

218. However, the use, by an undertaking with a dominant position like Tetra's on the aseptic carton markets, of pressure in the form of tied sales or incentives such as predatory pricing or loyalty rebates that are not objectively justified, would usually constitute an abuse of that position. As this court has already held, the possible recourse to such strategies cannot be presumed by the Commission, as it has done in the contested decision, in order to justify a decision prohibiting a merger transaction which has been notified to it in accordance with the regulation (see paras 154–162, above). It follows that the leveraging practices which may be taken into consideration by the court are limited to those which, at least probably, do not constitute an abuse of a dominant position on the aseptic carton markets. a

219. It is, therefore, necessary merely to consider strategies for tied or bundled sales which are not in themselves forced, for loyalty rebates that are objectively justified on the carton markets, and for offers of reduced prices for carton or PET packaging equipment that are not predatory within the meaning of well-established case law (see AKZO Chemie BV v EC Commission Case C-62/86 [1991] ECR I-3359 (particularly paras 102, 115, 156, 157), judgment in Tetra Pak International SA v EC Commission Case C-333/94 P [1996] ECR I-5951 (paras 41–44), upholding the judgment in [Tetra Pak International SA v EC Commission Case T-83/91 [1994] ECR II-755] and the opinion of Advocate General Fennelly in Cie Maritime Belge Transports SA v European Commission Joined cases C-395/96 P and C-396/96 P [2000] All ER (EC) 385 at 420–423, [2000] ECR I-1365 at 1414–1417 (particularly paras 123–130)). Against that background, it is necessary to examine whether the Commission took account of the commitment concerning separation between Sidel and Tetra Pak companies, agreed in principle for a ten-year period, according to which “no joint offerings of any of Tetra Pak’s carton products together with Sidel’s SBM machines” are to be made. b

220. It is apparent from the contested decision that Tetra asked the Commission to take note of its existing obligations under art 3(3) of ... Decision 92/163 ... which provides: c

“Tetra Pak shall not practice predatory or discriminatory prices and shall not grant to any customer any form of discount on its products or more favourable payment terms not justified by an objective consideration. Thus, discounts on cartons should be granted solely according to the quantity of each order, and orders for different types of carton may not be aggregated for that purpose ...” d

221. It follows that Tetra gave a clear indication of its willingness to comply fully with the special obligations imposed on it by art 82 EC as a result of the dominant position it holds on the aseptic carton markets. It also reiterated its acceptance of all of the relevant obligations imposed on it following the finding in Decision 92/163 of an infringement of art 82 EC as regards those markets. It also undertook, in the context of the present proceedings, to make no joint offers of its carton products together with Sidel’s SBM machines. e

222. Consequently, the only methods of tied or bundled sales which would actually be feasible for the merged entity would be offers made by Tetra to its current customers on the carton markets which would not be compulsory or forced and which would only be in respect of carton packaging equipment and/or carton products, on the one hand, and PET packaging equipment other than SBM machines, on the other. It must also be observed that, notwithstanding the emphasis placed by the Commission in the contested decision (recitals (177), (369)), in its written observations and oral pleadings on the significance of the merged entity’s ability to offer almost all of the equipment necessary for setting up an f a integrated PET production line, it is clear from the commitments that it would not be possible for that entity to make a joint offer to a customer for carton packaging equipment and an integrated PET production line, at least not one containing a Sidel SBM machine.

b 223. Moreover, although the finding in the contested decision regarding the price discrimination allegedly practised in the past by Sidel is not, having regard to the parties' written pleadings and the oral pleadings of the Commission concerning the underlying econometric analysis, vitiated by a manifest error of assessment, it cannot constitute sufficiently convincing evidence that the merged entity will continue to behave in a similar way. Unlike Sidel prior to the merger, the merged entity would be bound not only by the commitments but also by the various obligations limiting Tetra's conduct.

c 224. It must therefore be found that the merged entity's possible means of leveraging would be quite limited. An examination of the foreseeable consequences of its resorting to such conduct must take account of this.'

d Arguments of the parties

58. The Commission submits, first, that the approach taken by the Court of First Instance with regard to the conglomerate effects and the unlawful conduct of Tetra is contrary to art 2 of the regulation and to merger control in general.

e 59. It argues, first of all, that that approach runs counter to a meaningful interpretation of art 2. If art 82 EC were sufficient to prevent abuses, it would not have been necessary to make provision for ex ante control of concentrations. More specifically, the Commission challenges para 218 of the judgment under appeal, in which the Court of First Instance held that 'the possible recourse to such [abusive] strategies cannot be presumed by the Commission', and submits that, on the contrary, the presumption that a dominant undertaking may find it rational to exclude competitors and/or exploit customers and thus, in some cases, actually to violate art 82 EC is enshrined in the regulation.

f 60. The Commission submits, moreover, that the Court of First Instance's approach is mistaken in that it is based on unwarranted distinctions between different types of mergers, which are contrary to art 2 of the regulation. It criticises para 154 of the judgment under appeal, in which the Court of First Instance took the view that it is not the structure resulting from the merger transaction itself which creates or strengthens a dominant position within the meaning of art 2(3) but rather the future conduct of the merged entity. The Commission argues that that finding is inconsistent with para 94 of the Gencor judgment, in which the Court of First Instance held that a merger would have had an immediate effect where it—

g 'would have had the direct and immediate effect of creating the conditions in which abuses were not only possible but economically rational, given that the concentration would have significantly impeded effective competition in the market by giving rise to a lasting alteration to the structure of the markets concerned.'

i It submits that there is no justification for drawing a distinction, as the Court of First Instance did in the judgment under appeal, according to whether the dominant position on the second market is created immediately or in the medium term. Otherwise, there would be a risk that vertical mergers or those with conglomerate effect might escape the scope of the regulation because those types of merger give the merged entity the potential to use—and abuse—its dominant position on a market and the incentives to do so in order to exclude its competitors on a second market. The Commission concludes that, in the present case, it ought to have been found that the merger would immediately alter the structure and conditions of competition. a

61. Finally, the Commission submits that there are insuperable legal and practical obstacles to engaging in the analysis of the disincentives created by the illegal nature of certain abusive commercial practices. The Commission would be required to examine, not the structural aspects of an undertaking, but rather its propensity to comply with the law. Such an analysis would constitute a breach of the principle of equality and the presumption of innocence. It would also be impossible to apply the test because it could be difficult to quantify the risk, which would vary according to the strictness of the competition policy in each member state. Given the standard of proof required by the Court of First Instance, the Commission concludes that it would be impossible for it to control vertical mergers and those with conglomerate effect properly in accordance with the regulation. b

62. Secondly, the Commission alleges that the Court of First Instance infringed arts 2 and 8(2) of the regulation by finding that it ought to have taken account of the behavioural commitments entered into by Tetra. It compares the position adopted by the Court of First Instance in para 161 of the judgment under appeal with that taken in paras 316 and 317 of the Gencor judgment, in which the Court of First Instance ruled out the consideration of behavioural commitments where the merger appears likely to create or strengthen a dominant position. The Commission argues that, even though non-structural commitments may be acceptable in certain cases, commitments that amount to a mere promise to behave in a certain way, for example a commitment not to abuse a dominant position created or strengthened by the proposed concentration, are not as such regarded as suitable to render the concentration compatible with the common market. c

63. The Commission submits that the Court of First Instance distorted the contested decision by finding, in para 161 of the judgment under appeal, that it was not apparent from that decision that the Commission had taken account of the implications of Tetra's commitments in its assessment. The Commission asserts that it assessed those commitments but rejected them (recitals (423)–(451) in the contested decision). The Court of First Instance cannot properly claim that the contested decision is vitiated by a manifest error of assessment as regards the conclusion that the concentration must be prohibited if it has not examined the Commission's arguments that the commitments are unviable and, in any event, insufficient to address the competitive concerns raised by the notified merger. d

64. By contrast, Tetra contends, first, that the Court of First Instance did not err in law by requiring the Commission to take account of the unlawfulness of the abusive conduct. The test applied by the Court of First Instance in para 159 of the judgment under appeal is that of the rational and foreseeable conduct of an undertaking. When assessing such conduct, account must be taken both of the incentives to engage in unlawful conduct and the factors which might diminish, or even eliminate, such incentives. e

65. Tetra contends that the comparisons drawn with the Gencor case are irrelevant. It submits that, in that case, the collective dominant position was created immediately by the horizontal merger, which is not the situation in the f

- a present case, in which a dominant position can arise only after a certain period of time and requires prior abusive conduct.

66. According to Tetra, the Commission's interpretation of the regulation is based on the false premise that its purpose is to prevent abuses. However, it follows from the wording of art 2(2) of that regulation that its purpose is to prohibit the creation of any dominant position which, by itself and without any abuse, would result in the creation of a significant impediment to competition.

67. Tetra does not see why there are insuperable legal and practical obstacles to assessing the impact of the illegal nature of certain conduct or how such an assessment poses difficulties different from those relating to the assessment of incentives to adopt abusive conduct. It observes that the Commission considers itself perfectly capable of quantifying the probability of detecting an infringement of art 81 EC (formerly art 85 of the EC Treaty) and art 82 EC and takes account of that assessment when fixing fines.

68. Secondly, with respect to consideration of its commitments, Tetra submits that para 161 of the judgment under appeal contains no more than a finding that the Commission ought to have taken account of the commitments offered when assessing the foreseeable future conduct of the merged entity. It states that the Court of First Instance did not itself assess the commitments offered and that at no point in the judgment under appeal did it, contrary to what the Commission claims, require the Commission to 'take into account behavioural commitments consisting of mere promises not to engage in abusive conduct'.

69. Tetra argues that the Commission has misinterpreted the judgment in the Gencor case. Contrary to the Commission's interpretation, the Court of First Instance, in para 319 of that judgment, found that the categorisation of commitments was immaterial and that behavioural commitments may be equally capable of preventing the emergence or strengthening of a dominant position.

70. Finally, Tetra contends that, contrary to its claims, the Commission did not carry out an assessment in concreto of the impact of the commitments offered by the company but merely expressed an objection in principle to the treatment of behavioural commitments as measures capable of constituting a valid means of remedying the creation of a dominant position within the meaning of the regulation.

Findings of the court as to the second ground of appeal

71. It should be observed, first of all, that paras 148–162 of the judgment under appeal, which the Commission challenges under both its first and its second ground of appeal, form a section in which the Court of First Instance described certain specific aspects of conglomerate effects, in particular temporal aspects, and inferred from them certain general rules as to the evidence which the Commission must produce when it considers that a proposed concentration must be declared incompatible with the common market.

72. It was in the context of this reminder of the need for 'convincing evidence' that the Court of First Instance made reference to the obligation to examine all the relevant information.

73. Such an examination must be carried out in the light of the purpose of the regulation, which is to prevent the creation or strengthening of dominant positions capable of significantly impeding effective competition in the common market or a substantial part thereof. a

74. Since the view is taken in the contested decision that adoption of the conduct referred to recital (364) in that decision is an essential step in leveraging, the Court of First Instance was right to hold that the likelihood of its adoption must be examined comprehensively, that is to say, taking account, as stated in para 159 of the judgment under appeal, both of the incentives to adopt such conduct and the factors liable to reduce, or even eliminate, those incentives, including the possibility that the conduct is unlawful. b

75. However, it would run counter to the regulation's purpose of prevention to require the Commission, as was held in the last sentence in para 159 of the judgment under appeal, to examine, for each proposed merger, the extent to which the incentives to adopt anti-competitive conduct would be reduced, or even eliminated, as a result of the unlawfulness of the conduct in question, the likelihood of its detection, the action taken by the competent authorities, both at Community and national level, and the financial penalties which could ensue. c

76. An assessment such as that required by the Court of First Instance would make it necessary to carry out an exhaustive and detailed examination of the rules of the various legal orders which might be applicable and of the enforcement policy practised in them. Moreover, if it is to be relevant, such an assessment calls for a high probability of the occurrence of the acts envisaged as capable of giving rise to objections on the ground that they are part of anti-competitive conduct. d

77. It follows that, at the stage of assessing a proposed merger, an assessment intended to establish whether an infringement of art 82 EC is likely and to ascertain that it will be penalised in several legal orders would be too speculative and would not allow the Commission to base its assessment on all of the relevant facts with a view to establishing whether they support an economic scenario in which a development such as leveraging will occur. e

78. Consequently, the Court of First Instance erred in law in rejecting the Commission's conclusions as to the adoption by the merged entity of anti-competitive conduct capable of resulting in leveraging on the sole ground that the Commission had, when assessing the likelihood that such conduct might be adopted, failed to take account of the unlawfulness of that conduct and, consequently, of the likelihood of its detection, of action by the competent authorities, both at Community and national level, and of the financial penalties which might ensue. Nevertheless, since the judgment under appeal is also based on the failure to take account of the commitments offered by Tetra, it is necessary to continue the examination of the second ground of appeal. f

79. With respect to the argument that the Court of First Instance departed from the approach taken by it in the Gencor judgment, it must be held that, contrary to what the Commission claims, the Court of First Instance did not depart from the position taken by it in para 94 of that judgment, namely that there will be a significant impediment to effective competition if there is a lasting alteration of the structure of the relevant markets as a result of a concentration having the direct and immediate effect of creating conditions in which abusive conduct is possible and economically rational. g

80. The situation in the Gencor case was entirely different from that addressed in the contested decision. As is clear from para 91 of the judgment in that case, the concentration would have led to the creation of a dominant duopoly in the h a platinum and rhodium markets, as a result of which effective competition would have been significantly impeded in the common market.

i

81. It was therefore the concentration which would have given rise to a lasting alteration of the structure of the relevant markets in that case and thus would have made abuses possible and economically rational.

b 82. In the present case, it is true that the notified merger was capable of slightly altering the structure of the market for carton inasmuch as the merged entity could strengthen the dominant position which Tetra had held for some time on that market and which, moreover, had been the subject of a Commission decision pursuant to art 82 EC. However, it was not effective competition on the carton market which the Commission intended to protect by prohibiting the merger but competition on the market for PET equipment, c in particular that for low- and high-capacity SBM machines used for sensitive products.

83. The structure of that market would not have been immediately and directly affected by the notified merger but it could have been so affected only as a result of leveraging and, in particular, abusive conduct by the merged d entity on the carton market.

84. It follows from the above considerations that the situation examined in the Gencor case is not sufficiently comparable to that on which the Court of First Instance ruled by the judgment under appeal for that court to have been able to draw any useful inferences from it. The structure of the market on which the Commission intended, by the contested decision, to preserve e effective competition was, in the Gencor case, directly altered by the merger whereas, in the present case, it could be altered only by leveraging.

85. With respect to consideration of the behavioural commitments offered by Tetra, the Court of First Instance was right to hold, in para 161 of the judgment under appeal, that the fact that Tetra had, in the present case, offered f commitments relating to its future conduct was a factor which the Commission had to take into account when assessing the likelihood that the merged entity would act in such a way as to make it possible to create a dominant position on one or more of the relevant markets for PET equipment.

86. In that regard, the court points to the considerations set out by the Court of First Instance in paras 318 and 319 of the judgment in the Gencor case. g Contrary to what the Commission claims, it is not apparent from that judgment that the Court of First Instance ruled out consideration of behavioural commitments. On the contrary, the Court of First Instance (at para 318) laid down the principle that the commitments offered by the undertakings concerned must enable the Commission to conclude that the concentration at issue will not create or strengthen a dominant position h within the meaning of art 2(2) and (3) of the regulation. Then (at para 319) it inferred from that principle that the categorisation of a proposed commitment as behavioural or structural is immaterial and that the possibility cannot automatically be ruled out that commitments which are prima facie behavioural, for instance a commitment not to use a trade mark for a certain period or to make part of the production capacity of the entity arising from the concentration available to third party competitors or, more generally, to grant i access to essential facilities on non-discriminatory terms, may also be capable of preventing the emergence or strengthening of a dominant position.

87. With respect to the Commission's consideration of the behavioural commitments, the Court of First Instance merely found, in para 161 of the judgment under appeal, that there is no indication in the contested decision that the Commission took account of the implications of those commitments when it assessed the possibility that a dominant position might be created in future through leveraging. a

88. Nevertheless, it is not apparent that the Court of First Instance distorted the contested decision or failed to give sufficient reasons for the judgment under appeal in that regard. It is clear from recitals (429)–(432) in the contested decision, the only ones concerning the behavioural commitments submitted by Tetra, that the Commission refused to accept such commitments, as a matter of principle, and found, in recital (429), that '[a]s such, they are not suitable to restore conditions of effective competition on a permanent basis ... since they do not address the permanent change in the market structure created by the notified operation that causes these concerns' and, in recital (431), that 'such behavioural promises are in contrast with the Commission's stated policy on remedies and with the purpose of the Merger Regulation itself ... and are extremely difficult if not impossible to monitor effectively'. b

89. It follows from the examination of the second ground of appeal as a whole that, although the Court of First Instance erred in law by rejecting the Commission's conclusions as to the adoption by the merged entity of conduct likely to result in leveraging, it was nevertheless right to hold, in para 161 of the judgment under appeal, that the Commission ought to have taken account of the commitments submitted by Tetra with regard to that entity's future conduct. Accordingly, whilst the ground of appeal is well founded in part, it cannot call into question the judgment under appeal in so far as it annulled the contested decision since that annulment was based, inter alia, on the Commission's refusal to take account of those commitments. c
d
e

The third ground of appeal

90. By its third ground of appeal, the Commission submits that the Court of First Instance erred in law by applying an erroneous test of judicial review and infringed art 2 of the regulation in so far as it held, in para 269 of the judgment under appeal, that 'the contested decision does not provide sufficient evidence to justify the definition of distinct sub-markets among SBM machines with reference to their end use' and that '[c]onsequently, the only sub-markets it is necessary to consider are those for low- and high-capacity machines'. f

Arguments of the parties

g

91. The Commission points out that the definition of the markets for SBM machines is a key aspect of the contested decision. It submits that the proportion of the relevant market represented by a common PET carton customer base, in respect of which Tetra is likely to exploit its dominant position on the carton markets by leveraging, has a decisive influence on the likelihood of foreclosure of competitors and domination of that market by the merged entity. h

92. The Commission states that, in recitals (176)–(183) in the contested decision, which are supplemented by recitals (347)–(358) and (381)–(383), it defined distinct markets for SBM machines according to whether they are used to package-sensitive or non-sensitive products and, in doing so, relied on both supply-side and demand-side factors. In regard to the latter, recital (178) in the contested decision is worded as follows: i

'In any event, a distinct group of customers for the relevant product may constitute a narrower, distinct product market when such a group could be a subject to price discrimination. This will usually be the case when two conditions are met: (a) it is possible to identify clearly the group to which an individual customer belongs at the moment it purchases the relevant products and (b) trade among customers or arbitrage by third parties should not be feasible.’

b 93. In para 259 of the judgment under appeal, the Court of First Instance summarised the Commission’s line of argument in the contested decision, a summary not contested by the Commission, as follows:

c ‘In the contested decision (recital (43)), the Commission finds, firstly, that “even for an allegedly ‘generic’ piece of equipment such as an SBM machine it is justified to examine the equipment market with reference to the end-use segments”, which is “even more relevant when comparing whole packaging systems in order to assess whether or not they may belong in the same product market”. It goes on to state that each liquid product intended for packaging has its “very particular characteristics which dictate the availability of a given form of packaging”, before

d concluding that end-use segmentation constitutes a meaningful analytical tool for assessing the liquid food packaging equipment market (recital (44), cited in para 30, above). Thus it distinguishes between sensitive products belonging to “common product segments” and other products, on the basis of the ability of the former to be packaged, at least from a technical standpoint, in either carton or PET, unlike non-sensitive products such as

e water and carbonated drinks, which cannot be packaged in carton (recital (58)). Whilst accepting that “the majority of SBM machines are ‘generic’” (recital (177)), the Commission states in the same recital that “a PET packaging line, of which the SBM machine is only one component, is usually tailored to the specific products filled by the customer”, which is especially the case for sensitive products, an argument reiterated in its

f assessment of the consequences of leveraging (recital (369)). It refers by way of example to Sidel’s SRS G Combi, which is “designed for carbonated drinks [and] cannot be a substitute for a beverage producer wanting to fill juices” (recital (177)), for which an aseptic Combi SRA machine is required. Referring to the Commission Notice (on the definition of relevant market for the purposes of Community competition law) (OJ 1997 C372 p 5, g point 43), it then finds that the two conditions which normally must be met for a finding of a distinct group of customers and thus of a narrower product market are met in the present case: it is possible to identify clearly which group an individual customer belongs to at the moment it purchases an SBM machine, and the trade in the machines among customers or

h arbitrage by third parties is not feasible (recital (178)).’

94. In paras 260–269 of the judgment under appeal, the Court of First Instance held as follows:

i ‘260. The court finds, firstly, that the emphasis placed in the contested decision on sensitive products belonging to “common product segments” is based on an objective criterion, namely the fact that these products belong to the category of carton-packaged products and the possibility, at least from a technical standpoint, of them being packaged in PET, which, in the light of the growth to be expected (see paras 201–216, above), is likely to become a fairly widespread commercial reality by 2005, at least for FFDs and tea/coffee drinks.

261. However, the contested decision fails to provide sufficiently convincing evidence to demonstrate the allegedly specific characteristics of SBM machines used for packaging sensitive products. Admittedly, a combined machine specifically designed for filling carbonated drinks cannot be used for juices. However, that far from proves that low- and high-capacity SBM machines, even ones tailored before sale to the specific wishes of their purchasers, do not remain generic machines, as argued in essence by the applicant, that is to say, capable of packaging several types of products. a

262. As for the alleged specificity of packaging moulds according to the product intended for them, as argued by the Commission, whilst the applicant does not dispute that the number of moulds determines the capacity of the machine, this specific fact does not prove that SBM machines, of which moulds are merely a component, differ significantly from each other. It is clear from the notification that moulds last on average for three years, whilst an SBM machine lasts for up to 15 years (recital (304)). Although Sidel makes its own moulds, the contested decision (recital (309)) does not dispute the information on the moulds market provided in the notification, according to which Sidel is not active in that market (that is, as a supplier of moulds to third parties) and the competition amongst those undertakings which are active is very strong, especially from SIG, which claims on its internet site that it is a world leader. b

263. Nor does the contested decision call into question the statement in the notification that, in a large facility, a customer can use several SBM machines in order to combine them for its various production needs. The contested decision does not contain any examination of whether the flexibility required by some customers for SBM machine moulds can be explained by needs relating to such uses. c

264. In its defence, the Commission refers to a number of changes which can be made to an SBM machine to enhance its performance or make it more useful in an integrated PET production line, such as the addition of a special blow air filtration system or ultraviolet treatment to reduce the risk of contamination before the preforms enter the SBM machine. At the hearing, the Commission stated that these changes are evidence of the very specific characteristics of an SBM machine used in a PET packaging line to which the contested decision refers (recital (177)). Tetra, whilst disputing the Commission's approach of attributing specific characteristics of other components of a PET production line to SBM machines, none the less stated that these changes represented a mere 5% of the cost of an SBM machine. d

265. The court finds, first, that the contested decision makes no reference to this information. Although the decision correctly stresses the importance of the individual needs of customers who require an aseptic PET filling line in particular, namely a basic guarantee of aseptic conditions, this cannot justify the definition of a distinct sub-market for SBM machines used in filling lines for the sensitive products at issue here. The mere fact that each SBM machine must be installed in a PET line in order to be useful to its purchaser does not justify that specific characteristics of other PET equipment in that line should be attributed to the SBM machines themselves. e a 266. There is all the more reason to accept the generic nature of SBM machines, inasmuch as at the hearing the Commission was unable to rebut Tetra's assertion regarding the relatively low cost, when compared to the cost of a so-called "standard" SBM machine, especially a high-capacity SBM machine, of making any necessary changes to render the machine more compatible for use with aseptic and non-aseptic PET filling machines, or possibly with aseptic filling machines capable of conversion from PET to HDPE.

b 267. The parties agree, moreover, that combined machines, which are still only rarely used for aseptic filling (see paras 248, 249, above), do not constitute a distinct market, as is also clear from the contested decision.

c 268. As regards the possibility of determining exactly which group a given customer belongs to when he purchases an SBM machine and whether or not that customer may, at least currently within the [European Economic Area], be able to find a better price through arbitrage between the available suppliers, it is clear that those possibilities, if established, would apply as much to SBM machines used for non-sensitive products as to those used to package sensitive products. The possibility for the merged entity to identify the group to which a customer belongs is due to the fact that many customers in the carton markets who will switch to PET will be current Tetra customers. However, this possible benefit, resulting from the "first-mover advantage" which the merged entity will foreseeably have, does not preclude those customers from turning to other suppliers of SBM machines if they become dissatisfied with the conditions offered by the merged entity.

d 269. Therefore, on the basis of the evidence in the contested decision, the Commission (recital (177)) committed an error, first, by finding that "the majority of SBM machines are 'generic'" and, second, by distinguishing between them according to end use. The contested decision does not provide sufficient evidence to justify the definition of distinct sub-markets among SBM machines with reference to their end use. Consequently, the only sub-markets it is necessary to consider are those for low- and high-capacity machines.'

e
f
g 95. The Commission takes the view that the Court of First Instance erred in law in requiring, in para 265 of the judgment under appeal, that it set out in the contested decision all of the technical information gathered in the course of its investigation. It observes that the question whether the statement of reasons for a decision meets the requirements of art 253 EC (formerly art 190 of the EC Treaty) must be assessed in the light not only of its wording but also its context and, in particular, the degree of prior knowledge of the relevant facts and the period available for adoption of that decision.

h 96. Moreover, the Court of First Instance failed to observe the limits of its power of judicial review, distorted the contested decision and substituted its own assessment for that of the Commission, without even explaining the reasons for the rejection of the latter's analysis, by holding, in para 265, that the need for a guarantee of aseptic conditions does not justify the definition of a distinct sub-market for the SBM machines used in filling lines for the sensitive products at issue. Similarly, in para 266 of the judgment under appeal, the Court of First Instance rejected the Commission's findings as to the importance of the adaptation of SBM machines to use for aseptic packaging on the sole basis of the information on the cost of the necessary adaptation, without examining the other factors taken into account by the Commission, which include the question whether suppliers of SBM machines to traditional customers in the water and carbonated soft drink sectors have the necessary expertise to thus adapt the machines and to offer the necessary guarantees. a

97. The Commission likewise challenges the rejection of its argument that price discrimination may constitute evidence of distinct sub-markets. In para 223 of the judgment under appeal, the Court of First Instance took the view that such discrimination, allegedly practised by Sidel in the past, cannot constitute sufficiently convincing evidence that the merged entity will continue to behave in a similar way since that entity, unlike Sidel prior to the merger, would be bound not only by the commitments but also by the various obligations limiting Tetra's conduct. The Commission submits that the Court of First Instance erred in law for three reasons. The first is that, according to the Commission, price discrimination is in itself evidence of the existence of distinct conditions of supply and demand in respect of the sale of a product to different customers and therefore the evidence of the existence of distinct markets. The second reason lies in the fact that the Court of First Instance required the Commission not to take account of unlawful conduct, even if it would be economically rational. The third reason put forward by the Commission is that, as follows from paras 161 and 162 of the judgment under appeal, the Court of First Instance failed to take account of Tetra's dominant position on the carton market and ruled on the basis that the merged entity will not have a dominant position on the PET market and that, therefore, any price discrimination on that market cannot constitute an abuse of a dominant position within the meaning of art 82 EC. b
c
d
e

98. Finally, the Commission criticises the Court of First Instance's finding that it will be possible for customers to turn to suppliers other than Tetra. It submits that the Court of First Instance ignored its arguments relating to the impossibility of arbitrage in respect of machines of the same supplier (purchase of secondhand machines and in-house transfer of a machine from a 'non-sensitive production' to a 'sensitive production' division). f

99. Tetra contends, generally, that this ground of appeal must be declared inadmissible inasmuch as it relates to findings of fact.

100. It points out that the Commission itself acknowledged, in recital (177) in the contested decision, that SBM machines are 'generic' and that it is the PET packaging line which is specially adapted to the products packaged by the customer. It argues that it is pointless for the Commission to rely on information not contained in the contested decision because, as is clear from case law, a decision must contain all the factual and legal elements on which the Commission has based its findings so as to allow effective judicial review of that decision. The contested decision contains no reference to the need to regard the SBM machine as a component of a particular type of packaging line. In any event, the Court of First Instance responded to all the arguments put forward by the Commission during the judicial proceedings. Thus, para 226 of the judgment under appeal contains a response to a new argument relied on by the Commission in its defence. g
h
i

101. Tetra submits that the Commission has taken para 223 of the judgment under appeal out of context. In that paragraph, the Court of First Instance did not address whether it is possible to rely on price discrimination to prove that there are distinct markets but merely examined whether Sidel's past conduct constituted sufficiently convincing evidence that the merged entity would

- a continue to behave in the same way. Not until paras 258–269 of that judgment did the Court of First Instance examine the definition of the market.

Findings of the court as to the third ground of appeal

- b 102. First of all, the Commission's argument based on the fact that the Court of First Instance found, in para 265 of the judgment under appeal, that there was no reference in the contested decision to certain technical explanations of the allegedly highly individual features of the SBM machines used in PET packaging lines, which the Commission supplied only in its defence and at the hearing, must be rejected as immaterial. On reading paras 266 and 267 of the judgment under appeal, it is clear that the Court of First Instance did not base its findings solely on the fact that there was insufficient convincing evidence in the contested decision of the allegedly individual features of those machines but that it took account of the arguments put forward by the Commission in its defence and at the hearing and responded to them.

- c 103. The argument alleging that the Court of First Instance held that price discrimination was not proof of the existence of distinct sub-markets must likewise be rejected as irrelevant. On reading the final sentence of para 259 and para 268 of the judgment under appeal, it is clear that, in connection with the definition of distinct markets, the Court of First Instance did not give a ruling on the direct probative value of price discrimination but focused its analysis on the circumstances in which a possibility of price discrimination may be regarded as proven, those circumstances having been defined in recital (178) in the contested decision as being (i) that it is possible to identify clearly the group to which a given customer belongs and (ii) that trade among customers or arbitrage by third parties is not feasible.

- d 104. The other arguments raised by the Commission in support of its third ground of appeal, by which it challenges the Court of First Instance's findings as to the generic nature of SBM machines, the possibility of identifying the group to which a customer belongs and the impossibility of trade among customers or arbitrage by third parties in relation to those machines, must be declared inadmissible since they call into question the Court of First Instance's assessment of the evidence, which cannot be the subject of review by the court in appeal proceedings.

- e 105. It follows from those considerations that the third ground of appeal is, in part, inadmissible and, in part, unfounded.

The fourth ground of appeal

- f 106. By its fourth ground of appeal, the Commission submits that the Court of First Instance infringed art 2 of the regulation, distorted the facts and failed to take account of certain of its arguments by refusing to recognise the merits of its finding that Tetra would strengthen its dominant position in the carton sector.

- g 107. Recitals (390)–(401) in the contested decision are intended to show that the dominant position held by Tetra in the carton sector could be strengthened by the notified merger as a result of the elimination, on the market for sensitive product packaging, of the potential competition provided by Sidel, the largest supplier on the PET market. Thus faced with weaker competition, Tetra would have no incentive to lower the price of its carton packaging and might be encouraged to cease innovation.

- i 108. As the Court of First Instance observed in paras 311 and 317 of the judgment under appeal, the Commission relied on the judgment in Tetra Pak v

Commission Case T-51/89, cited above, which was upheld by the court on appeal in Tetra Pak v Commission Case C-333/94, cited above (Tetra Pak II), in support of its argument that the weakening of potential competition would enable Tetra to feel less threatened on the markets for aseptic carton, which had to be regarded as a strengthening of its dominant position on those markets for the purposes of art 2 of the regulation. a

109. In para 312 of the judgment under appeal, the Court of First Instance held as follows: b

‘... when the Commission relies on the elimination or significant reduction of potential competition, even of competition which will tend to grow, in order to justify the prohibition of a notified merger, the factors which it identifies to show the strengthening of a dominant position must be based on convincing evidence. The mere fact that the acquiring undertaking already holds a clear dominant position on the relevant market may constitute an important factor, as the contested decision finds, but does not in itself suffice to justify a finding that a reduction in the potential competition which that undertaking must face constitutes a strengthening of its position.’ c
d

110. In para 322 of the judgment under appeal, the Court of First Instance found that there is, in principle, nothing to prevent the application in merger control of the ‘associative links’ theory, which was recognised in the context of applying art 82 EC in Tetra Pak II. The case underlying Tetra Pak II concerned conduct on a given market which was considered to constitute an abuse of a dominant position on an associated market. The present case concerns neighbouring markets. However, in para 323 of the judgment under appeal, the Court of First Instance held that the reference to Tetra Pak II was irrelevant since ‘the present case concerns simply the effect of the elimination, or the significant reduction, of potential competition which is, according to the Commission, sizeable and growing’. e
f

111. The Court of First Instance (at para 323) also pointed out that—

‘amongst the criteria laid down in art 2(1) of Regulation 4064/89, which the Commission is bound to apply in assessing notified merger transactions, are “the structure of all the markets concerned and the ... potential competition from undertakings”.’ g

The Court of First Instance went on to hold as follows:

‘Thus the Commission did not commit any error in examining the significance for the carton markets of a reduction of potential competition from the PET equipment markets. It does have to show, however, that such a reduction, if it exists, would tend to strengthen Tetra’s dominant position in relation to its competitors on the aseptic carton markets.’ h

112. In para 324 of the judgment under appeal, the Court of First Instance stated that, as its own analysis shows, the growth in the use of PET to package sensitive products would probably be much less marked than the Commission believes. Therefore, it was no longer possible, on the basis of the evidence relied on in the contested decision, to determine, with the certainty required to justify the prohibition of a merger, whether implementation of the notified merger would place Tetra in a situation in which it could be more independent in relation to its competitors on the aseptic carton markets than has been the case in the past. i a 113. In para 325 of the judgment under appeal, the Court of First Instance examined the two pieces of factual evidence relating to the future conduct of Tetra on which the Commission had relied in order to prove the alleged negative effects of the notified merger on the markets for aseptic carton.

b 114. The Court of First Instance (at paras 326–328) examined the evidence produced by the Commission in relation to price competition and found, in the final sentence of para 328, that the finding in the contested decision that, if it were authorised to acquire Sidel, Tetra would be exposed to less pressure to lower its carton prices is not based on convincing evidence.

c 115. The Court of First Instance (at paras 329–331) examined the evidence submitted by the Commission to substantiate its claim that the notified merger would reduce Tetra's incentive to innovate. It found (at para 332) that the contested decision did not establish to the requisite legal standard that the merged entity would have less incentive than Tetra at present to innovate in the carton sector.

116. The Court of First Instance (at para 333) concluded as follows:

d 'It follows that the evidence relied on in the contested decision does not establish to the requisite legal standard that the effects of the [notified] merger on Tetra's position, principally on the aseptic carton markets, would, by eliminating Sidel as a potential competitor, be such as to fulfil the conditions of art 2(3) of Regulation 4064/89. It follows from the foregoing that it has not been shown that the merged entity's position would be strengthened vis-à-vis its competitors on the carton markets.'

e Arguments of the parties

f 117. By its fourth ground of appeal, which consists of several parts, the Commission contests paras 312 and 323 of the judgment under appeal. It submits, first of all, that the way in which the Court of First Instance presented the question of the relevance of potential competition resulted in a distortion of the facts. According to the Commission, potential competition is unrelated to the competitive relationship between the undertaking regarded as dominant and other undertakings active on the relevant market. The relevant question is whether the structural elimination of a significant source of potential competition frees the dominant undertaking to an even greater extent of any constraint, in particular with regard to its customers and consumers.

g 118. The Commission goes on to argue that the two factors referred to in para 312 of the judgment under appeal, namely the elimination or significant reduction of potential competition and the fact that the undertaking benefiting from the merger already occupies a dominant position on the relevant market, are sufficient to justify a finding that such a position would be strengthened.

h 119. The Commission takes the view, moreover, that the Court of First Instance erred in law in rejecting its assessment of the likely growth in the use of PET for packaging-sensitive products and in relying exclusively on its own forecast that 'this growth ... will probably be much less marked than the Commission believes'.

i 120. Finally, the Commission claims that the Court of First Instance erred in law, in paras 316–328 of the judgment under appeal, by failing to take account of its arguments regarding the effects on prices of the elimination of Sidel and, in paras 329–332, by rejecting its conclusion that the merged entity would have less incentive than Tetra at present to innovate in the carton sector.

121. Tetra contends that no error was made in para 312 of the judgment under appeal. It observes that, according to the regulation, a concentration may be prohibited if it leads to the creation or strengthening of a dominant position. Given that, by definition, a dominant position relates to the dominant undertaking's position on a given market, that is to say, its position relative to its competitors, it is impossible to see how the Commission can take the view that the dominant undertaking's dominant position can be dissociated from the position of its competitors on the same market. a

122. In Tetra's view, to claim that the two factors referred to in para 312 of the judgment under appeal are sufficient to justify a finding that a dominant position is strengthened is tantamount to establishing a per se rule by virtue of which any reduction in potential competition will always strengthen a dominant position. Article 2(3) of the regulation, however, requires that it be shown not only that a dominant position will be strengthened by the concentration, but also that effective competition will be significantly impeded as a result of that strengthening. Neither of those two requirements can be presumed to be satisfied, particularly in a case in which, like that at hand, the potential competition in question is that exercised by one market on a second, distinct but neighbouring, market. b

123. In any event, the Commission relied on a number of factors in the contested decision and, therefore, it cannot complain that the Court of First Instance analysed those factors in the judgment under appeal. With regard to the likely growth in the use of PET, Tetra refers to the line of argument which it has already put forward on that point. c

124. Finally, with respect to the arguments based on the fact that the Court of First Instance failed to uphold the Commission's findings concerning the effect of the merger on Tetra's incentives with regard to prices and innovation, Tetra submits that the Commission is challenging the Court of First Instance's assessment of the facts, which is not subject to review by the court in appeal proceedings. d

Findings of the court as to the fourth ground of appeal

125. As is clear from art 2(1) of the regulation, the Commission, when assessing the compatibility of a concentration with the common market, must take account of a number of factors, such as the structure of the relevant markets, actual or potential competition from undertakings, the position of the undertakings concerned and their economic and financial power, possible options available to suppliers and users, any barriers to entry and trends in supply and demand. e

126. The Court of First Instance was therefore right to point out in para 312 of the judgment under appeal—and, in doing so, did not infringe art 2 of the regulation—that, although constituting an important factor, as the contested decision finds, the mere fact that the acquiring undertaking already holds a clear dominant position on the relevant market does not in itself suffice to justify a finding that a reduction in the potential competition which that undertaking must face constitutes a strengthening of its position. f

127. The potential competition represented by a producer of substitute products on a segment of the relevant market (namely in the present case the competition, in relation to aseptic carton packaging, from Sidel, as a supplier of PET packaging, on the market segment for sensitive products) is only one of the set of factors which must be taken into account when assessing whether there is a risk that a concentration might strengthen a dominant position. It cannot be ruled out that a reduction in that potential competition might be g a compensated by other factors, with the result that the competitive position of the already dominant undertaking remains unchanged.

128. It is apparent from the Court of First Instance's summary of the parties' arguments in paras 313–320 of the judgment under appeal that Tetra challenged the argument that the merged entity's dominant position on the aseptic carton markets would be strengthened, by claiming, inter alia, that a lack of innovation in the carton sector would essentially benefit Tetra's current competitors on the carton markets. The Court of First Instance was therefore right to state, in para 323 of the judgment under appeal, in connection with the discussion and assessment of the parties' arguments in that regard, that the Commission has to show that, if there is a reduction in potential competition, this will tend to strengthen Tetra's dominant position in relation to its competitors on the aseptic carton markets.

129. Thus, the Court of First Instance relied on the potential reactions of Tetra's competitors on the carton markets, which are also active on the PET market, as a basis for refuting, in para 327 of the judgment under appeal, the Commission's argument that Tetra might be encouraged, once the merger has been completed, to increase its prices on the aseptic carton markets and, in para 330, the argument that the merged entity might decide to innovate less.

130. Accordingly, the part of the fourth ground of appeal in which the Commission claims that the potential competition is unrelated to the competitive relationship between the undertaking regarded as dominant and other undertakings active on the relevant market cannot be regarded as well founded.

131. It should be observed that the Commission's line of argument with respect to the likely growth in the use of PET for packaging sensitive products was examined in connection with the first ground of appeal, in para 46 of this judgment, with a view to establishing whether the Court of First Instance had infringed art 230 EC by failing to apply the test of manifest error of assessment and failing to respect the margin of discretion enjoyed by the Commission in relation to complex factual and economic matters. In so far as the Commission, by this part of the ground of appeal, contests the Court of First Instance's findings in that regard, it must be held that it calls into question the Court of First Instance's assessment of the evidence, which is not subject to review by the court in appeal proceedings.

132. The same applies to the part of the ground of appeal by which the Commission challenges paras 316–328 and 329–332 of the judgment under appeal, in which the Court of First Instance assessed the evidence submitted by the Commission in relation to the effect on prices of the elimination of Sidel and to the lesser incentive for the merged entity to innovate in the carton sector.

133. It follows from all of the above considerations that the fourth ground of appeal is, in part, inadmissible and, in part, unfounded.

The fifth ground of appeal

134. By its fifth ground of appeal, the Commission claims that the Court of First Instance infringed art 2(3) of the regulation by rejecting its findings as to the creation of a dominant position on the market for SBM machines.

Arguments of the parties

135. The Commission submits that the Court of First Instance's finding, in para 307 of the judgment under appeal, that 'the contested decision does not prove to the requisite legal standard that by 2005 the merged entity could acquire a dominant position on the market for low- and high-capacity machines' is based on errors of law challenged in connection with the preceding grounds of appeal, namely the inclusion of SBM machines for non-sensitive products and for beer in the same market as that for SBM machines used for sensitive products and the finding that Tetra's commitment not to link the sale of those machines to the sale of carton products was sufficient. To complete its line of argument, the Commission deems it necessary to demonstrate the errors made by the Court of First Instance in relation to the creation of a dominant position on the market for SBM machines. a

136. With respect to low-capacity SBM machines, the Commission submits, first of all, that the Court of First Instance failed to take account of certain relevant factors set out in the contested decision, such as the growth in the market share held by Sidel (recital (266) in the contested decision) and the immediate strengthening of its position as a result of the combination of its leading position, in terms of market shares, with the financial strength, sales force, established superiority in the field of aseptic packaging, the first mover advantage with customers in the carton packaging sector and the dominant position already enjoyed by Tetra in that sector (recitals (376)–(387)). b

137. Moreover, the Commission claims that the Court of First Instance based its findings on irrelevant facts. Thus, the importance of low-capacity SBM machines for the packaging of non-sensitive products is irrelevant if the definition of the market proposed by the Commission is upheld. Similarly, the Court of First Instance's finding, in para 279 of the judgment under appeal, that 'a significant proportion of the SBM machines used to package sensitive products will, in all likelihood, be low-capacity machines' is irrelevant in assessing whether Tetra might exploit its dominant position in the carton packaging sector to acquire a dominant position in the sector of low-capacity SBM machines. c

138. As regards high-capacity SBM machines, the Commission submits that the Court of First Instance failed to take account of the relevant factors, particularly, in para 284 of the judgment under appeal, the growth in Sidel's market share as a result of the notified merger. It also claims that the Court of First Instance was wrong to take account of the possibility that the growth in the use of PET for sensitive products might be lower than predicted and of the possibility that customers producing sensitive products might switch to HDPE rather than to PET, even though those factors are irrelevant in determining whether Tetra will enjoy a first mover advantage in its dealings with customers opting for PET. d

139. Similarly, with respect to customers switching from glass packaging, the Court of First Instance's reasoning overlooks certain factors and distorts the facts. First, the Court of First Instance failed to take account of the fact that a customer using that type of packaging only rarely packages his products exclusively in glass. Secondly, the Court of First Instance misrepresents the facts in asserting that Tetra/Sidel's competitors in the glass-packaging sector will benefit from the first mover advantage, because, in so finding, it overlooks the fact that suppliers of glass and can equipment do not have close ongoing relations with beverage producers because virtually all glass and can manufacturing is carried out by converters. e

140. With regard to competitors' positions, the Commission argues that the Court of First Instance distorted the contested decision in holding, in para 294 f

- a of the judgment under appeal, that the decision did not adequately examine the competition to be faced by Sidel on the market for high-capacity machines and underestimated the competition provided by its three major competitors. According to the Commission, the contested decision contains a detailed analysis of the relative positions of the merged entity and its competitors, in particular in recitals (232)–(248), (293)–(300), (303)–(310) and (369)–(387) in that decision. Moreo-
- b ver, the Court of First Instance's findings of fact are inaccurate in that it held, first, that the competitor SIG has an advantage because it is active on the downstream preform market even though, according to the Commission, it is not active on the downstream market as a supplier of preforms to undertakings using PET bottling and, secondly, that SIG enjoys a first mover advantage on account of its activities in the glass sector even though it manufactures machines and is not active on the downstream market for glass bottles.
- c

141. Finally, the Commission takes the view that the Court of First Instance's statement, in para 305 of the judgment under appeal, that 'the finding of the converters' dependency on Sidel is not convincing', which is based solely on the 'current level of existing competition', does not contain clear or adequate reasoning for overturning the Commission's complex assessment of this point in recitals (303)–(310) in the contested decision.

- d
142. Tetra contends that the various—apparently unrelated—criticisms raised by the Commission under its fifth ground of appeal must be declared inadmissible for two reasons. First, the Commission relies on factors which were not referred to in the contested decision and, secondly, it is directly challenging the Court of First Instance's assessment of the facts.
- e

Findings of the court as to the fifth ground of appeal

- f
143. Assessment of the arguments put forward by the Commission shows that the majority of them relate to the Court of First Instance's assessment of the evidence, which is not subject to review by the court in appeal proceedings. This is true of the Commission's complaint that the Court of First Instance failed to take account of certain factors which it considers to be relevant or took account of other factors which it considers to be irrelevant, whether that be in relation to low- or high-capacity SBM machines or to the consideration of customers switching from glass packaging.
- g

144. By other arguments advanced in support of its fifth ground of appeal, the Commission expressly challenges factual findings or assessments made by the Court of First Instance. This is true of the argument relating to Tetra/Sidel's competitors in glass packaging and of the assessment of the position of the competitor SIG.

- h
145. With respect to the alleged distortion of the contested decision in para 294 of the judgment under appeal, the Commission fails to refer to any specific recital whose content was distorted by the Court of First Instance and, in reality, the argument is directed at the Court of First Instance's assessment of the facts and evidence.

- i
146. Finally, with regard to the argument alleging a failure to state reasons for the finding, in para 305 of the judgment under appeal, that the converters' dependency on Sidel had not been established convincingly, it need be stated only that the Court of First Instance gave concise but adequate reasons for that finding in the final sentence of para 305.

147. It follows from those considerations that the fifth ground of appeal is, in part, inadmissible and, in part, unfounded.

Conclusiona

148. Since none of the grounds of appeal raised by the Commission in support of its appeal could be upheld, the appeal must be dismissed.

COSTS

149. Under art 69(2) of the Rules of Procedure, which is applicable to the procedure on appeal by virtue of art 118, the unsuccessful party is to be ordered to pay the costs if they have been applied for in the successful party's pleadings. Since Tetra has applied for costs and the Commission has been unsuccessful in all its grounds of appeal, the latter must be ordered to pay the costs.

b

On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Grand Chamber) hereby:

c

- (1) Dismisses the appeal;
- (2) Orders the Commission of the European Communities to pay the costs.

a Van de Walle v Texaco Belgium SA (Région de Bruxelles-Capitale, intervening)
b (Case C-1/03)

COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (SECOND CHAMBER)

JUDGES TIMMERMANS (PRESIDENT OF THE CHAMBER), PUISSOCHET (RAPPORTEUR), SCHINTGEN, MACKEN AND COLNERIC

c ADVOCATE GENERAL KOKOTT

29 JANUARY, 7 SEPTEMBER 2004

d European Community – Environment – Waste – Soil infiltrated by hydrocarbons spilled accidentally from petroleum service station – Service station belonging to petroleum undertaking, but operated independently – Meaning of ‘waste’, ‘producer’ of waste and ‘holder’ of waste – Whether spilled hydrocarbons ‘waste’ – Whether contaminated soil ‘waste’ – Whether petroleum undertaking ‘producer’ or ‘holder’ of such waste – Council Directive (EEC) 75/442, arts 1(a), (b), (c).

e As the result of defects in a petroleum service station’s storage facilities, water saturated with hydrocarbons was found to be leaking into an adjacent building. The service station was covered by a commercial lease with a petroleum undertaking as lessee. The petroleum undertaking supplied the service station with petroleum products, but the service station was operated by a manager on his own behalf, who did not have the right to make changes to the premises without permission from the petroleum undertaking. The main proceedings
f were an appeal against the acquittal—in criminal proceedings alleging an offence of abandoning waste—of senior staff and the petroleum undertaking. In due course, the national appellate court decided to stay the proceedings and refer questions to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) concerning: (i) whether hydrocarbons, which had been spilled unintentionally and which had caused soil and groundwater contamination, and contaminated soil, which had not been excavated, might be considered to be ‘waste’ within the meaning of art 1(a)<sup>a</sup> of Council Directive (EEC) 75/442 (on waste); and (ii) whether, in the particular circumstances of the main proceedings, the petroleum undertaking which had supplied the service station might be
g considered to be the ‘producer’ or ‘holder’ of waste within the meaning of art 1(b)<sup>b</sup> and (c)<sup>c</sup> of the directive.
h

Held – (1) Unintentionally spilled hydrocarbons, which had caused soil and groundwater contamination, and contaminated soil, which had not been

i a Article 1(a) of the directive, which is set out at judgment para 3, below, defines ‘waste’ as any substance or object set out in Annex 1 to the directive which the holder discards or intends to discard.

b Article 1(b) of the directive, which is set out at judgment para 3, below, defines ‘producer’ as anyone whose activities produce waste and/or anyone who carries out pre-processing, mixing or other operations resulting in a change in the nature or composition of this waste.

c Article 1(c) of the directive, which is set out at judgment para 3, below, defines ‘holder’ as the producer of waste or the natural or legal person who was in possession of it.

excavated, were 'waste' within the meaning of art 1(a) of the directive. The mere fact that Annex I to the directive referred to material spilled, lost or having undergone any other mishap including any materials or equipment contaminated as a result of the mishap, did not suffice to classify as waste hydrocarbons which had been spilled by accident and which had contaminated soil and groundwater. What was important was whether that accidental spill of hydrocarbons had been an act by which the holder had discarded them. In that regard, it was clear that accidentally spilled hydrocarbons which caused soil and groundwater contamination were not a product which might be re-used without processing. Further, their marketing was very uncertain and, even if it were possible, implied preliminary operations would be uneconomical for their holder. Therefore, those hydrocarbons were substances which the holder did not intend to produce and which he discarded, albeit involuntarily, at the time of production or distribution operations which related to them. Moreover, if hydrocarbons which caused contamination were not considered to be waste on the ground that they had been spilled by accident, their holder would be excluded from the obligations which the directive required member states to impose on him, in contradiction to the prohibition on the abandonment, dumping or uncontrolled disposal of waste. It followed that the holder of hydrocarbons, which had been spilled accidentally and which had contaminated soil and groundwater, discarded those substances such that they were to be classified as 'waste' within the meaning of the directive. So far as the contaminated soil was concerned, the hydrocarbons could not be separated from the land which they had contaminated and could not be disposed of unless the land was also subject to the necessary decontamination. Accordingly, the classification of the soil contaminated by hydrocarbons as 'waste' depended on the obligation on the person who had caused the accidental spill of those substances to discard them. Further, since contaminated soil was to be considered to be waste by the mere fact of its accidental contamination by hydrocarbons, its classification as such did not depend on other operations being carried out which were the responsibility of its owner or which the latter had decided to undertake. The fact that the soil was not excavated had no bearing on its classification as waste (see judgment paras 43, 44, 47-50, 52, 53, below).

(2) In circumstances such as those in the main proceedings, the petroleum undertaking which had supplied the service station might be considered to be the holder of that waste within the meaning of art 1(c) of the directive where the leak from which the service station's storage facilities which had given rise to the waste was attributable to the conduct of that undertaking. The directive defined the 'holder' of waste broadly, without specifying whether the obligation to dispose of or recover was, as a general rule, a matter for the producer or the possessor of the waste. Further, the directive distinguished between practical recovery or disposal operations, which it made the responsibility of any 'holder' of waste, whether producer or possessor, and the financial burden of those operations, which, in accordance with the 'polluter pays' principle, were imposed on the person who had produced the waste. In the main proceedings, the hydrocarbons had been purchased by the service station to meet its operating needs and, therefore, had been in the possession of the service station's manager, who had had them in stock when they had become waste and who might therefore be considered to be the holder and the producer of the waste within the meaning of arts 1(b) and (c) of the directive. Nevertheless, if it appeared to the national court that the poor

- a* condition of the service station's storage facilities and the leak of hydrocarbons was attributable to a disregard of contractual obligations by the petroleum undertaking which had supplied the service station, or to any actions which might render that undertaking liable, the activities of that undertaking could be considered to have 'produced' waste within the meaning of art 1(b) of the directive and the petroleum undertaking might therefore also be regarded as
- b* being the holder of the waste (see judgment paras 55, 58–60, below).

Notes

For the meaning of 'waste', see 38 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 173.

Cases cited

- c* ARCO Chemie Nederland Ltd v Minister van Volkshuisvesting, Ruimtelijke Ordening en Milieubeheer, Vereniging Dorpsbelang Hees v Directeur van de dienst Milieu en Water van de provincie Gelderland Joined cases C-418/97 and C-419/97 [2003] All ER (EC) 237, [2002] QB 646, [2002] 2 WLR 1240, [2000] ECR I-4475, ECJ.
- European Commission v Italy* Case C-365/97 [1999] ECR I-7773, ECJ.
- d* Inter-Environnement Wallonie ASBL v Région Wallonie Case C-129/96 [1998] All ER (EC) 155, [1997] ECR I-7411, ECJ.
- Palin Granit Oy (Application by)* Case C-9/00 [2003] All ER (EC) 366, [2002] 1 WLR 2644, [2002] ECR I-3533, ECJ.
- Staatssecretaris van Financiën v Shipping and Forwarding Enterprise Safe BV* Case C-320/88 [1990] ECR I-285, ECJ.
- e* Vessoso (Criminal proceedings against) Joined cases C-206/88 and C-207/88 [1990] ECR I-1461, ECJ.
- Weidacher (as administrator of the insolvent company Thakis Vertriebs- und Handels GmbH) v Bundesminister für Land- und Forstwirtschaft* Case C-179/00 [2002] ECR I-501, ECJ.

f Reference

- By decision of 3 December 2002, the Cour d'Appel de Bruxelles, Belgium, referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) two questions (set out at judgment para 22, below) concerning the interpretation of art 1(a), (b) and (c) of Council Directive (EEC) 75/442 (on waste), as amended
- g* by Council Directive (EEC) 91/156. The reference was made in the course of proceedings brought against Paul Van de Walle, Daniel Laurent and Thierry Mersch, senior staff of Texaco Belgium SA (Texaco), and against Texaco itself (together Mr Van de Walle and others), who, as the result of an accidental leak of hydrocarbons from a service station under that company's sign, are charged
- h* with the offence of abandoning waste. Observations were submitted on behalf of: P Van de Walle, D Laurent and Texaco, by M Mahieu, Avocat; T Mersch, by O Klees, Avocat; Région de Bruxelles-Capitale, by E Gillet, L Levi and P Boucquoy, Avocats; the Commission of the European Communities, by F Simonetti and M Konstantinidis, acting as agents. The language of the case was French. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General.

i

29 January 2004. The Advocate General (J Kokott) delivered the following opinion<sup>1</sup>. a

I—INTRODUCTION

1. This case concerns the interpretation of Council Directive (EEC) 75/442 (on waste)<sup>2</sup>, as amended by Council Directive (EEC) 91/156<sup>3</sup>, (the framework waste directive) with respect to fuel which leaked from a storage tank and contaminated the surrounding soil. The Cour d'Appel (Court of Appeal), Brussels, wishes to know whether the fuel and the contaminated soil constitute waste and whether the petroleum company which leased the service station, signed an operating agreement with the operator and supplied her with the fuel can be regarded as the producer or holder of the waste. b
c

II—APPLICABLE LEGISLATION

2. Article 1 of the framework waste directive contains the following definitions:

‘For the purposes of this Directive:

(a) “waste” shall mean any substance or object in the categories set out in Annex I which the holder discards or intends or is required to discard ... d

(b) “producer” shall mean anyone whose activities produce waste (“original producer”) and/or anyone who carries out pre-processing, mixing or other operations resulting in a change in the nature or composition of this waste;

(c) “holder” shall mean the producer of the waste or the natural or legal person who is in possession of it; e

(d) ...’

3. Annex I defines various categories of waste, including the following two categories:

‘Q4 Materials spilled, lost or having undergone other mishap, including any materials, equipment, etc., contaminated as a result of the mishap ...’ f and

‘Q15 Contaminated materials, substances or products resulting from remedial action with respect to land ...’ g

4. Article 15 of the framework waste directive establishes liability for the cost of disposing of waste:

‘In accordance with the “polluter pays” principle, the cost of disposing of waste must be borne by:

—the holder who has waste handled by a waste collector or by an undertaking as referred to in Article 9, h
and/or

—the previous holders or the producer of the product from which the waste came.’

5. The relevant provisions of Belgian law incorporate art 1(a) and Annex I of the framework waste directive. i

<sup>1</sup> Original language: German.

<sup>2</sup> OJ 1975 L194 p 39.

<sup>3</sup> OJ 1991 L78 p 32.

a III—FACTS, PROCEDURE AND QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

6. Mr Van de Walle, Mr Laurent and Mr Mersch (the defendants) are officers of the company Texaco SA (Texaco). In the main proceedings they are charged with criminal offences under certain provisions of the law on waste. Texaco participated in the proceedings as the civil party liable.

b 7. Texaco leased the service station at issue in 1981 and in 1988 signed an operating agreement with the operator. In January 1993, it was found that fuel had leaked from the service station's storage tanks. It had contaminated the earth around the tanks and infiltrated the cellars of the adjacent building.

c 8. Tests showed that there had been leakage from the pipes of the diesel tank and the tank containing unleaded 98 Ron petrol, which had holes in it. A stock check showed that about some 800 litres of unleaded 98 Ron petrol had been lost since the beginning of October 1992.

9. In February 1993, the service station was taken out of use, following the termination of both the operating agreement with the operator and the lease with the owner of the property, and after the summer of 1993 Texaco paid no more rent.

d 10. Texaco—without admitting liability—had various work done to decontaminate the soil up to May 1994. However, subsequent analyses of groundwater samples showed that it was still contaminated with fuel.

e 11. Since Texaco did not pursue decontamination after May 1994, on 10 September 1998 the Public Prosecutor brought charges against the three accused, in their capacity as officers of Texaco, and against the company, in its capacity as the civil party liable, for having infringed the regulations on waste. The Brussels-Capital Region participated in the proceedings as joint plaintiff. At first instance, the accused were acquitted and the civil claim against Texaco was struck out on the grounds that, in view of the acquittal, the court had no jurisdiction.

f 12. The Public Prosecutor and the Brussels-Capital Region appealed to the Cour d'Appel. That court is uncertain as to whether the contaminated soil can be regarded as waste and notes in this connection that there is disagreement concerning the scope of the concept of 'abandonment of waste'.

13. It has therefore referred the following questions to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling:

g '(1) Are Article 1(a) of Council Directive 75/442/EEC ..., which defines waste as "any substance or object which the holder disposes of or is required to dispose of pursuant to the provisions of national law in force", and Article 1(b) and (c) of the Directive, which defines "producer of waste" as "anyone whose activities produce waste ('original producer') and/or anyone who carried out pre-processing, mixing or other operations resulting in a change in the nature or composition of this waste" and "holder" as "the producer of the waste or the natural or legal person who is in possession of it", to be interpreted as being applicable to a petroleum company which produces hydrocarbons and sells them to a manager operating one of its service stations under a contract of independent management excluding any relationship of subordination to the company, if such hydrocarbons seep into the ground, thus contaminating the soil and groundwater?

h

i

(2) Or must it be considered that the classification as waste within the meaning of the abovementioned provisions applies only if the contaminated soil has been excavated?' a

IV—LEGAL ANALYSIS

14. The Cour d'Appel's questions seek to know whether soil contaminated by leaked fuel can be regarded as waste and whether Texaco can be regarded as the producer or holder of any such waste. b

A—Meaning of waste

1. Arguments of the parties

15. The parties all agree that the leaked fuel and contaminated soil can only be regarded as waste if the holder discards or intends or is required to discard them. c

16. The Brussels-Capital Region takes the view that the holder of the fuel discarded it when it leaked. This, it argues, is precisely the situation covered by waste category Q4. Categories Q5, Q12 and Q13<sup>4</sup> indicate that contaminated soil is also waste. Irrespective of whether the holder discarded or intended to discard the soil, the property of being waste can follow from the obligation to discard it. Such an obligation is consistent with the objective of the waste directive to protect health and the environment and with the high level of environmental protection called for in art 174(2) EC (formerly art 130r(2) of the EC Treaty). It would prevent the obligations under the waste regulations from being evaded by mixing waste with soil. If contaminated soil were not waste, the obligations to protect health and safeguard the environment under art 4 of the waste directive would be ineffective. d

17. It continues by arguing that an obligation to discard the contaminated soil can also be derived from national law. In the Brussels-Capital Region there is no specific obligation to clean up contaminated soil, but one can be derived from civil law. Such an obligation is also assumed by some authors to exist when there is no possible lawful and technically permissible use for the material in question. This, it is claimed, applies in particular to leaked fuel. e

18. The accused and Texaco consider the question of whether the contaminated soil constitutes waste to be irrelevant in the main proceedings, since in any event they were not the holder or producer of any waste there might be. f

19. They stress that, like the operator, they were unaware that fuel was leaking, whereas a thing can only knowingly be discarded. This, they say, is not inconsistent with the judgment in Criminal proceedings against Vessoso<sup>5</sup>, according to which the term 'waste' does not presume that the holder disposing of a substance or an object intended to exclude all economic re-utilisation of the substance or object by others. Ignorance of the fact that fuel has leaked is not comparable with this situation. Where fuel has leaked, therefore, there cannot yet be any question of waste. g

20. The accused and Texaco concede that waste would be present as soon as a holder, aware of the pollution of the soil, began to discard it. In the present case, this could be assumed to be the moment at which the pollution of the soil h a was discovered and the initial clean-up measures were taken. However, in this respect, they insist that they were not the holder or producer of this waste.

<sup>4</sup> Q5 and Q12 concern contaminated materials, Q13 concerns '[a]ny materials, substances or products whose use has been banned by law'.

<sup>5</sup> Joined cases C-206/88 and C-207/88 [1990] ECR I-1461. i

21. The Commission of the European Communities observes that the definition of waste follows from art 1 of the framework waste directive, while Annex I to the directive and the European Waste Catalogue illustrate this definition. Leaked fuel would fall in waste category Q4, the wording of which
b shows that the legislature intended to include mishaps within the scope of the term 'discard'. Leaked fuel is therefore waste.

22. According to the Commission, waste category Q4, as defined, can also include contaminated soil. However, it doubts whether natural elements such as soil, water and air can be regarded as waste merely because they are
c contaminated, the aim of the framework waste directive being rather to protect them. The Commission finds it hard to imagine the concepts of disposal and recovery being applied to these elements. In the event of contamination, they ought rather to be subjected to remedial action or otherwise treated to avoid any adverse effects. They cannot therefore be regarded as waste.

d 23. However, according to the Commission, as soon as contaminated soil is excavated, it is no longer to be regarded as a natural element but rather as a movable, a product or a substance contaminated in a mishap within the meaning of category Q4. The obligation to dispose of the leaked fuel—definable as waste—meant that the contaminated soil had to be excavated.

e
2. Assessment

24. At the time the leak occurred and afterwards, the fuel mingled with the surrounding soil. It must be assumed that, at least in part, the mixture cannot be separated without special measures. Therefore, whether the leaked fuel
f should be regarded as waste is not something that can be separately verified. The question is rather whether the contaminated soil as a whole should be classified as waste.

25. According to the third recital, the objective of the framework waste directive is the protection of human health and the environment against harmful effects caused by the collection, transport, treatment, storage and g tipping of waste. According to art 174(2) EC, Community policy on the environment is to aim at a high level of protection and is to be based, in particular, on the precautionary principle and the principle that preventive action should be taken. From this the court has concluded that the concept of waste cannot be interpreted restrictively<sup>6</sup>.

26. Article 1(a) of the framework waste directive defines waste as any h substance or object in the categories set out in Annex I which the holder discards or intends or is required to discard. The annex in question and the European Waste Catalogue clarify and illustrate that definition by providing lists of substances and objects which may be classified as waste. However, in the view of the court, these lists are only intended as guidance<sup>7</sup>.

27. The crux of the matter is whether the holder discards or intends or is i required to discard a thing. According to the ARCO judgment, this must be

6 See ARCO Chemie Nederland Ltd v Minister van Volkshuisvesting, Ruimtelijke Ordening en Milieubeheer, Vereniging Dorpsbelang Hees v Directeur van de dienst Milieu en Water van de provincie Gelderland Joined cases C-418/97 and C-419/97 [2003] All ER (EC) 237, [2000] ECR I-4475 (para 38 et seq) and Application by Palin Granit Oy Case C-9/00 [2003] All ER (EC) 366, [2002] ECR I-3533 (para 23).

7 See the judgment in the Palin Granit case, cited in footnote 6, above (para 22).

determined in the light of all the circumstances, regard being had to the aim of the directive and the need to ensure that its effectiveness is not undermined<sup>8</sup>. a

(a) Waste category Q4

28. It follows from waste category Q4 that contaminated earth is waste. This category covers materials spilled, lost or having undergone other mishap, including any materials, equipment, etc, contaminated as a result of the mishap. The concept of 'material' is already very broad and could include earth as forming part of the soil. Moreover, the list is not exhaustive. b

29. To some extent, however, it may be inferred from waste category Q15, which, in particular, covers excavated soil, that as yet unexcavated contaminated soil is not waste<sup>9</sup>. At the same time, there is no reason to believe that waste category Q15 would conclusively define the circumstances in which soil can be waste. The inclusion of unexcavated soil is also suggested by subsection 17 05 of the European Waste Catalogue<sup>10</sup>, which is headed 'soil (including excavated soil from contaminated sites), stones and dredging spoil' and includes the items 17 05 03 'Soil and stones containing dangerous substances' and 17 05 04 'soil and stones other than those mentioned in 17 05 03'. In principle, these categories could also cover unexcavated soil. c

30. The view that unexcavated soil cannot be waste may be attributed to the fact that various member states restrict the concept of waste to movables<sup>11</sup>. However, the regulatory traditions of some member states cannot be the deciding factor where the interpretation of concepts of Community law is concerned. d

31. The Commission's argument that natural elements as such cannot be waste is based on the aim of art 4 of the framework waste directive which, among other things, calls for protection of the soil from the risks of waste. However, in the present case it is not a question of the indeterminate natural element 'soil' but of a precisely determinable quantity of earth, which is endangering the surrounding soil. Contrary to the view expressed by the Commission, this earth may be the subject of disposal or recovery operations. e

32. Bearing in mind the aim of a high level of protection set out in art 174(2) EC, the treatment of unexcavated contaminated soil as waste leads to perfectly reasonable results. From art 3 of the framework waste directive it follows that priority should be given to preventing or reducing the production of such waste and its harmfulness. According to art 4, such waste must be recovered or disposed of without endangering human health and without using processes or methods which could harm the environment. The rest of the legal framework for organising the disposal of waste, described in art 5 et seq, is also largely f

<sup>8</sup> See the ARCO judgment, cited in footnote 6, above (para 73). g

<sup>9</sup> See Ludger-Anselm Versteyl 'Der Abfallbegriff' im Europäischen Recht—Eine unendliche Geschichte', Europäische Zeitschrift für Wirtschaftsrecht (2000) 585, p 586; Martin Dieckmann Das Abfallrecht der Europäischen Gemeinschaft (1994) p 152 et seq. h

<sup>10</sup> See Commission Decision (EC) 2000/532 (replacing Commission Decision (EC) 94/3 establishing a list of wastes pursuant to art 1(a) of Council Directive (EEC) 75/442 on waste and Council Decision (EC) 94/904 establishing a list of hazardous waste pursuant to art 1(4) of Council Directive (EEC) 91/689 on hazardous waste) (OJ 2000 L226 p 3), as amended by Council Decision (EC) 2001/573 (amending Decision 2000/532 as regards the list of wastes) (OJ 2001 L203 p 18). i

<sup>11</sup> In particular, Germany and France; in Italy the restriction is based on a judgment of the Corte Suprema di Cassazione of 18 September 2002, No 31011. Austria, on the other hand, expressly extends the concept of waste to movables that have entered into environmentally harmful association with the soil (see para 2(2) of the Abfallwirtschaftsgesetz (the Law on Waste Management)).

a applicable to the treatment of contaminated soil and could help to achieve a high level of environmental protection.

33. Accordingly, preference should be given to the view that unexcavated contaminated soil can fall within the scope of category Q4.

b (b) The notion of 'discarding'

34. However, the decisive factor in determining the presence of waste is not assignment to a category of waste but rather whether the holder discards or intends or is required to discard the soil.

c 35. An intent to discard must be ruled out as long as the holder is unaware of the contamination of the soil. On the other hand, once the holder has become aware of a pollution incident that precludes further appropriate use of the soil, a (rebuttable) intent to discard may be presumed. Thus, for example, pollution of farmland may adversely affect the crop, while pollution of building land may harm or inconvenience the users of the building. This loss of utility creates the risk, typical of waste, that the holder will neither use nor properly dispose of the material in question, allowing it to pollute the environment. In the case of contaminated soil, this risk will be realised if no clean-up measures are taken, so that the pollution spreads. However, the presumption of an intent to discard can be rebutted if the holder, rather than discarding the soil, takes concrete measures to make it usable again.

d 36. Apart from the intent to discard, in the case of contaminated soil there may also be an obligation to discard which presupposes neither knowledge of the pollution nor an intention to discard. This obligation may arise from the risks associated with the pollution of the soil.

e 37. However, it is not possible to conclude from the general waste law clause of art 4 of the framework waste directive that there is an obligation to discard contaminated soil. Although a general obligation to deal with contaminated soil in such a way as to protect health and the environment is to be welcomed, this obligation is only a legal consequence of the property of being waste and cannot be used to show that something possesses that property. For this reason the argument of the Brussels-Capital Region that contaminated soil must always be regarded as waste to prevent the framework waste directive from being circumvented also fails.

f 38. In the case of an obligation to discard, the property of being waste derives rather from the interplay between waste law and the specialised law regulating the relevant risks. The latter may be determined wholly or in part by Community law or be exclusively national. Thus, art 6(2) of Council Directive (EEC) 92/43<sup>12</sup> requires the member states to take appropriate steps to avoid, in the special areas of conservation, the deterioration of natural habitats and the habitats of species as well as disturbance of the species for which the areas have been designated. For example, it may be necessary to remove contaminated soil that threatens the quality of the water in a protected wetlands area. An obligation to remove contaminated soil may also arise from the law on water, special soil conservation regulations or general regulations on accident prevention. According to the case law, even the regulations on waste disposal can form the basis of an obligation to clean up the soil<sup>13</sup>, which, depending on the circumstances, may also require the removal of contaminated soil. As the 12 On the conservation of natural habitats and of wild fauna and flora (OJ 1992 L206 p 7) (the Habitats Directive).

13 See European Commission v Italy Case C-365/97 [1999] ECR I-7773 (para 108 et seq).

Brussels-Capital Region explains, such an obligation can also be founded in civil law<sup>14</sup>. In all these cases, the holder must discard the soil, regardless of whether it can still fulfil the intended purpose. a

39. By contrast, an obligation to discard cannot be based on a risk created by pollution if that risk still allows the soil to be left in situ, perhaps because adequate protective measures can be taken without the need for excavation. In this case the holder does not have to discard the soil. b

40. Whether in the present case an obligation to excavate the contaminated soil exists and to what extent it can still be put to lawful use cannot be determined on the basis of the information submitted to the court. This is a matter for the competent national court.

41. From this analysis it follows that the question whether contaminated soil is classifiable as waste only after it has been excavated can be answered in the negative. Such soil may already be waste even before excavation. c

(c) Interim finding concerning classification as waste

42. Thus, to sum up, contaminated soil is to be regarded as waste if, because of the pollution, the holder is obliged to excavate it. Subject to rebuttal, the soil may be presumed to be waste if, because of the pollution, it is no longer fit for proper use. d

B—Texaco's liability

43. It is now necessary to determine whether Texaco can be regarded as a producer or holder of waste, on the assumption that in the present case the contaminated soil is waste. e

1. Arguments of the parties

44. The Brussels-Capital Region has supplemented the account of the facts given by the Cour d'Appel. It maintains that even after the discovery of the pollution Texaco delivered fuel to the service station. Moreover, the damage to the tank is attributable to a filling mistake made by Texaco in the 1980s, that is to say, before the latest operator of the service station took over. According to the Brussels-Capital Region, in the operating agreement Texaco reserved the right to check the fuel stocks at any time. A representative of Texaco checked the quantities sold on a monthly basis and the operator was allowed to use the service station to sell fuel, but was not entitled to change the installations without first obtaining Texaco's consent. When the service station was handed over the condition of the underground tanks was not documented, contrary to the operating agreement. f

45. In the view of the Brussels-Capital Region, the term 'holder of waste' should be interpreted broadly. It maintains that in the present case it covers Texaco, since Texaco leased the service station, effectively controlled its operation and at least partially cleaned up the contaminated soil. It was also a producer of waste since the leaked fuel could no longer be put to any lawful use. g

46. In the opinion of the accused and Texaco, the request for a preliminary ruling does not extend to the question of whether Texaco can be regarded as a holder or producer of waste. h

<sup>14</sup> See also the ARCO judgment, cited in footnote 6, above (para 86), where the example of an agreement is mentioned. i

- a 47. Texaco, they argue, clearly produced not waste but products, namely fuel. The operator of the service station alone was responsible for the fuel's having become waste. The original producer of a product cannot be held responsible if subsequently the product is not used properly but converted into waste.
- b 48. In their view, possession is characterised by actual physical control and Texaco had no such control over the tanks or the fuel in storage. The restriction on the operator's power of disposal with respect to the tank installations was primarily the result of the fact that the operator neither owned nor leased those installations. However, the operating agreement expressly provides for the operator to be responsible for maintaining and checking them. Moreover, it was agreed that the operator alone should be
- c liable for damage traceable to the installations. The operator was the sole owner of and fully responsible for the stored fuel. The checking of the fuel stocks by Texaco provided for in the agreement should not be equated with a technical inspection of the installations. It was intended solely to prevent fraud.
- d 49. The Commission takes the view that the holder of the waste may be determined in this case by establishing who held the fuel when it became waste. On purchasing the fuel the operator of the service station became the owner. Moreover, the fact that the fuel had been produced by Texaco cannot affect the outcome, since the waste accrued in the context of the service station operator's activities.

2. Assessment

- e 50. In the present case, Texaco can incur obligations under the waste legislation only if it can be regarded as the producer or holder of waste. According to art 8 of the framework waste directive, any holder of waste must have it handled by an authorised waste disposal undertaking or duly dispose of it himself. Article 15 of the same directive provides that, in accordance with the
- f 'polluter pays' principle, the cost of disposing of waste must be borne by the holder who has waste handled by a waste collector or disposal undertaking. According to art 1(c) of the directive, 'holder' means not only the actual holder of the waste but also the producer of the waste, as defined in art 1(b).

(a) The meaning of 'producer of waste'

- g 51. Article 1(b) of the framework waste directive defines 'producer' as anyone whose activities produce waste ('original producer') and/or anyone who carries out pre-processing, mixing or other operations resulting in a change in the nature or composition of this waste.

- h 52. Texaco cannot be regarded as the producer of waste simply because it produced fuel which became waste as a result of a mishap. The notion of producer of waste is more closely linked with bringing about the state of being waste. When properly used, fuel burns without leaving any waste<sup>15</sup>. In the present case it became waste not as a result of Texaco's production activities but through being stored in defective tanks.

- i 53. In principle, therefore, the producer of the waste is whoever was operating the tank installations when the fuel leaked. Prima facie, that person was the operator of the service station. Whether, contrary to that impression, Texaco was responsible for the storage of the fuel—as the operator ran the service station for Texaco, not as part of her own business—can ultimately be decided only by the competent national court. In reaching its decision it will have to consider who, in law and in fact, controlled the storage operations and the state of the installations. Pointers may be found in the operating agreement and any other relevant provisions. Another important factor will be how Texaco actually behaved. Of course, Texaco cannot divest itself of legal obligations to provide supervision simply by not discharging them in practice. However, if Texaco on the basis of its position of economic strength relative to the service station operator went beyond the confines of its legal position and actually controlled the operation of the storage tanks, then it will also have to accept the ensuing liability. a

<sup>15</sup> Cf the ARCO judgment, cited in footnote 6, above (para 66).

54. Moreover, Texaco might be considered to be the producer of waste if the damage to the tanks could be traced back to its actions. In this respect, the mistake in filling the tanks mentioned by the Brussels-Capital Region may be relevant. It is also possible that when it handed over the service station to the operator Texaco ought to have known about and made good any defects which later led to the fuel leak. However, in this respect also, the necessary findings will have to be made by the competent court itself. b

(b) The meaning of 'holder of waste' c

55. According to art 1(c) of the framework waste directive, the producer of the waste or the natural or legal person who is in possession of it is to be regarded as the holder. If Texaco is not the producer of waste, then it can only be the holder if it has waste in its possession. d

56. The notion of possession is not defined either in the directive or in Community law in general. In the usual sense of the word, possession means actual physical control of an object, but does not presuppose ownership or a legal power of disposal. However, the obligations under art 8 of the framework waste directive can only be met if there is not only actual possession of the waste but also an entitlement to dispose of it. For the purposes of art 1(c) of the framework waste directive, the notion of possession must therefore go beyond the narrow sense of the word<sup>16</sup> to include a legal power of disposal over the waste, in addition to actual (direct or indirect) physical control. e

57. Who had actual physical control over the waste and at what point is a matter for the national court. Here again, it appears at first sight that the operator had physical control, at any event until the service station was taken out of use. Whether this first impression is justified will have to be determined essentially on the basis of the same criteria as those used to determine who was the producer of the waste. However, it might be that even under the operating agreement the operator was exercising physical control over the tank installations and the surrounding soil not for herself but for Texaco. There would be grounds for reaching this conclusion if, as the Brussels-Capital Region and Texaco submit, the operator was prevented from making changes to the site without Texaco's consent. f

58. There are strong indications that after the service station was taken out of use Texaco took actual physical control. It seems unlikely that following termination of the operating agreement the operator still exercised physical control over the service station. Texaco, by contrast, continued to pay rent until the summer of 1993 and, up to May 1994, had clean-up works carried out, which presupposes physical control of the site. g

<sup>16</sup> Cf the opinion of Advocate General Mischo of 20 November 2001 in Weidacher (as administrator of the insolvent company Thakiss Vertriebs- und Handels GmbH) v Bundesminister für Land- und Forstwirtschaft Case C-179/00 [2002] ECR I-501 (para 76 et seq), in which he illustrates the imprecise use of the notion of holder. h

- a* 59. Who was authorised to have the contaminated soil disposed of can also be determined only by the competent court. From the information to hand, it seems unlikely that the operator had this authority. Whether Texaco should have had the contaminated soil disposed of, on the basis of the lease agreement with the property owner, or whether this lay solely within the authority of the latter, cannot be determined from the information available to the court.
- b* (c) Interim finding concerning the concepts of producer and holder of waste
60. To sum up, under art 1(c) of the framework waste directive a petroleum company which produces fuel and sells it to a manager operating one of its service stations under a contract of independent management excluding any relationship of subordination to that company is to be regarded as the holder of waste in the form of soil contaminated by leaked fuel:
- c* —if, taking all the legal and factual circumstances into account, the manager operated the service station not as part of his own business but for the petroleum company (art 1(c), first alternative—producer of the waste),
- if the damage to the tanks can be traced to the conduct of the petroleum company (art 1(c), first alternative—producer of the waste), or
- d* —if, taking all the legal and factual circumstances into account, the petroleum company has actual physical control and is entitled to dispose of the waste (art 1(c), second alternative—holder of the waste).

V—CONCLUSION

- e* 61. It is therefore proposed that the questions referred by the Cour d'Appel de Bruxelles be answered as follows:
- (1) Contaminated soil is to be regarded as waste if as a result of the pollution the holder is obliged to excavate it. Subject to rebuttal, the soil may be presumed to be waste if as a result of the contamination it is no longer fit for proper use.
- f* (2) A petroleum company which produces fuel and sells it to a manager operating one of its service stations under a contract of independent management excluding any relationship of subordination to that company is to be regarded as the holder of waste in the form of soil contaminated by leaked fuel:
- g* —if, taking all the legal and factual circumstances into account, the manager operated the service station not as part of his own business but for the petroleum company (art 1(c), first alternative—producer of the waste),
- if the damage to the tanks can be traced to the conduct of the petroleum company (art 1(c), first alternative—producer of the waste), or
- h* —if, taking all the legal and factual circumstances into account, the petroleum company has actual physical control and is entitled to dispose of the waste (art 1(c), second alternative—holder of the waste).

7 September 2004. THE COURT OF JUSTICE (Second Chamber) delivered the following judgment.

- i* 1. The reference for a preliminary ruling concerns the interpretation of art 1(a), (b) and (c) of Council Directive (EEC) 75/442 (on waste) (OJ 1975 L194 p 39), as amended by Council Directive (EEC) 91/156 (OJ 1991 L78 p 32), (hereinafter Directive 75/442).
2. The reference was made in the course of proceedings brought against Mr Van de Walle, Mr Laurent and Mr Mersch, senior staff of Texaco

Belgium SA (Texaco), and against Texaco itself (together Mr Van de Walle and others), who, as the result of an accidental leak of hydrocarbons from a service station under that company's sign, are charged with the offence of abandoning waste. a

LEGAL FRAMEWORK b

Community legislation

3. Article 1 of Directive 75/442 provides:

'For the purposes of this Directive:

(a) "waste" shall mean any substance or object in the categories set out in Annex I which the holder discards or intends or is required to discard ... c

(b) "producer" shall mean anyone whose activities produce waste ("original producer") and/or anyone who carries out pre-processing, mixing or other operations resulting in a change in the nature or composition of this waste;

(c) "holder" shall mean the producer of the waste or the natural or legal person who is in possession of it ...' d

4. Annex I to Directive 75/442, entitled 'Categories of waste', refers in heading Q4 to '[m]aterials spilled, lost or having undergone other mishap, including any materials, equipment, etc., contaminated as a result of the mishap'; in heading Q7 to '[s]ubstances which no longer perform satisfactorily (e.g. contaminated acids, contaminated solvents, exhausted tempering salts, etc.)'; in heading Q14 to '[p]roducts for which the holder has no further use (e.g. agricultural, household, office, commercial and shop discards, etc.)' and, in heading Q15, to '[c]ontaminated materials, substances or products resulting from remedial action with respect to land'.

5. The second paragraph of art 4 of Directive 75/442 states: 'Member States shall also take the necessary measures to prohibit the abandonment, dumping or uncontrolled disposal of waste.' f

6. Article 8 of Directive 75/442 provides that member states are to take the necessary measures to ensure that any holder of waste has it handled by a private or public waste collector or by an undertaking which carries out the disposal or recovery operations or that that holder carries out those operations himself. g

7. Article 15 of Directive 75/442 states:

'In accordance with the "polluter pays" principle, the cost of disposing of waste must be borne by:

—the holder who has waste handled by a waste collector or by an undertaking as referred to in Article 9, and/or h

—the previous holders or the producer of the product from which the waste came.'

National legislation

8. Article 2(1) of the order of 7 March 1991 of the Council of the Brussels-Capital Region (Moniteur Belge of 23 April 1991) (the order of 7 March 1991) defines waste as 'a substance or object which the holder discards or intends or is required to discard'. i

9. Annex I to the order, which lists several categories of waste, refers in heading Q4 to '[m]aterials spilled, lost or having undergone other mishap, a including any materials, equipment, etc., contaminated as a result of the accident', in heading Q7 to '[s]ubstances which no longer perform satisfactorily', and in heading Q12 to 'contaminated materials'.

b 10. Annex III to the order, entitled '[c]onstituents which render waste hazardous', includes a heading C51, which refers to 'hydrocarbons and their oxygen, nitrogen or sulphur compounds not otherwise taken into account in this annex'.

11. Article 8 of the order states:

c 'It is prohibited to abandon waste in a public or private area outside the sites authorised for that purpose by the competent public authority or without complying with the legislative provisions relating to the disposal of waste.'

12. Article 10 of the order of 7 March 1991 provides:

d 'Anyone producing or holding waste shall be required to dispose of it or have it disposed of in accordance with the provisions of this Order, under conditions which restrict harmful effects on soil, flora, fauna, air and water and, in general, without adversely affecting the environment or human health.

e The Executive [of the Brussels-Capital Region] shall ensure that the cost of disposing of waste is borne by the holder who has waste handled by a disposal undertaking or, failing that, by the previous holders or the producer of the product from which the waste came.'

13. Article 22 of the order of 7 March 1991 subjects to a penalty anyone who abandons his own waste or that of others in breach of art 8 of that order.

THE MAIN ACTION AND THE QUESTIONS REFERRED

f 14. The Brussels-Capital Region owns a building at 132 avenue du Pont de Luttre in Brussels, Belgium. The renovation of that building which it had undertaken in order to set up a social assistance centre had to be halted on 18 January 1993 as the result of the discovery that water saturated with hydrocarbons was leaking into the cellar of the building from the wall which separates that building from the adjacent building at 134 avenue du Pont de Luttre, where a Texaco service station was at that time located.

g 15. The service station was covered by a commercial lease between Texaco and the owner of the premises. Since 1988 it had been operated by a manager under an 'operating agreement' which provided that the land, building, equipment and movable property for the operation were made available to the manager by Texaco. The manager operated the service station on his own behalf but did not have the right to make changes to the premises without prior written permission from Texaco, which supplied the service station with petroleum products and, in addition, retained control over bookkeeping and supplies.

h 16. Following the discovery of the hydrocarbon leak, which was the result of defects in the service station's storage facilities, Texaco took the view that the station could no longer continue to operate and decided to terminate the management contract in April 1993, alleging serious negligence on the part of the manager. It subsequently terminated the commercial lease in June 1993.

i 17. Although disclaiming liability, Texaco proceeded to decontaminate the soil and replaced part of the storage facilities which gave rise to the hydrocarbon leak. It carried out no further activities on the site after May 1994. The Brussels-Capital Region took the view that decontamination had not been completed and paid for other remedial measures which it considered necessary in order to carry out its building plan. a

18. Since Texaco's actions appeared to constitute infringements of the order of 7 March 1991, and in particular arts 8, 10 and 22 thereof, proceedings were brought against Mr Van de Walle, Texaco's managing director, Mr Laurent and Mr Mersch, officers of the company, and Texaco as a legal entity before the Tribunal Correctionnel (Criminal Court) of Brussels. The Brussels-Capital Region claimed damages in those proceedings. By judgment of 20 June 2001, that court acquitted the defendants, exonerated Texaco and stated that it was not competent to rule on the application by the party claiming damages. b

19. The Ministère Public (Public Prosecutor) and the party claiming damages appealed against that judgment before the court which has made the reference. c

20. That court took the view that art 22 of the order of 7 March 1991 imposed penalties for failure to comply with the obligations set out in art 8 thereof and not for failure to comply with the requirements of art 10. It therefore considered that in order to be subject to criminal sanctions under art 22, the actions of the accused must constitute abandonment of waste within the meaning of art 8. It observed that Texaco had not rid itself of its waste by supplying it to the service station and that neither the petrol delivered nor the tanks which remained buried in the ground after the decontamination activities carried out by that undertaking could constitute waste within the meaning of art 2(1) of the order, that is to say, 'a substance or object which the holder discards or intends or is required to discard'. d

21. The court was in doubt, however, as to whether subsoil contaminated as the result of an accidental spill of hydrocarbons could be considered waste and stated that it doubted that that classification was possible, since the land in question had not been excavated and treated. It also pointed out that legal opinion differs as to whether the accidental spill of a product which contaminates soil is comparable to the abandonment of waste. e

22. Having noted that the definition of 'waste' in art 2(1) of the order of 7 March 1991 reproduces literally that in Directive 75/442 and that the annex to the order which lists categories of waste reproduces the terms used in Annex I to the directive, the Cour d'Appel of Brussels decided to stay the proceedings and refer the following questions to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling: f

(1) Are Article 1(a) of Council Directive 75/442/EEC ..., which defines waste as "any substance or object which the holder disposes of or is required to dispose of pursuant to the provisions of national law in force", and Article 1(b) and (c) of the Directive, which defines "producer of waste" as "anyone whose activities produce waste ('original producer') and/or anyone who carried out pre-processing, mixing or other operations resulting in a change in the nature or composition of this waste" and "holder" as "the producer of the waste or the natural or legal person who is in possession of it", to be interpreted as being applicable to a petroleum company which produces hydrocarbons and sells them to a manager operating one of its service stations under a contract of independent management excluding any relationship of subordination to the company, if such hydrocarbons seep into the ground, thus contaminating the soil and groundwater? g

h

i

- a (2) Or must it be considered that the classification as waste within the meaning of the abovementioned provisions applies only if the contaminated soil has been excavated?

THE QUESTIONS REFERRED

- b 23. By those two questions, which it is appropriate to consider together, the national court asks, first, whether hydrocarbons which are spilled unintentionally and cause soil and groundwater contamination may be considered to be waste within the meaning of art 1(a) of Directive 75/442 and whether the soil thus contaminated may also be classified as waste within the meaning of that provision even when it has not been excavated, and secondly
- c whether, in circumstances such as those in the main action, the petroleum undertaking which supplies the service station may be considered to be the producer or holder of such waste within the meaning of art 1(b) and (c) of the directive.

Observations submitted to the Court of Justice

- d 24. The Brussels-Capital Region takes the view that Texaco satisfies the definition of 'holder of waste' inasmuch as it held the hydrocarbons at the outset, delivered them to the service station, closely controlled the station's operations and pumped water from the aquifer in order to clean the contaminated soil.

- e 25. The hydrocarbons fall outside the classification as waste only until the service station discards them for some reason, at which point they become waste, including for the undertaking, such as Texaco, which produced and delivered them.

- f 26. A petroleum undertaking which produced and sold products which have become waste must therefore be considered to be the holder of waste within the meaning of Directive 75/442 if it had access to the site where that waste was situated or had the right to take a decision as to how its client carried out its operations or to inspect the product's storage facilities which are the source of spills to land and groundwater. The petroleum undertaking which in fact dealt with some of that waste is the holder of waste.

- g 27. As for the hydrocarbons in question in the main proceedings, which leaked from the service station's tanks, their producer or their holder discarded them. The hydrocarbons are specifically covered by heading Q4 of Annex I to Directive 75/442 and are, moreover, hazardous waste. They must therefore be considered to be waste within the meaning of the directive.

- h 28. Soil contaminated by hydrocarbons must also be classified as waste. That is clear from the terms of headings Q5, Q12 and Q13 of the annex and from the obligation for the holder of those substances to discard them.

- i 29. That obligation derives, inter alia, from the aim of Directive 75/442 to protect human health and the environment, which could not be achieved if the holder or producer of waste was not required to discard contaminated soil or if he merely buried contaminated material in the soil.

- i 30. Mr Van de Walle and others argue that Texaco delivered petroleum products which were sound at the time they were sold to the service station, an operation which cannot be regarded as the production of waste or as indicative of an intention to get rid of waste.

31. Mr Van de Walle and others take the view that the Community legislature defined waste as any substance which the holder 'discards or intends or is required to discard' in order to include a subjective element beyond the objective element (registration of a waste in a catalogue on the basis of its characteristics or its degree of toxicity), confining the scope to situations where there is action, intention or obligation on the part of the holder to discard waste, by either disposal or recovery.

32. The particularity of the main action lies in the fact that neither Texaco nor the manager of the service station knew or was aware that hydrocarbons had leaked from the tanks and had permeated the surrounding water and land. It is thus not possible to identify any action, intention or obligation to discard those substances.

33. Furthermore, Texaco was not ordered to decontaminate the site until January 1993, after the discovery that hydrocarbons were being leaked. That order, which they maintain was arbitrary, should have been addressed to the operator of the service station who, as an independent manager, should have been considered the only person required to discard those substances. Moreover, Texaco has always insisted that the soil decontamination work it carried out was 'without prejudice'.

34. As regards the meaning of 'producer' and 'holder' of waste for the purposes of Community law, Mr Van de Walle and others maintain that the wording of the question referred for a preliminary ruling and the statement of grounds in the judgment making the reference suggest that the Cour d'Appel of Brussels takes the view that Texaco is neither the producer nor the holder of the waste at issue and that that court is concerned not with those definitions but solely to have the court define what constitutes waste.

35. It is therefore only in the alternative, if the court deems it necessary to consider what is meant by 'producer' and 'holder', that Mr Van de Walle and others contend that Texaco merely delivered sound products to the service station and therefore did not cause to exist, create or produce waste. In the event that products are not used, it is the person who no longer uses those products who is the producer of the waste, not the person who delivered them at the outset. Therefore, it is only the manager of the service station who must, where relevant, be considered the producer of the waste and, moreover, its holder.

36. In that regard, several provisions in the service station's operating agreement, in particular art 6(10) thereof, make clear that the manager was fully liable as an operator and independent trader and that he was solely liable for damage caused to third parties as the result of his operations. Article 2 of the agreement provided that responsibility for the operation of the service station was 'conferred' on the manager by Texaco. Under art 6(2) of that agreement, the manager was required to 'maintain in perfect condition and at his own expense the property [conferred]' and to ascertain on a daily basis that the pumps and other equipment were functioning properly and immediately to advise Texaco of repairs envisaged. According to art 5 of the agreement, stocks were the 'exclusive property [of the manager]', who was required to assume 'full responsibility' for them.

37. The Commission of the European Communities observes that it follows from heading Q4 of Annex I to Directive 75/442, which refers to 'materials spilled, lost or having undergone other mishap', that the Community legislature expressly opted for the directive to cover the case where the holder of waste discards it accidentally. That is not incompatible with art 1 of the directive, which does not specify whether the action of 'discarding' must be 'intentional' or not. The holder may even, as in the main proceedings, not be aware that he has discarded a product.

- a 38. Similarly, the wording of heading Q4, which likewise refers to 'any materials, equipment, etc., contaminated as a result of the mishap', shows that Directive 75/442 treats materials contaminated by waste in the same way as waste, so as to ensure that where materials which constitute waste are spilled by accident, the holder of those materials does not abandon the contaminated substances or objects but becomes responsible for disposing of them.
- b 39. By contrast, soil contaminated by an accidental spillage of hydrocarbons, which like water and air forms part of the environment, does not lend itself to the recovery and disposal operations provided for under the directive and can only be subjected to decontamination. As a general rule, therefore, soil contaminated by waste should not itself be considered to be waste.
- c 40. However, a different conclusion is necessary when soil must be excavated for the purpose of decontamination. In that case, once it is excavated the soil is no longer an element of the environment but rather movable property which, because it is mixed with accidentally spilled materials that are classified as waste, must be treated in the same way as waste.
- d 41. Finally, the person who had hydrocarbons spilled by accident in his possession at the time when they became waste, in this case the manager of the service station who bought them from Texaco, must be considered to be the 'holder'. The substances became waste when they leaked from the tanks. The petroleum undertaking is the producer of the hydrocarbons, but only the retailer, through his operations, 'produced' waste by accident.
- e The court's reply
42. Article 1(a) of Directive 75/442 defines waste as 'any substance or object in the categories set out in Annex I which the holder discards or intends ... to discard'. The annex clarifies and illustrates that definition by providing lists of substances and objects which can be classified as waste. However, the lists are only intended as guidance, and the classification of waste is to be inferred primarily from the holder's actions and the meaning of the term 'discard' (see to that effect Inter-Environnement Wallonie ASBL v Région Wallonie Case C-129/96 [1998] All ER (EC) 155, [1997] ECR I-7411 (para 26) and Application by Palin Granit Oy Case C-9/00 [2003] All ER (EC) 366, [2002] ECR I-3533 (para 22)).
- f 43. The fact that Annex I to Directive 75/442, entitled 'Categories of waste', refers in heading Q4 to '[m]aterials spilled, lost or having undergone other mishap, including any materials, equipment, etc., contaminated as a result of the mishap' merely indicates that such materials may fall within the scope of 'waste'. It cannot suffice to classify as waste hydrocarbons which are spilled by accident and which contaminate soil and groundwater.
- g 44. In those circumstances, it is necessary to consider whether that accidental spill of hydrocarbons is an act by which the holder 'discards' them.
- h 45. First, as the court has held, the verb 'to discard' must be interpreted in the light of the aim of Directive 75/442, which, in the wording of the third recital in the preamble, is the protection of human health and the environment against harmful effects caused by the collection, transport, treatment, storage and tipping of waste, and that of art 174(2) EC (formerly art 130r(2) of the EC Treaty), which states that Community policy on the environment is to aim at a high level of protection and is to be based, in particular, on the precautionary principle and the principle that preventive action should be taken. The verb 'to discard', which determines the scope of 'waste', therefore cannot be interpreted restrictively (see to that effect ARCO Chemie Nederland Ltd v Minister van Volkshuisvesting, Ruimtelijke Ordening en Milieubeheer, Vereniging
- i

Dorpsbelang Hees v Directeur van de dienst Milieu en Water van de provincie Gelderland Joined cases C-418/97 and C-419/97 [2003] All ER (EC) 237, [2000] ECR I-4475 (paras 36–40)). a

46. Secondly, when the substance or object in question is a production residue, that is to say, a product which is not itself wanted for subsequent use and which the holder cannot economically re-use without prior processing, it must be considered to be a burden which the holder seeks to 'discard' (see to that effect the Palin Granit case, cited above (paras 32–37)). b

47. It is clear that accidentally spilled hydrocarbons which cause soil and groundwater contamination are not a product which can be re-used without processing. Their marketing is very uncertain and, even if it were possible, implies preliminary operations would be uneconomical for their holder. Those hydrocarbons are therefore substances which the holder did not intend to produce and which he 'discards', albeit involuntarily, at the time of the production or distribution operations which relate to them. c

48. Finally, Directive 75/442 would be made redundant in part if hydrocarbons which cause contamination were not considered waste on the sole ground that they were spilled by accident. Article 4 of the directive provides, inter alia, that member states are to take the measures necessary to ensure that waste is recovered or disposed of without endangering human health and 'without risk to water, air, soil and plants and animals' and are to 'prohibit the abandonment, dumping or uncontrolled disposal of waste'. Pursuant to art 8 of the directive, member states are to take the measures necessary to ensure that any holder of waste has it handled by an operator responsible for its recovery or disposal or ensures those operations himself. Article 15 of the directive designates the operator who must bear the cost of disposing of waste 'in accordance with the "polluter pays" principle'. d

49. If hydrocarbons which cause contamination are not considered to be waste on the ground that they were spilled by accident, their holder would be excluded from the obligations which Directive 75/442 requires member states to impose on him, in contradiction to the prohibition on the abandonment, dumping or uncontrolled disposal of waste. e

50. It follows that the holder of hydrocarbons which are accidentally spilled and which contaminate soil and groundwater 'discards' those substances, which must as a result be classified as waste within the meaning of Directive 75/442. f

51. It should be pointed out that hydrocarbons spilled by accident are, moreover, considered to be hazardous waste under Council Directive (EEC) 91/689 (on hazardous waste) (OJ 1991 L377 p 20) and Council Decision (EC) 94/904 (establishing a list of hazardous waste pursuant to art 1(4) of Directive 91/689) (OJ 1994 L356 p 14). g

52. The same classification as 'waste' within the meaning of Directive 75/442 applies to soil contaminated as the result of an accidental spill of hydrocarbons. In that case, the hydrocarbons cannot be separated from the land which they have contaminated and cannot be recovered or disposed of unless that land is also subject to the necessary decontamination. That is the only interpretation which ensures compliance with the aims of protecting the natural environment and prohibiting the abandonment of waste pursued by the directive. It is fully in accord with the aim of the directive and heading Q4 of Annex I thereto, which, as pointed out, mentions 'any materials, equipment, etc., contaminated as a result of [materials spilled, lost or having undergone other mishap]' among the substances or objects which may be regarded as waste. The classification as h

i

a waste in the case of land contaminated by hydrocarbons does indeed therefore depend on the obligation on the person who causes the accidental spill of those substances to discard them. It cannot result from the implementation of national laws governing the conditions of use, protection or decontamination of the land where the spill occurred.

b 53. Since contaminated soil is considered to be waste by the mere fact of its accidental contamination by hydrocarbons, its classification as waste is not dependent on other operations being carried out which are the responsibility of its owner or which the latter decides to undertake. The fact that soil is not excavated therefore has no bearing on its classification as waste.

c 54. As regards whether, in the circumstances of the main action, the petroleum undertaking supplying the service station can be considered to be the producer or holder of waste within the meaning of art 1(b) and (c) of the directive, under the division of functions provided for by art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) it is for the national court to apply to the individual case before it the rules of Community law as interpreted by the court (see Staatssecretaris van Financiën v Shipping and Forwarding Enterprise Safe BV Case C-320/88 [1990] ECR I-285 (para 11)).

d 55. Article 1(c) of Directive 75/442 provides that the holder is 'the producer of the waste or the natural or legal person who is in possession of it'. The directive therefore defines 'holder' broadly, without specifying whether the obligation to dispose of or recover waste is as a general rule a matter for the producer or the possessor of the waste, that is to say, the owner or the holder.

e 56. Article 8 of Directive 75/442 states that those obligations, which are the corollary to the prohibition on the abandonment, dumping or uncontrolled disposal of waste laid down in art 4 of the directive, are the responsibility of 'any holder of waste'.

f 57. In addition, art 15 of Directive 75/442 provides that, in accordance with the 'polluter pays' principle, the cost of disposing of waste must be borne by the holder who has waste handled by an operator responsible for disposing of it and/or previous holders or the producer of the product from which the waste came. The directive therefore does not preclude the possibility that, in certain cases, the cost of disposing of waste is to be borne by one or several previous holders, that is to say, one or more natural or legal persons who are neither the producers nor the possessors of the waste.

g 58. It follows from the provisions cited in the three preceding paragraphs that Directive 75/442 distinguishes between practical recovery or disposal operations, which it makes the responsibility of any 'holder of waste', whether producer or possessor, and the financial burden of those operations, which, in accordance with the 'polluter pays' principle, it imposes on the persons who cause the waste, whether they are holders or former holders of the waste or even producers of the product from which the waste came.

h 59. The hydrocarbons spilled by accident as the result of a leak from a service station's storage facilities had been bought by that service station to meet its operating needs. They are therefore in the possession of the service station's manager. Moreover, it is the manager who, for the purpose of his operations, had them in stock when they became waste and who may therefore be considered to be the person who 'produced' them within the meaning of art 1(b) of Directive 75/442. Under those conditions, since he is at once the possessor and the producer of that waste, the service station manager must be considered to be its holder within the meaning of art 1(c) of Directive 75/442.

i

60. Nevertheless, if in the main action, in the light of information which only the national court is in a position to assess, it appears that the poor condition of the service station's storage facilities and the leak of hydrocarbons can be attributed to a disregard of contractual obligations by the petroleum undertaking which supplies that service station, or to any actions which could render that undertaking liable, the activities of that undertaking could be considered to 'have produced waste' within the meaning of art 1(b) of Directive 75/442 and it may accordingly be regarded as the holder of the waste. a
b

61. In the light of all the foregoing considerations, the answer to the question referred by the national court must be that hydrocarbons which are unintentionally spilled and cause soil and groundwater contamination are waste within the meaning of art 1(a) of Directive 75/442. The same is true for soil contaminated by hydrocarbons, even if it has not been excavated. In circumstances such as those in the main proceedings, the petroleum undertaking which supplied the service station can be considered to be the holder of that waste within the meaning of art 1(c) of Directive 75/442 only if the leak from the service station's storage facilities which gave rise to the waste can be attributed to the conduct of that undertaking. c
d

COSTS

62. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable. e

On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Second Chamber) rules as follows:

Hydrocarbons which are unintentionally spilled and cause soil and groundwater contamination are waste within the meaning of art 1(a) of Council Directive (EEC) 75/442 (on waste), as amended by Council Directive (EEC) 91/156. The same is true for soil contaminated by hydrocarbons, even if it has not been excavated. In circumstances such as those in the main proceedings, the petroleum undertaking which supplied the service station can be considered to be the holder of that waste within the meaning of art 1(c) of Directive 75/442 only if the leak from the service station's storage facilities which gave rise to the waste can be attributed to the conduct of that undertaking. f
g